> "… in the knowledge that Iraq had been the subject of considerable debate in Washington … and I recall saying to Dr Rice that if there was a review … it would certainly … have to include the whole question of how to incorporate inspections …"[195]

409. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that Sir David had told Dr Rice that the UK would need the advice of the Attorney General before any action at any stage would be possible.[196]

410. Following a visit to Baghdad by Mr Amre Moussa, the Secretary General of the Arab League, on 18 and 19 January, Mr John Sawers, British Ambassador to Egypt, reported that Mr Moussa had told him Saddam Hussein had:

- shown "the seeds of flexibility" during the visit and professed a desire to re-open a dialogue with Mr Annan, without pre-conditions and with an open agenda, although Iraq would not make the first move and the initiative would have to come from the UN; and

- accepted that the time had come for Iraq to start talking about the return of inspectors and asked Mr Moussa to contact Dr Blix on his behalf.[197]

411. Mr Powell drew the telegram to Mr Blair's attention, commenting:

> "This ties in with other indications that Saddam is wriggling, trying to get off the hook. The US will want to ignore these talks and keep open the possibility of regime change instead of inspectors."[198]

412. Mr Blair responded: "We shd keep up the pressure."[199]

Conclusions

413. After the attacks on the US on 9/11, which was widely accepted as having changed the nature of the threat and the way in which Governments should address calculations about the risks being faced, Mr Blair declared that the UK would stand "shoulder to shoulder" with the US to defeat and eradicate international terrorism.

414. Throughout the autumn of 2001, Mr Blair took an active and leading role in building a coalition to act against that threat, including military action against Al Qaida and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. He also emphasised the potential risk of terrorists acquiring and using a nuclear, biological or chemical weapon, and the dangers of inaction.

415. In November 2001, the JIC assessed that Iraq had played no role in the 9/11 attacks on the US and that practical co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida was unlikely. There was no credible evidence of covert transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups. It was possible that Iraq might use WMD in terrorist attacks, but only if the regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse.

416. In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair sought to influence US policy and prevent precipitate military action by the US which would undermine the success of the coalition which had been established for action against international terrorism. He recommended identifying an alternative policy which would command widespread international support.

417. While recognising the difficulties, the UK continued actively to pursue the policy framework agreed earlier in 2001 of strengthening the policy of containing Iraq, through a revised and more targeted sanctions regime and seeking Iraq's agreement to the return of inspectors as required by resolution 1284 (1999).

418. The adoption of resolution 1382 (2001) went some way towards that objective. But support for economic sanctions was eroding and whether Iraq would ever agree to re-admit weapons inspectors and allow them to operate without obstruction was in doubt.

419. Following President Bush's remarks on 26 November, there were renewed UK concerns that US attention was turning towards military action on Iraq.

420. Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush on 3 December and the paper he sent to President Bush the following day represented a significant development of the UK's approach. Mr Blair suggested a "clever strategy" for regime change in Iraq that built over time, until the point was reached where "military action could be taken if necessary", without losing international support.

421. Mr Blair also emphasised the threat which Iraq might pose in the future, which remained a key part his position in the months that followed.

422. Mr Blair was offering President Bush the UK's support in an effort to influence his decisions on Iraq while seeking to devise a strategy which would command international support.

423. The proposals represented a significant departure from the UK's previous approach. In essence the strategy entailed renewed demands for Iraq to comply with the obligations imposed by the Security Council and the re-admission of weapons inspectors, and a readiness to respond firmly if Saddam Hussein failed to comply.

424. The strategy had multiple diplomatic strands and Mr Blair did not, at that stage, have a ground invasion of Iraq or immediate military action of any sort in mind. But he did state that when a rebellion occurred, the US and UK should "back it militarily". That was the first step towards a policy of possible intervention in Iraq.

425. There is no evidence of any formal consideration of the detailed terms of the strategy for Iraq Mr Blair proposed to President Bush, which went beyond the strategy proposed by the FCO, or its potential implications.

426. The paper Mr Blair sent to President Bush on 4 December was not seen in advance by Mr Straw or Mr Hoon although it was sent to them subsequently.

427. A number of issues, including the legal basis for any military action, would need to be resolved as part of developing the "clever strategy".

428. The evidence indicates that Mr Straw and Mr Hoon were unaware that, with No.10's knowledge, a dialogue had subsequently been initiated between SIS and the CIA.

Introduction and key findings

1. Following the attacks on the US on 11 September 2001, Mr Blair became increasingly concerned about the risk that international terrorists might acquire and use weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the threat that posed to the UK and its wider interests. He was convinced that:

- those risks had to be dealt with;
- Iraq was only one element of that wider problem, but the risk changed the way the threat posed by Iraq should be viewed; and
- Iraq had to be dealt with as a priority.

2. This Section of the report sets out the evidence relating to events leading up to Mr Blair’s meeting with President Bush at Crawford, the meeting itself, and the subsequent statements in public and to Cabinet.

3. The UK’s assessments of Iraq’s chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile capabilities, its intent to preserve and enhance those capabilities, and the likelihood of proliferation from Iraq, are addressed in Section 4.1. That Section also addresses the initial preparation of a document for publication on WMD programmes of concern.

Key findings

- The UK continued to pursue implementation of the “smarter” economic sanctions regime in the first months of 2002, but continuing divisions between Permanent Members of the Security Council meant there was no agreement on the way forward.
- In public statements at the end of February and in the first week of March 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Straw set out the view that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with.
- At Cabinet on 7 March, Mr Blair and Mr Straw emphasised that no decisions had been taken and Cabinet was not being asked to take decisions. Cabinet endorsed the conclusion that Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programmes posed a threat to peace and endorsed a strategy of engaging closely with the US Government in order to shape policy and its presentation.
- At Crawford, Mr Blair offered President Bush a partnership in dealing urgently with the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. He proposed that the UK and the US should pursue a strategy based on an ultimatum calling on Iraq to permit the return of weapons inspectors or face the consequences.
- Following his meeting with President Bush, Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein had to be confronted and brought back into compliance with the UN.
- The acceptance of the possibility that the UK might participate in a military invasion of Iraq was a profound change in UK thinking. Although no decisions had been taken, that became the basis for contingency planning in the months ahead.

President Bush's "axis of evil" speech and the UK response

4. Addressing the potential threat from terrorists with weapons of mass destruction, President Bush described Iraq in his State of the Union speech on 29 January as part of an "axis of evil".

5. The speech prompted a major public debate on both sides of the Atlantic about policy towards Iraq.

6. In his annual State of the Union speech on 29 January 2002 President Bush described the regimes in North Korea and Iran as "sponsors of terrorism".[1] He added that Iraq had continued to:

> "… flaunt its hostility towards America and to support terror … The Iraqi regime has plotted to develop anthrax, and nerve gas, and nuclear weapons for over a decade. This is a regime that has already used poison gas to murder thousands of its own citizens … This is a regime that agreed to international inspections – then kicked out the inspectors. This is a regime that has something to hide from the civilised world."

7. President Bush stated:

> "States like these [North Korea, Iran and Iraq], and their terrorist allies, constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world. By seeking weapons of mass destruction these regimes pose a grave and growing danger.
> "America will do what is necessary to ensure our nation's security … We'll be deliberate, yet time is not on our side. I will not wait on events while dangers gather. I will not stand idly by, as perils draw closer and closer. The United States of America will not permit the world's most dangerous regimes to threaten us with the world's most destructive weapons.
> "Our war on terror is well begun, but it is only begun. This campaign may not be finished on our watch – yet it must be and it will be waged on our watch."

8. In his memoir President Bush wrote that the media had taken:

> "… the line to mean that the three countries had formed an alliance. That missed the point. The axis … was the link between Governments that pursued WMD and the terrorists who could use those weapons. There was a larger point in the speech that no one could miss. I was serious about dealing with Iraq."[2]

9. Dr. Condoleezza Rice, President Bush’s National Security Advisor, wrote in 2011 that President Bush’s phrase, an “axis of evil”, was “overdramatized”. She and the President were “stunned” when the media focused almost exclusively on it:

> “Since many people believed that we’d already decided to go to war against Iraq, sinister interpretations suggested that we were preparing to use military force against all three states. We had, for all intents and purposes, some believed, declared war on North Korea, Iraq and Iran.”[3]

10. Dr Rice added that, in a speech the following day, and in media interviews, she had sought to clarify what the President had meant:

> “The President wouldn’t take any options off the table, but he’d said we’d work with our friends to deal with the problem; diplomacy was the first line of defense. But, admittedly, the harsh language suggested that negotiation was impossible. How could you negotiate with members of an ‘axis of evil’?”

11. From early 2002, there were increasing indications that key figures in the US Administration were considering military action to achieve regime change in Iraq and there was an emphasis on the potential nexus for the fusion of WMD proliferation and terrorism.

12. Mr Blair stated that regime change would be desirable. If Saddam Hussein wanted to avoid war, he would need to agree to the return of inspectors.

13. Mr Blair told President Bush on 6 February that he agreed on the importance of sending a strong signal to the countries identified as an “axis of evil” that their behaviour needed to change.

14. At a meeting of the Overseas Sub-Committee of the Official Committee on Domestic and International Terrorism (TIDO(O)) on 1 February 2002, chaired by Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under-Secretary Defence and Intelligence, the FCO reported that US thinking about Phase 2 of the “War on Terrorism”, as reflected in President Bush’s State of the Union address, was already under way and crystallising around two concepts: the proliferation of WMD and counter-terrorism.[4]

15. Mr Wright stated that the US appeared to be most concerned about the proliferation of WMD to terrorist groups, and that lay at the heart of concerns about a number of states including Iraq. The US saw Iraq increasingly as a WMD rather than a counter-terrorism problem. UK officials thought that the interagency process would probably result in a balanced approach. Military action was seen as a last resort. Action against Iraq was not seen as imminent.

[4] Minutes, 1 February 2002, Overseas Sub-Committee of the Official Committee on Domestic and International Terrorism meeting.

16. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and the Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), advised Mr Blair that a number of senior Americans, both Republican and Democrat, were convinced that President Bush was determined on war with Iraq; the doves in the US system were totally marginalised; it was impossible to stand out against the jingoistic mood – people wanted war; taking on the Iraqs of the international system was the best way of making sure that America would not be surprised again.[5] To avoid that, some Americans had urged that Europeans should pursue a policy of tightening sanctions against Iraq, and getting an UNMOVIC (UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission) and with teeth back on the ground in Iraq. A former US military officer had suggested that the US would invade Iraq within four or five months. Another American expressed doubt about whether Turkey would support military action because of the risk of refugees flooding across its borders.

17. Sir David Manning wrote that the "rhetoric has so far been running ahead of the reality" in the US:

> "The US military have probably been told to make contingency plans … But unless we have been pretty comprehensively deceived … no decisions have yet been taken on how or when to bring it [regime change] about."

18. Mr Blair responded:

> "… Yes it's desirable but how? If we can sort out "how", do it and this is the reason Iraq is making overtures to Iran. To avoid war, Iraq [wd] need to let the inspectors back in."[6]

19. Lord Williams of Baglan, Special Adviser to Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, from 2001 to 2005, told the Inquiry that he recalled that:

> "By the opening months of 2002 it was becoming clearer that the Bush Administration appeared intent on a more muscular approach on Iraq that did not rule out military action. At the Davos meeting in January 2002 a US Senator had told the NATO Secretary General George Robertson that President Bush was determined on a war with Iraq and that it was 'a cast iron certainty within the year'. In reported remarks at the Munich security conference, in February the former NATO commander General Wesley Clarke told interlocutors that he believed war was inevitable."[7]

20. During a telephone call with President Bush on a range of issues on 6 February 2002, Mr Blair said that "whatever President Bush may have read in the media, he agreed on the importance of sending a strong signal” to the countries identified as part of an “axis of evil” that their behaviour needed to change.[8]

21. FCO officials advised Mr Straw that, while the immediate US focus was on getting a revised Goods Review List agreed by the deadline of 30 May, the signs were that the US would pursue regime change. Pressing for implementation of a tougher inspections regime could offer a potential alternative to military action. If Saddam Hussein failed to co-operate there would be a stronger justification for military action.

22. Reporting on talks the previous week with the US, including progress in US talks with Russia, Mr William Patey, Head of the FCO Middle East Department, advised Mr Straw that:

> “In the absence of any decisions on wider Iraq policy and the post-11 September situation, the immediate US focus is on getting the Goods Review List (GRL) agreed by 30 May deadline.”[9]

23. Mr Patey also described clarification of resolution 1284 (1999) as “anathema to the US”. It feared that would represent “a slippery slope towards a weaker inspections regime”. Mr Patey added:

> “As for the wider policy all the signs point to the US going for a regime change option. But there does not appear to be a viable plan as yet and the time frame remains uncertain. Cheney [Vice President Dick Cheney] is due to tour the Middle East in mid-March and we would be surprised if any decisions were taken before then. We have asked Washington for a further read-out of US thinking beyond State Department.”

24. Reporting on talks with a senior French official, Mr Patey wrote that his reading of US intentions was “the same as ours”. That appeared “to have produced a change in French attitudes towards [resolution] 1284 and the prospects of clarification”. Security Council “agreement on a tough inspections regime with unconditional access” was seen “as the only realistic alternative to US military action”. The talks with French officials are addressed in more detail later in this Section.

25. Mr Patey concluded:

> “If we can get agreement on a tough regime, this would represent a no-lose situation. If the Iraqis continue to resist a tough inspections regime or let the inspectors in then renege, the justification for any military action would be much stronger. If, against all expectations, UNMOVIC were allowed to do their job this would offer the best prospect of dealing with Saddam’s WMD.”

[8] Letter [Private Secretary No.10] to McDonald, 6 February 2002, ‘Telephone conversation with US President’.
[9] Minute Patey to Goulty and PS [FCS], 12 February 2002, ‘Iraq: Next Steps’.

26. Mr Alan Goulty, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, commented to Mr Straw's Private Secretary:

> "So far so good. But much will depend on how the US decide to pursue the regime change option. It would be helpful if I and Mr Patey could be kept up to speed on discussions with the US: hard to write contingency planning papers in ignorance of the contingencies we are planning for."[10]

27. In a letter to Mr Peter Westmacott, British Ambassador to Turkey, the following day, Mr Goulty wrote:

> "The reality is that there is deep scepticism in the US that any UN process can deal seriously with Iraq's WMD … The Iraqis have shown little interest in 1284/ suspension, believing it to be a way of extending sanctions indefinitely. But if we are to offer an alternative to military action, both we and the French are convinced that this will need to involve a tough inspections regime based on strict implementation of existing resolutions. Events since 11 September have increased the chances of reuniting the Security Council around such a proposition. Faced with a regime threatening alternative, and Security Council unity, there is a slight chance Iraq would allow unconditional inspections. This would make it difficult for the hawks in Washington to go ahead with military action. If the Iraqis persist in their refusal then the moral and legal basis for action would be improved. Either way we are in a better position."[11]

28. Mr Goulty concluded:

> "We certainly need a clearer assessment of what the Americans are up to. But it is obvious that there are some in Washington who would not accept yes for an answer. Disillusionment with containment is widespread and the status quo is no longer an option."

29. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, saw President Bush's speech as a warning to regimes he saw as "especially dangerous", which had increased expectations of military action against Iraq. The hawks in Washington felt that they had won the argument about the need for military action. The US might want to issue an ultimatum on inspections but set the bar so high that Iraq would never comply.

30. The US might seek UK endorsement for its vision by early March.

31. Sir David Manning was assured by Dr Rice that no decisions would be taken before the planned meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush at Crawford in early April.

[11] Letter Goulty to Westmacott, 15 February 2002, 'Iraq'.

32. On 11 February, Sir Christopher Meyer advised that President Bush’s reference to an “axis of evil” was:

> “… a warning to regimes which Bush sees as especially dangerous. It is not simplistic; it increases expectations of military action against Iraq; and it has added to transatlantic strains.”[12]

33. Sir Christopher reported that it was “the latest version of the Bush doctrine” which rotated “on an axis which links terrorist networks, states which harbour them, and rogue states with WMD”. President Bush had set out the first version of the doctrine, which comprised the elements in his speech to Congress on 20 September 2001. Rogue states had been added because “intelligence and the anthrax scare have generated the view that WMD in the hands of rogue states is the clear and present danger”.

34. President Bush had been “criticised for enunciating the doctrine without thinking through the policy implications”. In Sir Christopher’s view, that missed the point. The purpose in naming three countries was “to intimidate them, to put them on notice that they were marked regimes; to ‘change the terms of the debate’”. There was a “serious analysis” behind the phrase:

> “It cannot be emphasised too strongly that 11 September was a shattering blow, creating a sense of threat and vulnerability never before experienced by Americans.”

35. The consequences were:

- “an outpouring of American gratitude to Britain, which more than others appeared instantly to grasp the enormity of what had happened”;
- “incomprehension and anger at those who seemed more concerned for the rights of the Guantanamo detainees than for the need to extract information which could forestall a further atrocity”; and
- “a single-minded determination to do what it takes to defeat the nexus of terrorism and rogue WMD, if necessary by pre-emptive action, with or without allies”, which President Bush saw “as his life’s mission”.

36. Sir Christopher did not believe that the speech presaged military action against Iran or North Korea, but the phrase had “raised expectations about action against Iraq”. That did “not involve any new policy considerations”. The UK had “known for a long time” that President Bush was “looking for a way to get rid of Saddam”.

37. Sir Christopher concluded:

> “It has been tough sometimes working with the Americans since 11 September. It will be tougher still in 2002 …

[12] Telegram 196 Washington to FCO London, 11 February 2002, ‘US Foreign Policy: The Axis of Evil’.

"The backdrop is growing US/European mutual disenchantment. This puts the UK in an awkward spot … The Europeans are seen as burying their heads in the sand, refusing to face up to an international threat which only the US, and maybe the UK, have the guts and capability to tackle …

"Looking at this solely as an issue of unilateralism v. multilateralism does not capture the complexity of American attitudes … For all their brave talk, the Americans know perfectly well that they are better off with capable allies than not …

"War-fighting considerations are an insufficient guide to handling the next phase in combating terrorism … The task for the next few months is to demonstrate to the Americans that it is possible and desirable to reconcile the pursuit of the mission with the concerns of the main coalition partners. This may call for some very plain speaking in private. But we are just about the only foreigners to whom the Administration consistently listens.

"So the visit to London next month of the Vice President and that of the Prime Minister to the US in April assume even greater importance than usual."

38. Assessing the climate in Washington on 13 February, Sir Christopher Meyer reported that President Bush's speech had "quickened the drumbeat on Iraq" and commentators were "drawing the conclusion that military action is now inevitable".[13]

39. Drawing together the views the Embassy and senior visitors had heard over the last couple of weeks, Sir Christopher wrote:

"The line that no decision has been taken … may still formally be correct. But there are few parts of the Administration that see any alternative to US action – the real questions now are what, when, and (from our point of view) how much international legitimacy the US will seek to build …

"As ever, the hawks' agenda is easiest to discern. They feel they have won the argument over whether US action is needed …

"The military, meanwhile, continue to look at their plans in expectation that they will be asked to take on a major operation in Iraq this year (this is … what lies behind CENTCOM's [US Central Command] reluctance to provide back-up to an expanded ISAF [International Security Assistance Force] in Afghanistan) … But they remain very worried about the ideas being pushed by DoD [Department of Defense] civilian hawks, above all the perception that this would be easy to do quickly …

"The perception that key regional states are now essentially on board … now appears to have spread across the Administration … officials and pundits alike speculate that Cheney's visit will be aimed at nailing the necessary support.

[13] Telegram 197 Washington to FCO London, 13 February 2002, 'US/IRAQ: The Momentum Builds'.

> “What remains unclear is how the US will handle the UN track, above all the inspection regime. The Administration’s repeated high-profile demands for inspections suggest that the US will want to issue some sort of ultimatum, but set the bar so high that Iraq will never comply in practice (Armitage [Richard Armitage, US Deputy Secretary of State] as much as stated this to PUS [the FCO Permanent Under Secretary] in January). Our objective remains to persuade the US … that they must show that they are serious about implementing the resolutions – even if only to prepare the ground properly in the international community for action if Saddam fails to comply.
> “There is a clear tension between the argument for preparing international opinion (which leaves open the possibility of coercing Iraq into some real disarmament measures under the threat of US military action), and the arguments for striking swiftly and with maximum surprise … So although the goal of US policy may be ever firmer, the way to get there is not.”

40. Sir Christopher concluded that Vice President Cheney’s visit in early March “may or may not be the main vehicle for consulting the UK. But it would be wise to assume that by then, the US will have a reasonably clear vision, for which they will want our endorsement.”

41. Summarising the issues, the telegram predicted:

> “The Administration appears to be gearing up for a decision on removing Saddam, but are not quite there yet. The ‘how’ is still difficult. The debate looks likely to come to a head this month. The likeliest outcome is some combination of an ultimatum on weapons inspectors, backing of opposition forces, and US military intervention. Cheney’s visit to the region in mid-March is likely to be on the critical path of US diplomacy leading to action. We need to encourage the US to build international legitimacy for action, but there may be a tension between this and operational considerations.”

42. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director International Security, reported that a meeting with Sir David Manning “and some others”, had discussed Sir Christopher Meyer’s telegram “and the question of legal considerations related to military action against WMD proliferation”.[14]

43. Mr Ehrman said he had outlined the legal difficulty in trying to argue that WMD development posed an “‘imminent’ threat”. Sir David Manning had asked whether another justification for action could be the “flouting of UN SCRs [Security Council resolutions]”. Mr Ehrman had advised that his understanding was that “a further SCR would be required to authorise military action”; and that: “It seemed highly unlikely that the US would be willing to seek such a resolution or, even if they did, that they would get it.”

[14] Minute Ehrman to Goulty, 13 February 2002, ‘US/Iraq’.

44. Sir David Manning had asked Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), for "an analysis of the state of opinion in Iraq" and whether there were "really segments of the population who might be willing to rise against Saddam … David was sceptical. He also mentioned work … on the … INC [Iraqi National Congress]."[15]

45. Mr Wright informed the meeting of the JIC on 13 February that US policy towards Iraq was "going to be the dominant one for relationships with US and Europe over the next few weeks".[16] The Embassy in Washington had produced a "paper drawing together all available information" which was circulated to JIC members.

46. In the discussion the following points were made:

- Policy discussions between US Principals were expected in the next 10-14 days but there was no evidence that anything sudden or unexpected would happen.
- US air supremacy "could be quick to secure, but the assembly of a large enough force to bind measures together would take much longer".
- "In the meantime Saddam had a number of options open to him to queer the US pitch."

47. JIC members were invited to "share quickly" any useful analysis or information they received.

48. The date and context of the JIC discussion suggests that Mr Wright was referring to Sir Christopher Meyer's telegram of 13 February, received in London that morning.[17]

49. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that:

> "… Dr Rice had confirmed … that the Administration was indeed looking at options, but said that there was absolutely no plan at this stage. It was an effort to redefine policy."[18]

50. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, told the Inquiry that "it was February and March that they [the US] started to get into more concrete plans … for considering how they would actually deal with Iraq".[19] Sir David Manning had spoken to Dr Rice on 14 February to make sure:

> "… the Americans would not plunge into any plans before the Prime Minister met the President at Crawford and received an assurance that they wouldn't."

51. The record of the discussion confirms that Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that US policy on Iraq "continued to be a source of intense speculation in the British media, as it had been since the President’s State of the Union Address”.[20] Iraq was something that the US and UK “needed to think through very carefully together”.

52. Sir David reported that there was no expectation that anything would be decided before Mr Blair’s planned visit to the US in early April, which “would therefore provide an excellent opportunity to review the issue”.

No.10’s response, mid-February 2002

53. In a meeting to discuss Phase 2 of the war against terrorism on 19 February, Mr Blair agreed work on possible SIS operations to support Iraqi opposition groups should be taken forward.

54. No.10 also commissioned a number of papers to inform preparations for Mr Blair’s meeting with President Bush.

55. Discussions between Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), No.10 and the US about possible action in Iraq in late 2001 and January 2002 are addressed in Section 3.1.

56. In response to a request from Sir David Manning for an update before Mr Blair’s meeting with Vice President Cheney on 11 March, Sir Richard Dearlove wrote on 12 February setting out a possible SIS contribution to policy on Iraq.[21]

57. Sir Richard wrote that the option of support to opposition groups was still being considered, but there were doubts about the chances of success. He advised that Mr Blair should express support for the principle of a plan to support opposition groups, including air support, “rather than a solely military solution”.

58. Sir Richard Wilson, the Cabinet Secretary, was informed on 19 February that Sir Richard Dearlove had briefed Mr Blair on possible SIS operations in Iraq that day, and Mr Blair agreed that work should be taken forward.[22]

59. Mr Straw and Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), were also shown a copy of the letter.

60. The papers seen by the Inquiry suggest that was the first time Mr Straw was informed of SIS discussions with the US.

61. The funding arrangements for SIS operations in Iraq were set out in a letter from Sir Richard Wilson to Mr Andrew Smith, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, on 26 February.[23]

62. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, described a meeting in No.10 on 19 February as a "'Phase 2' war meeting" for Mr Blair with Sir David Manning, Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec, Mr Powell and himself.[24]

63. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair was:

> "… not sure if the Americans had taken all the decisions. He wanted to be in a position to influence their strategy, which we would project as being about fighting poverty and taking aid, but which they [the US] would see as fighting for their values. He also wanted to commission papers on Iraq, Libya, North Korea, and the European trade in WMD. He wanted work done on how to rejuvenate the MEPP [Middle East Peace Process]. He assumed that by the time of our visit to the States in April, there was chance the Americans would be casting around wider, and he wanted all the facts at his fingertips. He felt that the political situation would be different and internationally a lot harder for the Americans than things were post September 11, if they were thinking of going for any of the other countries."

64. There is no No.10 record of the meeting.

65. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that, following the meeting on 19 February, "a large number of papers" had been commissioned for the meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair, at Crawford, Texas, in early April 2002.[25]

66. The papers included:

- "Iraq A paper analysing the options, the state of play on the UN resolutions, the legal base and the internal dimension – the state of the opposition groups etc."
- "WMD A paper for public consumption setting out the facts on WMD …"[26]

67. An article appeared in The Observer on 24 February reporting that the Government was planning to publish detailed evidence of Iraq's nuclear capabilities.[27] A "senior No.10 official" was reported to have said that the meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush in April would "finalise Phase 2 of the war against terrorism" and: "Action against Iraq" would be "at the top of the agenda". As with Usama Bin Laden and the war in Afghanistan, it would be necessary to maintain public and international support for military action against Saddam Hussein. That was a "public persuasion" issue which would be tackled "in the same way" as the unprecedented "indictment" against Usama Bin Laden published in October 2001.[28]

68. The Observer article also suggested that Iraq’s nuclear capabilities included investigating a way to launch “dirty” nuclear bombs – unsophisticated devices which would nevertheless wreak havoc if used.

69. The Cabinet Office ‘Iraq: Options Paper’, produced on 8 March, is addressed later in this Section.

70. A first draft of the paper for public consumption on WMD, which addressed Iraq, Iran, North Korea and Libya, was sent to No.10 on 6 March. The content of the paper and its eventual focus only on Iraq is addressed in Section 4.1.

France’s position, mid-February 2002

71. Sir John Holmes, British Ambassador to France, reported French concerns about possible US actions and a desire to work with the UK on a policy of engagement to keep the US within the international system.

72. France was not necessarily opposed to military action to remove Saddam, but it had identified a number of conditions which had yet to be met.

73. France was also concerned that action against states such as Afghanistan and Iraq would not solve the underlying problems of WMD proliferation and terrorism, and might result in recruiting more terrorists.

74. On 11 February, the British Embassy Paris reported talks between Mr Goulty, Mr Patey and Mr Felix Paganon, UN Director in the Quai d’Orsay.[29]

75. Mr Paganon was reported to have said France was convinced the US would take military action against Iraq before the end of the year. The US considered that it did not need additional authority for action, and:

> “When it came to decision time, the US would proceed according to their own criteria, not on the basis of consultation with allies.”

76. France wanted to do whatever was achievable to prevent military action, “not out of concern for Saddam’s survival but through fear of the consequences of military action”, which could include:

- chaos in Iraq, where the vacuum might be filled by another Ba’ath general;
- division of Iraq; and
- increased instability in the region.

77. France believed the unconditional return of weapons inspectors was the only way to prevent military action. France was no longer pressing for an early discussion of the Goods Review List but there was scepticism about the prospects for toughening enforcement of existing resolutions, "particularly the Syrian pipeline". Tightening the sanctions regime would be "difficult to achieve and did little to prevent confrontation", which was now the "basic aim".

78. Mr Paganon and Mr Goulty agreed on the need "to maintain P5 [the five Permanent Members of the Security Council] unity".

79. Mr Patey said that if the:

> "… consensus were broken, military action would be more likely. The US would be prepared to act on their own if necessary, but would be inhibited if there were a viable UN track in train."

80. Mr Paganon agreed that it was vital the P5 and Arab states sent the same tough message to Saddam Hussein.

81. Mr Goulty stated:

> "… in the meantime we should all send the same message to the Americans, that we should continue to go down the UN route, and that if this did not work, we would then have a better pretext for dealing with WMD through military action."

82. Sir John Holmes advised on 19 February that France was "particularly concerned" about what President Bush's "axis of evil" implied for US policy.[30] It was ready to recognise that "differences with the Americans" were "more about means than ends"; but they would want to work with the UK "to keep American action within the international system".

83. France had "worried since the end of the Cold War that American power was becoming disproportionate". The main French concerns following President Bush's "axis of evil" speech were that the US:

- would be "increasingly tempted towards unilateral action without consulting allies or the UN";
- saw "military action as more or less the sole response to terrorism and proliferation"; and
- was confusing the two problems of terrorism and proliferation.

84. The French view was that:

> "… as well as clamping down hard (but in accordance with international law) on unacceptable actions, we also need to address their political economic, cultural and military causes … [A]scribing them simply to a national or individual propensity for wrongdoing is inadequate. There are reasons beyond mere wickedness why bad regimes come to power and survive: simply keeping the lid on the ambitions of dangerous regimes by military repression, or removing them by military force, may in the long run even make things worse.

“So on most cases the French favour a policy of engagement …”

85. Sir John identified Iraq as “the real problem”. France had “long been at odds” with the US and UK over “the basic analysis: arguing that a policy of punitive sanctions and containment of Saddam is in the long term likely to create even greater incentives for the regime to proliferate and more antagonism in the population, and so store up new dangers, particularly in the absence of real MEPP progress”.

86. Before 11 September, France had felt US policy was moving in its direction:

“Now, although work continues on the Goods Review List (a French idea), they suspect the gap will widen again … They are not necessarily totally opposed to an American operation to remove Saddam, which they increasingly see as inevitable, provided that it is supported in the UN and in the region; is carefully thought through in military terms; and forms part of a realistic project for creating a better and more stable future for the country and the region. So far they do not think these conditions have been met. The lack of American willingness so far to follow through on nation building in Afghanistan has not encouraged them. Nor does the present parlous state of the MEPP …”[31]

87. In addition, France was “not convinced that the approach of naming key states of concern, and dealing with them by military means or diplomatic isolation” would “solve the underlying problems of WMD proliferation or terrorism”. Those threats were developing through “shadowy non-state networks” which would “not go away” even if examples were made of Afghanistan and Iraq; “and may well gain more recruits over time”.

88. Sir John concluded the French “instinct remains to back the Americans in upholding international stability when push comes to shove”. What France wanted “above all” was “to be consulted and involved, and to have some input into analysis and policy before they are faced with the choice of following US decisions or not”. The UK was “likely to be in the front line of any split” and had “a particular incentive to act, and to do so quickly. If we wait until the Americans have a fully worked out plan, attitudes may well have hardened too far on both sides.”

89. Sir John suggested the UK needed to persuade:

- The US “using the influence we have earned” to explain their thinking and “to share intelligence as much as they can to illustrate the real, present WMD dangers of the Iraqi regime; to explain why they believe they can remove the regime without setting the region on fire; and, once they have a plan, to explain why they think it can work". The US instinct would be to share only with the UK but that would put "us in a particularly difficult position, increasing the appearance of poodlism if we follow without being able to explain adequately ourselves. We saw in the early stages of the Afghan crisis how bad the Americans could be at appearing to have a coherent plan, and at keeping allies in the loop. Doubts were stilled by good PR work by us, and above all by quick success. But we and they should learn the lessons."

[31] Telegram 123 Paris to FCO London, 19 February 2002, ‘US Foreign Policy: France and the Axis of Evil’.

- France and others to "eschew megaphone diplomacy" and to engage the US.

90. Sir John added:

"… our chances of success with the Americans would be much greater if we could persuade other Europeans to … be serious about defence capabilities. Our chances with the Europeans would be much greater if we could persuade the Americans to put their full weight behind breaking the current disastrous MEPP cycle, and look as if they were doing so."

The UK diplomatic perspective

91. FCO officials identified the need to pursue "the UN route" demanding access for weapons inspectors as a possible way to avoid military action while establishing stronger arguments for such action if necessary.

92. The way in which the minute was written indicates that the FCO officials did not, at that stage, envisage military action would comprise a full-scale, US-led invasion.

93. The minute prompted a wider debate in the Diplomatic Service which identified a number of key issues.

94. Although those contributions did not lead to the establishment of an agreed FCO position, on the implications for the UK of military action in Iraq and the advantages and disadvantages of different courses of action.

95. On 20 February, Mr Goulty produced "a note on contingency planning in the event of military action against Iraq", which advised:

"Planning for any military action against Iraq will need to take into account the need to prepare the ground for, and minimise, the adverse humanitarian, diplomatic and PR consequences of, what will be a widely unpopular move. Much will depend on the duration of the action … and whether or not it succeeds in removing Saddam. The worst possible scenario … would be a prolonged campaign which left Saddam in power and allowed him to make maximum propaganda gains … In the current Middle East climate, we would probably be faced with the collapse of sanctions and the effective end of our containment policy.”[32]

96. Addressing the “Legal position/UN route”, Mr Goulty wrote:

“Whether we participated or not, we would wish to see a convincing legal justification for military action …”

97. Addressing the chances of obtaining fresh UN authority, Mr Goulty advised that it seemed:

“… highly unlikely that, in the absence of a new attack on Kuwait or the Kurds or of clear and publicly usable evidence that Iraq has reconstituted its WMD, the Security Council would agree a further resolution that could justify military action. This would include a new … resolution specifically demanding access for the weapons inspectors, although we should still push for one … We should continue to put pressure on Iraq to readmit inspectors – this makes sense whether or not military action is contemplated. If the Iraqi regime continues to refuse (and signs are … it has no intention of doing otherwise) we would at least be in a stronger position to defend military action. In the unlikely event that the inspectors are admitted, history would suggest that it would not be long before they were blocked, which again would strengthen the arguments for military action. We should also continue pushing for tougher action … against those states … breaking sanctions (especially Syria). Again this makes sense whether or not military action is contemplated: it would put real pressure on Saddam either to submit to meaningful inspections or to lash out.”

98. Mr Goulty suggested:

“Our message to those who oppose military action should be to get serious about the UN route: encouraging Iraq to believe that it can escape sanctions without complying with SCRs, seeking to water down those … obligations, and blocking initiatives in the UN to crack down on smuggling serves only to make military action more likely.”

99. Mr Goulty’s view was that: “In the current climate, and in the absence of progress on the MEPP – highly unlikely in this timescale – Arab States would have the greatest difficulties in supporting an operation which is bound to be seen as serving Israeli interests.” Nevertheless there were signs that some countries would support the US. The UK would have “a better picture of regional attitudes after Vice President Cheney’s March tour”.

100. Addressing the attitudes of others, Mr Goulty wrote:

“We would expect the Iranians, hitherto (privately) in favour of action to remove Saddam Hussein, to be much less helpful in the light of President Bush’s ‘axis of evil' speech. France and Germany … could probably be kept on side. The French position is not greatly different from our own. Their policy remains to keep up pressure on Baghdad over inspectors and maintain P5 unity. But they accept that US military action to remove Saddam is now very much on the cards. In this event, they would want the US to fully think through the consequences and take adequate steps to build legitimacy in the UN. Recent German statements reveal a preoccupation with maintaining the rule of law, concern over the unilateralist trend in US policy, but a reluctance to criticise the US overtly … We would expect other EU members to be more overtly critical in the absence of Security Council endorsement of military action."

101. Addressing public and media reaction, Mr Goulty wrote:

"The public and media reaction to any military action would be mixed …

"The Arab and Muslim media and 'street' would be deeply hostile …

"In the build up to any action, we would need to mount an aggressive PR [public relations] campaign emphasising Iraq's record of non-compliance with UNSCRs and evidence of WMD reconstitution and other crimes (making maximum use of intelligence). Our basic message, around which further, more detailed messages could be built, might be: 'Iraq poses a unique threat to the security and stability of the region as well as the rest of the world.'

"Ideally targets selected would be purely military and steps taken to avoid non-combatant civilian casualties …"

"Ultimately the success of any campaign would depend on the success and swiftness of the military action (and removal of Saddam Hussein)."

102. Mr Goulty concluded that planning would:

"… need to take into account the need to prepare the ground for, and minimise the adverse humanitarian, diplomatic and PR consequences of, what will be a widely unpopular move … The worst possible scenario from our point of view would be a prolonged campaign which left Saddam in power and allowed him to make maximum propaganda gains from Iraqi casualties, whether or not caused by the coalition."

103. Mr Goulty's minute was circulated widely within the FCO, to Ambassadors in the region and to staff in Washington, Paris, Moscow and to the UK Mission in New York.

104. Mr John Sawers, British Ambassador to Egypt, who had been closely associated with the development of the UK's policy on Iraq as Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs (see Section 1.2), responded to Mr Goulty's minute with a teleletter to Sir Michael Jay and senior colleagues offering his views on the direction of policy on Iraq.[33]

105. Mr Sawers began:

> “I have hesitated to offer my own [views], in the knowledge that contacts between London and Washington will already be intensive and rightly held close. But I sense a danger of us becoming too predictable. I do not advocate a US march on Baghdad. But I do think we need to box more cleverly, not least to retain leverage in Washington.”

106. Mr Sawers stated containment had worked for 10 years but the price had been high. Iraq’s WMD activities were “still without doubt going ahead” and Saddam Hussein’s regime would “remain an obstacle to every single Western objective in the Middle East”. In his view the UK needed to say:

> “… clearly and consistently that our goal is Regime Change – for the sake of stability in the Middle East, for the Iraqi people, and for the goal of controlling the spread of WMD.”

107. Setting out a list of other countries where regime change had been and remained a goal of UK policy, Mr Sawers wrote:

> “Whether or not we actually express it is purely a matter of tactics. So the lawyers and peaceniks should not prevent us from saying what we really want in Iraq. And by associating ourselves with Bush’s heartfelt objective of seeing Saddam removed, we will be given more houseroom in Washington to ask the awkward questions about how.
> “And there are many such questions. What is the plan? How long would it take for a direct confrontation to succeed? How do we retain the support of our regional friends … If we were to build up the Kurds and Shia as proxies, what assurances would we have to give them that we would not let them down yet again? How would we keep the Iranians from meddling? How do we preserve Iraq’s territorial integrity … How would we provide for stability after Saddam and his cronies were killed?
> “All these are much more important questions than legality, the Arab street and other hardy Foreign Office perennials. On a tactical point, I recall Colin Powell [the US Secretary of State, who had been Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1988 to 1993] … in 1993 saying that one of the blessings of retirement was that he would never have to listen to another British legal opinion. Presenting Washington with one now will both irritate and weaken him. We can look for the legal basis once we have decided what to do, as we did in Kosovo.”

[33] Teleletter Sawers to Jay, 21 February 2002, ‘Iraq: Policy’.

108. Addressing "what should we be doing while Washington plans and we try to influence them", Mr Sawers wrote:

> "Conventional advice will be to plough on in New York, get the Goods Review List agreed, and work to implement the SCRs by sending back the inspectors.
> "We should think long and hard on the last point. There is not a shred of evidence that Saddam is willing to open up his WMD plants to the UN. We would be sending people … on a fool's errand and offering them as hostages. We could be precipitating the very crisis we would rather avoid, on terms favourable to Saddam … and we would offer an opportunity on a plate to the hawks in Washington. And if it is the UK in the lead, as we usually are, we will suffer a heavier backlash … We need to have an agreed strategy with Washington before we head down a road which might look sensible, legal, UN-friendly etc, but only leads us into the jam we are trying to avoid."

109. Mr Sawers concluded:

> "Visiting Americans say privately that there is still a debate to be had in Washington. Powell is not as lonely a voice as he might seem. We know that Bush, at the end of the day, will be both intelligent and responsible. If we can help the Americans come up with a persuasive plan to oust the world's worst tyrant, then we should do so. And if the best military and intelligence brains in London and Washington fail to produce a convincing plan, then we stick to containment."[34]

110. Mr Sawers' letter and its distribution caused some consternation in No.10.

111. Sir David Manning told Mr Powell that he had:

> "… asked the FCO to turn him off. Not helpful to have this winging its way around the world … If John/other HOMs [Heads of Mission] want to offer views, they should be in personal letters to Michael Jay."[35]

112. Mr Powell agreed:

> "I was gob smacked by this. John deserves a slapping down."[36]

113. As a result, the FCO sent a personal response to Mr Sawers and other Heads of Mission who had been sent copies of his teleletter stating:

> "Your teleletter of 21 February … raises a number of highly sensitive issues. I can assure you that thought is being given to them, necessarily on a highly restricted basis. You will understand that correspondence, widely copied, on these issues

MR BLAIR’S MEETING WITH MR ANNAN, 25 FEBRUARY 2002

114. In preparation for a meeting with Mr Kofi Annan, UN Secretary-General, in London on 25 February, the FCO advised Mr Blair that Mr Amre Moussa, Secretary General of the Arab League, had conveyed an “offer” from President Saddam Hussein to Mr Annan “to re-open dialogue, without pre-conditions, on co-operation with the UN”.[38] The FCO added that it was “not clear whether Saddam would under any circumstances allow the return of the inspectors” or whether it was “simply a propaganda exercise”. History “would suggest the latter”.

115. Mr Annan had responded that:

- He was always willing to talk to any [UN] Member State about complying with UN resolutions.
- Any renewed dialogue should be more focused and substantive than before, and set in the context of implementing the relevant resolutions, including getting the inspectors back in.

116. Mr Blair was advised to make a number of points to Mr Annan, including:

- Congratulating Mr Annan on his response to Saddam Hussein’s offer.
- The Iraqi regime’s support for terrorism and development of WMD was “of the utmost concern” to the international community. Saddam’s “WMD ambitions” would not be allowed to “go unchecked”.
- The UK believed getting inspectors back into Iraq was the “best way to eliminate WMD”.
- Getting them in on Saddam Hussein’s terms was “not an option”: the UK was looking for “an effective inspections regime as specified in … resolutions 687 and 1284, not false assurances”.
- The Iraqi regime had to be “brought to realise that if it continues to reject its UN obligations to disarm then military action to deal with the threat it poses becomes more likely. We collectively share responsibility for ensuring this message gets across.”

117. In their meeting, Mr Blair told Mr Annan that WMD were “the key” for the next phase of the response to terrorism, “particularly acquisition by states that were not democratic, stable or progressive", and "no final decisions had been taken on Iraq": "He had been hoping there would be a new UN resolution and inspectors back in."[39]

118. In response to comments about the evidence of Iraqi activity, Mr Blair said the UK was "giving thought to how to produce the necessary evidence". Nothing would "happen precipitately" and there might be "other ways to deal with Iraq, for instance if Saddam allowed inspectors back in".

119. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote that in late February he had been told by a senior British diplomat that the US "was determined to have the resolutions obeyed, or 'to have the regime out'".[40] When Mr Annan had "responded that Saddam Hussein had a habit of miscalculating", he had been told "either they [the US] will get rid of the capability or they will get rid of him [Saddam Hussein]".

120. Mr Annan added:

> "But what was also clear, even to the most ardent of opponents of military action was that the current strategy wasn't working: the sanctions could never be made 'smart' enough to spare the Iraqi people from continued suffering; nor were they robust enough to ensure with certainty that Baghdad wasn't finding ways to rearm in contravention of its obligations …"

121. A report of discussions between Mr Blair and other European leaders at the Progressive Governance Summit in Stockholm stated that "there was a general sense … that it would be counter-productive to confront the US. The wiser course was to get the US to widen their agenda and encourage them to approach the issue from a coalition perspective."[41] Mr Blair's overall sense from those discussions was that it "would be a challenging task, but possible" to bring France and Germany "onside".

122. The FCO advised No.10 on 26 February that the immediate US focus was on getting the Goods Review List agreed. After that, the UK wanted Security Council discussions on the arrangements for inspections, but US support was uncertain. If "against all expectations" UNMOVIC was allowed to do its job that would "offer the best prospect of dealing with Iraq's WMD".

123. The FCO advice did not address the wider issues arising from the uncertainty about US policy and the possibility of military action, or what the UK's response should be to that.

124. Mr Straw’s Private Office advised Sir David Manning on 26 February that:

> “In the absence of any decisions on wider Iraq policy and the post-11 September situation, the immediate US focus is on getting the Goods Review List (GRL) agreed by the 30 May deadline.”[42]

125. Once the GRL was implemented, there was:

> “… an expectation, if UN credibility is to be maintained, that the Security Council would begin discussions on clarification of SCR 1284 … The US are reluctant to go down this route, fearing that it represents a slippery slope towards a weaker inspection regime. But it remains our view that, properly handled, clarification would work to our advantage … If the Iraqis continued to resist a tough inspection regime or let the inspectors in then reneged, the justification for any military action would be much stronger. If, against all expectations UNMOVIC were allowed to do their job, this would offer the best prospect of dealing with Iraq’s WMD.”

126. The FCO wrote that the US was talking to the Russians. If the French could be persuaded to help, that could offer the prospect of P5 agreement on clarification.

127. Sir Derek Plumbly warned on 27 February about the danger of turning regime change into an objective, rather than an aspiration.

128. Sir Derek also identified progress on Palestine as a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for moving forward on regime change in Iraq.

129. Sir Derek Plumbly, British Ambassador to Saudi Arabia wrote to Sir Michael Jay on 27 February, warning:

> “… we have always said we want to see regime change. There is no harm in saying it now more insistently perhaps, given that the Bush Administration have raised the issue to the top of the international agenda. But to date we have presented regime change as an aspiration, not an objective which we believe we (or the US can deliver). If we cross that bridge definitively, it will be difficult to pull back later.”[43]

130. Sir Derek argued that the UK did need to take account of the Arab Street:

> “Post 11 September I really do not see how we can disregard the depth of anger in our Middle Eastern back yard … regimes may not fall in this part of the world, but instability can manifest itself in different ways.”

[42] Letter Sedwill to Manning, 26 February 2002, ‘Iraq’.
[43] Letter Plumbly to Jay, 27 February 2002, ‘Iraq’.

131. Sir Derek took "issue too with John [Sawers]'s caricature of 'conventional advice' in FCO". He recognised:

> "… the need to frame our arguments within the US universe of facts. But we should not kid ourselves. UNSCOM [UN Special Commission] ground to a halt because the Security Council was terminally divided … Having UNMOVIC inspectors on the ground would be less risky than a US/UK regime change campaign … Saddam knows his limitations these days.
> "… I do not think we should sign up to a proactive regime change policy until we have satisfactory answers to questions such as those John is posing. We should not give the Americans a blank cheque … [T]he Americans need us on Iraq, and when they look more closely into the abyss they may pause. In any event … from talking to American colleagues … the need for a UN process is recognised In Washington. We should allow that to play through … And we should promote the thought that a more balanced and determined US approach on Palestine would be a necessary (but not sufficient) condition for moving forward on regime change. Containment has worked for 11 years. We should not abandon it lightly."

132. Sir Derek's letter was copied only to Mr Ricketts and Mr Graham Fry, Deputy Under Secretary Wider World, within the FCO.

133. The letter was sent to Sir David Manning by Sir Michael Jay's Private Office and was also seen by Mr Powell.[44]

Development of the rationale for dealing with the threat from Iraq

134. Sir Richard Dearlove advised on 26 February that the US was drawing up plans for a military campaign and considering an ultimatum for the return of inspectors with which Saddam Hussein would be unable to comply.

135. On 26 February, Sir Richard Dearlove wrote again to Sir David Manning about developments in US thinking and timescales.[45]

136. Sir Richard advised that the US had concluded that containment would not work and that disarming Iraq would be more difficult with each passing year. The US military were drawing up plans for a military campaign later in the year and the Administration was considering the possibility of presenting Saddam Hussein with an ultimatum for the return of inspectors. But, Sir Richard wrote, the bar would be set "so high that Saddam would not be able to comply".

137. Sir Richard reported that his team had told the US that the UK legal position would need to be clarified before the UK could become engaged.

[45] Letter C to Manning, 26 February 2002, 'US Policy on Iraq'.

138. Sir David Manning sent the letter to Mr Blair, commenting:

> “Interesting account of the latest US thinking. Much as expected: […]”[46]

139. Mr Blair replied:

> “I still don’t see how the military option will work, but I guess there will be an answer.”[47]

140. Sir Richard Dearlove’s letter was also shown to Mr Straw and Sir Richard Wilson.

141. Sir Richard Dearlove briefed Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on 4 March. The discussion included the possibility of the US taking “serious military action” in the autumn.[48]

142. In his memoir, published in 2007, Mr George Tenet, the Director of Central Intelligence, described how the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) had concluded that American “boots on the ground” would be needed to remove Saddam Hussein.[49]

143. Mr Tenet recorded that a new Head of the Iraq Operations Group inside the CIA Directorate of Operations had been appointed in August 2001 who had:

> “… conducted a review of the lessons learned from our long and not-too-happy history of running operations against Iraq since …1991. The principal message … from the review was that Saddam was not going to be removed via covert action alone. As much as some would wish for … some quick, easy, and cheap solution to regime change in Iraq – it was not going to happen.”

144. Mr Tenet added that the CIA’s “analysis concluded that Saddam was too deeply entrenched and had too many layers of security around him for there to be an easy way to remove him”; and the Iraqi reaction was “always” that: “If you are serious about this, we want to see American boots on the ground.”

145. Mr Tenet wrote that his own “aversion to a CIA go-it-alone strategy was based on our estimate of the chance of success (slim to none)” and his belief that the CIA “plate was already overflowing with missions in the war on terrorism”.

146. Mr Tenet observed that even if such action “managed to take Saddam out, the beneficiary was likely to have been another Sunni general no better that the man he replaced”. That “would not have been consistent with the Administration’s intent that a new Iraq might serve as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East”.

JIC Assessment, 27 February 2002: 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight'

147. The JIC Assessment of 27 February concluded that Saddam Hussein saw the Goods Review List as making sanctions sustainable indefinitely.

148. Saddam Hussein would permit the return of weapons inspectors if large scale military action was believed to be imminent, but he would seek to frustrate their efforts.

149. Iraq continued to pursue its WMD programmes; design work for missiles with ranges greater than the UN limit of 150km was under way and it could produce chemical warfare agents "within weeks". The JIC also introduced a new judgement that, "If it has not already done so, Iraq could produce significant quantities of biological warfare agents within days".

150. Without direct intervention on the ground, the opposition would be unable to overthrow Saddam Hussein's regime.

151. If he was unable to deter a US attack, Saddam Hussein would "go down fighting and could adopt high risk options".

152. At the request of the JIC, an Assessment, 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight', was produced on 27 February.[50] It addressed "Saddam's threat perceptions and internal position: whether he is secure, what opposition he faces, and what he is doing to try and avoid the internal and international threats he faces".

153. In its discussion of the draft, the JIC concluded that the Assessment should "put … to one side" the issue of Iraq's interpretation of US policy as the latter was "itself developing, and would probably become much clearer to everyone … within the next few weeks".[51]

154. The JIC also decided that the final Assessment:

> "… needed to say a bit more about Iraq's aspirations and potential in terms of Weapons of Mass Destruction, not least because this was, and would remain, an important area for policy discussions with the US. The Pentagon's views on how soon Iraq might develop a nuclear capability did not quite match the UK's, and it would be useful for Ministers to know the JIC's mind."[52]

[51] Minutes, 27 February 2002, JIC meeting.
[52] Minutes, 27 February 2002, JIC meeting.

155. In the first of its Key Judgements, the JIC stated:

> “Saddam fears a US military attack which would threaten his regime by bringing about the disintegration of his military and security apparatus. A force on the scale of Desert Storm (1991) would constitute such a threat.”[53]

156. The JIC also judged that Saddam did not believe such an attack was inevitable.

157. In addition, the JIC’s Key Judgements were:

- Saddam Hussein continued to “resist the enforcement” of Security Council resolutions “on disarmament while encouraging sanctions erosion”. His strategy was “threatened by US/UK efforts to introduce the Goods Review List (GRL) and make Iraq accept weapons inspectors”. Iraq saw the GRL as “making sanctions indefinitely sustainable”. But “the greatest risk seen by Saddam” was “that non-compliance with the UN may be used to justify a full-scale US attack”.
- Saddam had: “In response … begun a nominal re-engagement with the UN and a diplomatic charm offensive.” So far he had offered “nothing new”. The JIC judged that if the threat of large-scale military action was believed to be imminent, Saddam would permit the return of weapons inspectors. It they did return Saddam would “frustrate their efforts” and he would “continue to play for time”.
- Iraq continued “to pursue its WMD programmes. Design work for missiles with ranges greater than the UN limit of 150km is under way. If it has not already done so, Iraq could produce significant quantities of biological warfare agent within days and chemical warfare agents within weeks of a decision to do so.”
- The Special Republican Guard (SRG) remained “closely tied to Saddam’s regime” and was “likely to resist any attempt to overthrow him”. The Republican Guard was also “favoured” and was “relatively well equipped and trained; it would be relatively resilient under attack, but its loyalty in dire straits is more open to question than the SRG”. “Other elements of the Iraqi military” were “more liable to crack if subjected to strong attack”.
- Kurdish and Shia groups formed “the most significant opposition to Baghdad”. The “opposition” was “militarily weak and riven by factional differences”. They would “not act without visible and sustained US military support on the ground”. A “coup or military revolt” was “only a remote possibility”.

158. The JIC stated that the US reaction, to the attacks on 11 September, had “been a jolt” to Saddam Hussein’s position. President Bush’s speech labelling Iraq as part of an “axis of evil” would have “reinforced” Saddam Hussein’s concern.

[53] JIC Assessment, 27 February 2002, ‘Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight’.

159. In respect of developments at the UN, the Assessment stated:

> "In conjunction with pressure from the US, developments at the UN since November 2001 threaten to de-rail Saddam's long-term strategy of refusing to comply with UNSCRs on weapons inspectors while working to circumvent sanctions and encourage their erosion. UK and US proposals to introduce the Goods Review List (GRL) in June 2002 … undermine Iraq's propaganda over sanctions by offering Iraq unrestricted access to most goods. Iraq therefore sees the GRL as making sanctions politically sustainable indefinitely. Russia's acceptance of UNSCR 1382 while accepting only ill-defined assurances on steps to clarify UNSCR 1284 … was also a defeat for Iraq."

160. In response, there were signs that Iraq had "embarked on a nominal policy of re-engagement with the UN and a diplomatic charm offensive". Mr Tariq Aziz, Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister, had visited Moscow and Beijing in early 2002 "to solicit support against sanctions and the US threat […]".

161. The Assessment added:

> "But this tactical diplomacy has failed to improve Iraq's position. […] The UN Secretary-General has been wary of accepting Saddam's suggestion of a renewed dialogue and accurately perceives Iraq's wish to prevaricate …"

162. In relation to Iraq's WMD programme, the Assessment stated:

> "… Iraq continues to pursue the development of weapons of mass destruction. Though we lack precise data, Iraq has probably reconstituted many of the elements struck during Operation Desert Fox in December 1998. Iraq's ballistic missile programme has extensively tested missiles under the 150km UN limit and intelligence indicates that design work for systems with ranges over 1,000km is underway. Iraq is assessed to have hidden 10-20 Al Hussein missiles (range 650km) capable of hitting Israel. Iraq also continues with its chemical and biological warfare (CBW) programmes and, if it has not already done so, could produce significant quantities of BW agent within days and CW agents within weeks of a decision to do so … These can be delivered by a variety of means. Methods of ensuring survivability of CBW production facilities from attack are a high priority.
> "Procurement activity suggests that Iraq is continuing with a nuclear weapons programme, although its current status is unclear. Before the Gulf War intervened, Iraqi plans were well advanced and we judge they were only three years away from possessing a nuclear weapon. Were sanctions lifted now, we judge it would take Iraq at least five years to produce a nuclear weapon and a further two to produce a warhead. The acquisition of fissile material or significant technical assistance from abroad could significantly shorten this timescale. Iraq still has some low grade radioactive material which it could utilise in a radiological dispersal device, but there is no recent intelligence indicating that Iraq is pursuing such a course."

163. The Assessment stated that Saddam Hussein recognised the “greatest risk” was:

> “… that the Iraqi WMD programme and non-compliance with UNSCRs may be used to justify a US attack to overthrow him. He would probably see a force on the scale of Desert Storm (1991) as overwhelming. We judge that [if the threat of large-scale military action was believed to be imminent, Saddam would permit the return of weapons inspectors] …”

164. The JIC judged that, as “an interim fall-back position”:

> “… Iraq could try to resurrect Russian proposals to link the entry of inspectors to a pre-determined timetable of sanctions-lift. But this would be no more than a tactical move to buy time, not an admission of defeat … even if inspectors were allowed to return, Iraq would embark on a renewed policy of frustration, involving denial, deception, obstruction and delay. Iraq would be able to conceal from inspectors much of its CBW work and research on longer range missiles, though probably not its missile production facilities.”

165. The Assessment reviewed Iraqi opposition groups and elaborated the final Key Judgement:

> “Overall we judge that, unaided, the Iraqi opposition is incapable of overthrowing the Iraqi regime; in the present circumstances a coup or military revolt remains only a remote possibility. With outside help short of direct intervention on the ground, the opposition would still be unable to succeed. Spontaneous mass uprisings might be more important if the regime’s control wavered, but this is not in prospect; however, it might hasten the regime’s downfall in conjunction with a massive US attack.”

166. The Assessment added:

> “The resilience of the Iraq military is uncertain; much would depend on the particular nature and scale of the attack it faced and how it perceived that threat. Though the Iraqi military is relatively large, well-trained and well-equipped by regional standards … it also has serious weaknesses … [I]ts training and equipment is inadequate to face Western forces on equal terms and it is especially vulnerable to air power.
> “The Republican Guard (RG) and Special Republican Guard (SRG) are the elite … they are better equipped and trained than the regular army. For these reasons, we would expect them to be relatively resilient under attack … It [the SRG] would defend any attempt to topple Saddam. In dire straits, the RG’s loyalty would be more open to question. The regular army would be most liable to waver in its support of the regime, or disintegrate, if subject to a strong US attack.”

167. Looking to the future, the JIC judged that Saddam Hussein was "not yet convinced" that a US:

> "… move to overthrow him is inevitable. While the Coalition campaign continues in Afghanistan, he probably believes the US is militarily preoccupied; in any event, US rhetoric has not so far been backed up by overt preparations to attack. He still hopes that his efforts to counter progress at the UN will undermine support for sanctions and for US military action …"

168. The Kurds and Shia "would not show their hand until US resolve to overthrow Saddam" was "absolutely clear". There was "no obvious leader" among those groups who was "capable of unifying the opposition" and had "credibility and popular appeal inside Iraq". No likely replacement for Saddam from within the regime had been identified, but the JIC stated that, in the event of internal change, it was "likely that any successor would be autocratic and drawn from the Sunni military elite".

169. The JIC concluded:

> "In the event of a US attack, Saddam would probably shift to a well-tested defensive strategy in the hope that Iraqi resistance to a US ground campaign would strain US resolve … Alternatively, if Saddam believed he was unable to deter a US attack to oust his regime, we judge he would go down fighting and could adopt high risk options, such as seizing northern Iraq, to disrupt US planning. Faced with defeat, Saddam could resort to even riskier options such as conducting terrorist attacks or using weapons of mass destruction against US forces or Israel.
> "Iraq could fracture under attack. But all Iraq's neighbours agree that … is deeply undesirable. Each will try to influence events as they develop; it is likely that Iran … would try to maintain and build its influence … But we judge it would try to avoid becoming directly involved in fighting on either side."

MOD advice to Mr Hoon, 27 February 2002

170. The MOD advised Mr Hoon that the UK should not rule out military action against Iraq; but there was a need to think through the options in more depth. That would also improve the "prospects of influencing the US towards a successful outcome".

171. Mr Simon Webb, the MOD Policy Director, sent Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, advice on 27 February on how the UK might approach the three countries referred to by President Bush as an "axis of evil".[54]

[54] Minute Webb to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 27 February 2002, 'Axis of Evil'.

172. Mr Webb recommended that the UK should acknowledge that the countries posed “increasing” risks to international stability; and that the US should be persuaded to explain why. The UK should:

> “Encourage a broad-based approach ranging from diplomacy to challenge inspections and levers on suppliers.
> “Not rule out UK participation in military action against Iraq […] if that is the only way to stem the tide of WMD proliferation and a worthwhile and legal option exists at the time.”

173. Mr Webb also stated that it was important to distinguish between two strands; the “direct risks from proliferation” and the “potential association with international terrorism”.

174. Mr Webb’s detailed advice on the risks posed by Iraq is addressed in Section 4.1.

175. In the context of the response from European partners, Mr Webb advised:

> “… it would be wiser for the UK to take a more complex position supporting the underlying concerns but advocating a greater mix of possible approaches. No.10 have started to take this line over the last week but we need to think through the options in more depth. In this way we have better prospects of influencing the US towards a successful outcome. Above all we should encourage the US to explain the issues more effectively …”

176. Mr Webb asked Mr Hoon for approval for the overall approach he had set out on which he would “be working with the Cabinet Office” before Mr Blair’s meeting with President Bush in early April.

177. Mr Ehrman, who had been shown a draft of Mr Webb’s advice, raised a number of questions and asked for a briefing for himself and Mr Patey on what the MOD considered to be the “valid options for military operations in some specific scenarios against Iraq”.[55]

178. Mr Ehrman underlined the potential legal difficulties, including differences between the UK and the US on the question of whether a determination that Iraq was flouting UNSCRs could be made without collective Security Council authorisation.

179. Mr Blair agreed to a discussion of Iraq in Cabinet, which took place on 7 March.

180. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 28 February that he would be talking to President Bush about the next phase in the war against terrorism. The main decisions, including on Iraq, needed to be properly thought through and were some way off. The Cabinet should discuss the next phase when the Foreign Secretary returned.[56]

181. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr David Blunkett, the Home Secretary, had referred to "the unsettling speculation and said a lot of people had difficulty with Rumsfeld" [Mr Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense].[57] Mr Blair had said President "Bush was in charge, not Rumsfeld".

182. Lord Wilson of Dinton told the Inquiry that Mr Blunkett and Mr Robin Cook, the Leader of the House of Commons and President of the Council, had pressed for the discussion.[58] He could not recall what had prompted them but observed: "I would guess it was because the newspapers were full of stories."

Government statements on the need to deal with the threat from Iraq

183. From late February 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Straw began publicly to argue that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with.

184. Mr Blair discussed Iraq and other issues with President Bush on 28 February.[59]

185. Mr Blair reported the tenor of his discussions at the Progressive Governance Summit in Stockholm and that some individuals had been less hostile in private than in public. The record stated that Mr Blair understood that no plans had reached the President's desk.

186. Iraq would be discussed at their meeting in April in Crawford.

187. Before the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Australia, Mr Blair gave an interview to the Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) on 28 February in which he stated that he agreed with President Bush "very strongly that weapons of mass destruction represent a real threat to world stability"; and that: "Those who are engaged in spreading weapons of mass destruction are engaged in an evil trade and it is important that we make sure that we have taken action in respect of it."

188. Mr Blair also stated that: "The accumulation of weapons of mass destruction by Iraq poses a threat, not just to the region but to the wider world." President Bush was "absolutely right to raise it".[60]

189. Asked if Britain was prepared to use force against Iraq, Mr Blair said:

> "When we're ready to take action, then we'll announce it. It is a real issue. It is a real threat. How we deal with it is an open matter."

190. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had given an interview for ABC which was “very forward on Iraq and pro GWB [President Bush]. He had decided that was the best position to adopt to gain influence.”[61]

191. The Telegraph the following day reported that Mr Blair had “stepped up his rhetoric against Saddam Hussein”, and that his remarks were the “strongest support yet” for President Bush’s “tough line”. It was “seen as an attempt to prepare the British public for a second phase in the war against terrorism”.[62]

192. On 3 March, Mr Blair was reported to have told Channel Nine in Australia:

> “We know they [Iraq] are trying to accumulate … weapons of mass destruction, we know he’s prepared to use them. So this is a real issue but how we deal with it, that’s a matter we must discuss.”[63]

193. Mr Blair was also reported to have argued that the lessons of 11 September meant that such threats must be tackled; and that “if we don’t act we will find out too late the potential for destruction”.

194. Introducing a debate in the House of Commons on 4 March, on the Government’s policy towards countries supporting international terrorism, in particular Syria, Iran and Iraq, Mr Jim Murphy (Labour) stated that Iraq had a history of support for terrorist organisations and had:

> “More recently … again assumed a high profile, taking centre stage in world politics. It is now absolutely clear in the wider sense of global and regional security that Iraq must act. Saddam Hussein, newly armed with an improved weapons of mass destruction capability, is a threat not only to his own people and his neighbours, but to international security. The United Kingdom, along with its allies, is rightly considering action, but I firmly believe that we must also publish whatever evidence we can, notwithstanding the lack of observers on the ground.
> “There is evidence of the increased viability and range of Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction, and we need to persuade not only the House but the British public and world opinion – especially Arab opinion that, because of the threat posed by Saddam to his neighbours and to world security, we may, unfortunately, be left with no alternative as an international community but to act, in more than a diplomatic sense …”[64]

195. Responding to Mr Murphy, Mr Ben Bradshaw, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, encouraged Mr Murphy “and other Members who support the Government on this issue" to make their views known in a debate on Iraq which would take place on 6 March.[65]

196. Mr Bradshaw stated that the UK's "European allies very much share our concern that Iraq should comply fully with its obligations under the United Nations resolutions to allow weapons inspectors back into that country without any conditions attached". If Iraq failed to do that, the international community would:

> "… face some very difficult decisions. Those who oppose in principle any talk of a military response against countries such as Iraq in such circumstances need to say how they would deal with rogue states determined to acquire weapons of mass destruction and use them on their neighbours and elsewhere."[66]

197. In an article published on 5 March, Mr Straw stated that if Saddam Hussein refused to co-operate with weapons inspection, he would have to live with the consequences.

198. Mr Straw wrote an article, published in The Times on 5 March, stating:

> "The stalemate between the United Nations and Iraq cannot go on for ever. For more than a decade, Britain and the United States have led the UN's efforts to protect Iraq's neighbours from aggression and protect the world from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.
> "Iraq persistently flouts the authority of the UN Security Council and international law …
> "The threat from Iraq is not receding. Unique among the world tyrants, Saddam has both the ruthlessness and capability to employ weapons of mass destruction."[67]

199. "The international community's most pressing demand" was that Iraq should allow UN officials to inspect its weapons programmes.

200. The article concluded:

> "We cannot allow Saddam to hold a gun to the heads of his own people, his neighbours and the world for ever. Intense diplomatic efforts will continue, and I hope they will achieve our aim of removing the threat which Iraq's weapons of mass destruction pose to humanity. But if he refuses to open his weapons programmes to proper international inspection, he will have to live with the consequences.

201. The details provided by Mr Straw about Iraq’s programmes are addressed in Section 4.1.

202. A briefing paper prepared at Mr Straw’s request was sent to members of the Parliamentary Labour Party and to the members of Cabinet. That described Iraq as a threat to the international community and its WMD programmes as “massive”.

203. A briefing paper on Iraq was prepared at Mr Straw’s request by his Special Adviser, Dr Michael Williams.[68]

204. The paper provided more detail on the arguments for addressing the Iraqi regime as “a demonstrable threat to the stability of the region”, which Mr Straw had set out in his article in The Times, including the key elements of the strategy of containment, Iraq’s failure to comply with most of the 27 obligations imposed in UN resolutions, and criticism of Iraq’s “notorious” human rights record.[69]

205. In response to the question: “Are you preparing for military action against Iraq?”, the paper stated:

> “We cannot ignore the threat Iraq poses to the international community through its massive programme of development of weapons of mass destruction.”

206. The statements in Dr Williams’ paper on Iraq’s WMD, in particular the accuracy of the statement that Iraq had the potential to develop a crude nuclear device in about five years if its programmes remained “unchecked”, are addressed in Section 4.1.

207. Mr Straw’s Private Office signed a letter to members of Cabinet on 6 March, suggesting that they might find the briefing paper on Iraq, which had been prepared for the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP), “useful background”.[70]

208. On 6 March, Mr Blair published an article setting out why Iraq was still a threat to the UK.

209. An article by Mr Blair, ‘Why Saddam is still a threat to Britain’, was published in the Daily Express on 6 March, in which Mr Blair wrote that “we now have to face the fact that there are irresponsible states which either have, or are actively seeking, biological, chemical and nuclear weapons”.[71] That was a threat which President Bush had “rightly highlighted” in his State of the Union speech on 29 January.

210. In relation to the threat posed by Iraq, Mr Blair wrote:

- We “know … from his own history that Saddam Hussein … has mass destruction weapons and will use them …”

- The UN had "demanded" in 1991 "that its representatives should be allowed into Iraq to dismantle his weapons of mass destruction and ensure he did not replace them" because Saddam had "used chemical weapons repeatedly against Iranian soldiers", and had used them "against his own citizens when he attacked Kurds in northern Iraq".
- The UN weapons inspectors had "discovered and destroyed thousands of chemical and biological weapons, including thousands of litres of anthrax and 48 missiles" before they had been "kicked out".
- The inspectors were "convinced" that Saddam Hussein had "hidden other deadly arsenals and the plants to manufacture more" but could not track them down because of "almost daily obstruction".
- It was important to "remain vigilant" about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. If he was not restrained, "a volatile situation in the region could easily become a world crisis".
- The fact that Saddam Hussein had been contained "for so long" did not mean the threat had gone away, he was "continuing his chemical and biological weapons programmes and … the long-range missiles to deliver them".

211. Mr Blair concluded:

> "How we act is a matter for discussion … [I]t is in the interest of all to face up to these threats with determination and resolve.
> "… President Bush will consult widely with his allies. Saddam Hussein would be wise not to mistake this for weakness. He should not underestimate the determination of the international community to prevent him developing and using weapons of mass destruction."

212. The issue of possible UK support for US military action in Iraq was raised in the House of Commons on 6 March.

213. In the debate in Westminster Hall on 6 March Mr Tam Dalyell (Labour) and a number of other MPs, including Mr Menzies Campbell (Liberal Democrat), expressed concerns about the possibility of the UK Government supporting US military action in Iraq.[72]

214. The issues raised included:

- There was a need for Mr Blair to explain the policy to Parliament.
- Force should not be used until everything possible had been done to avoid war.
- Others beside Iraq were continuing to defy UN resolutions and acquire weapons of mass destruction without military action being taken.
- There was little domestic or international support for military action and a danger of a backlash in Muslim states.

[72] House of Commons, Official Report, 6 March 2002, columns 69-88WH.

- Nothing should be done without the full authority and approval of the UN.
- Military action should never be taken without clear and realistic political objectives that were capable of achievement.
- The most immediate cause of instability in the Middle East was the escalating violence between Israel and the Palestinians.
- The need to win the peace as well as war which meant considering a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq before acting.

215. Other speakers were more supportive of military action, particularly if diplomatic routes had been exhausted.

216. Mr George Howarth (Labour) asked if it “was possible to deal with rogue states under the auspices of Security Council resolutions”, and whether Iraq was “a serious enough threat to warrant the type of action that seems to be under consideration”.[73] If the United Nations was “to deserve and continue to enjoy a good level of support”, it was “vitally important that Security Council resolutions are taken seriously and amount to more than mere words on paper”. In his view there could be “no doubt” that Saddam Hussein was “developing weapons of mass destruction of various kinds” and that “our security is threatened by what might happen if no action is taken”. He had “no difficulty” supporting the positions taken by Mr Blair and Mr Straw, including “if it became obvious that an appropriate form of intervention was necessary”. In that event he advocated a debate in which the case would be argued properly. There was “a case for action, but it must be cautious, considered and carefully weighed”, and the House should be consulted before action was taken.

217. Mr Alan Duncan, the Opposition spokesman on Defence, stated:

- Iraq under Saddam Hussein had “refused to acknowledge international norms or its own international agreements”, oppressed its own people, and appeared “intent on developing weapons of mass destruction” that the UK would be “naive” to see as “merely defensive”.
- The policy of containment had been followed “with some success” but it was not enough on its own “to defeat the evil of the Iraqi regime and its weapons programme”. He questioned whether it was “any longer realistic to pursue” containment, and whether the policy was “sufficient to guarantee the safety and security of Iraq’s immediate neighbours and the wider world”.
- In facing the “latent threat” from Iraq, “we should not rule out any course of action”.
- “Conservative Members support the Prime Minister in his determination to tackle the issue and not shy away from it, as some would wish. His full support for President Bush shows an appreciation of the gravity of the issue and we await the outcome of their talks … There is a clear and present danger and we must face it."

- Saddam Hussein should tell the UN that he was prepared to admit inspection teams and prove that was a realistic option.
- Action in Iraq would be "on an altogether different scale" from Afghanistan. And there would not be a rebel force "similar to the Northern Alliance" to take that military action.
- If Saddam Hussein was to be toppled, there was a need to "be certain to win the peace as well as any war". That meant "considering a post-Saddam Iraq" before acting, and considering "reconstruction, humanitarian aid and the massive difficulty of filling the political vacuum left by the regime of a dictator".
- Nor could there be any "support for any form of separation or any breakaway state".
- If, as he believed, the Government had "considered Iraq's long-term requirements" and should be supported, "Those who continue to argue that containment is sufficient must answer the charge of naivety."[74]

218. Responding to the points raised in the debate, Mr Bradshaw stated that there were "no proposals, only speculation".[75] He agreed that everything possible should be done to avoid military action. Mr Annan would be holding talks with Iraq in New York the following day, but Mr Bradshaw said it remained to be seen if Iraq was serious. Saddam Hussein had embarked on charm offensives before and they had come to nothing. Iraq was "a state sponsor of terrorism" but the main concern was "its determination to build weapons of mass destruction and the threat it poses, not just to its neighbours, but to the rest of the world". The UK was actively pursuing diplomacy. In the "hypothetical circumstances" of military action, the legal view was that Iraq was in "flagrant breach" of both UN resolutions and the cease-fire agreement, "which made the cease-fire no longer valid". Iraq was "unique" in that it had used chemical weapons against its neighbours and its own people.

219. Mr Bradshaw added that all the Labour members who had spoken in the debate opposing the Government's policy had opposed the policy in Afghanistan and Kosovo: "They were wrong then, and they are wrong now."

220. During Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) later that day, Ms Diane Abbott (Labour) asked if Mr Blair was:

> "… aware of the growing concern in the country that we may be moving by degrees towards war with Iraq? Does he accept that in the event that British troops are sent into action, there should be a debate and a vote on the Floor of the House?"[76]

221. Mr Blair replied:

> "Of course, were we ever to take action in respect of Iraq, there would be an opportunity for the House to express its views … However … no decisions have yet been taken about any possible action in respect of Iraq …"

222. Referring to Mr Blair's remarks to the Australian media and the debate in Westminster Hall that morning, Mr Dalyell asked a similar question during Mr Blair's statement on the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting. Mr Blair's reply referred to his answer to Ms Abbott, but he added:

> "… it is important … before anyone takes a position condemning it or supporting it [action on Iraq], we see what the Government propose we should do …"[77]

DRAFT PAPER ON WMD PROGRAMMES OF CONCERN

223. On 6 March, Mr Scarlett sent Sir David Manning a draft of the paper which had been commissioned on 19 February, setting out the facts "for public use" on WMD programmes of concern in Iraq, Iran, North Korea and Libya.[78]

224. The draft paper was also sent to Sir Richard Wilson, the heads of the intelligence Agencies, and to senior officials in the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.

225. The substance of the draft paper and its development, including the decision that the document should focused on Iraq and that publication should be postponed, are addressed in Section 4.1.

Cabinet, 7 March 2002

226. The minutes record that Cabinet on 7 March agreed:

- It was important that the US did not appear to be acting unilaterally.
- It was critically important to reinvigorate the Middle East Peace Process.
- Any military action taken against President Saddam Hussein's regime had to be effective.
- On the other hand, Iraq was in clear breach of the obligations imposed by the UN Security Council.
- Iraq's WMD programmes posed a threat to peace; and Iraq's neighbours regarded Saddam Hussein as a danger.
- The right strategy was to engage closely with the US Government in order to be in a position to shape policy and its presentation.

- The international community should proceed in a measured and determined way to decide how to respond to the real threat represented by the Iraqi regime.
- No decision to launch further military action had been taken and any action taken would be in accordance with international law.

227. As agreed the previous week, Cabinet discussed Iraq on 7 March.[79]

228. Mr Straw told Cabinet that "in view of the current media speculation about military action in Iraq, it was important to remind his colleagues of the background to the current situation". President Saddam Hussein had launched "an unprovoked invasion of Kuwait in 1990". Following his defeat in 1991, 27 separate obligations had been imposed on Iraq by the UN Security Council; Saddam Hussein's regime had met only three. The:

> "… regime continued to pose a threat to peace through its development of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the means to deliver them. United Nations weapons inspectors had been forced to leave Iraq in 1998 because they were close to exposing the full extent of … Saddam Hussein's programmes. Iraq's neighbours were concerned about the threat to peace posed by … Saddam … but feared that military action which did not result in his removal would strengthen his position."

229. Mr Straw continued:

> "… sanctions imposed by the United Nations were not preventing food and other humanitarian goods from reaching Iraq. Contracts to the value of $30 billion had been approved under the Oil-for-Food programme … The United Kingdom alone had given £100 million in humanitarian aid to Iraq. Negotiations were … in train to change the sanctions regime so that, with the exception of those military and dual-use goods included on a Goods Review List, all goods could be imported … without the prior approval of the United Nations. President Saddam Hussein's regime had to comply fully with all relevant … Security Council resolutions, including the elimination of all WMD … to normalise its relations …"

230. Mr Straw concluded:

> "No decision had been taken on launching further military action against the Iraqi regime, but it was important to ensure that the British public and international opinion understood the true nature of the threat posed by the regime and the need to respond effectively."

[79] Cabinet Conclusions, 7 March 2002.

231. Cabinet Ministers raised a number of points in the subsequent discussion, including:

- “it was important to distinguish between the campaign against international terrorism and efforts to address the threat to international peace posed by the Iraqi regime’s continuing development of WMD”.
- It would be “more difficult to convince the public of the need for military action” in Iraq than it had been for Afghanistan. “It would be necessary to have a clear legal basis for military action and to convince people that the situation had deteriorated sufficiently to justify military action”.
- “any military action would create new tensions” in the UK, “particularly within the Moslem community. The domestic impact of action would have to be weighed carefully before any decisions were taken”.
- “it would be important to secure maximum international support … before any military action took place. Western policy would have to be carefully calibrated to convince President Saddam Hussein that military action would ensue if he failed to comply with the United Nations Security Council resolutions, without making such action inevitable”.
- The “military action in December 1998 [Operation Desert Fox], while meeting the objectives set out by the Coalition at the time, had boosted … Saddam Hussein’s reputation on the Arab Street. The Iraqi regime was a more formidable opponent than the Taliban regime in Afghanistan”.
- “to isolate … Saddam Hussein” it would be “necessary to make progress towards resolving the Israel/Palestine problem” to avoid accusations that the West was “not being even handed”. “Many people believed” that the US Government was an “uncritical” supporter of the Government of Israel. Mr Blair “could play a key role” in persuading the US to make clear that was not the case.

232. Mr Blair concluded:

> “… the concerns expressed in discussion were justified. It was important that the United States did not appear to be acting unilaterally. It was critically important to reinvigorate the Middle East Peace Process. Any military action taken against President Saddam Hussein’s regime had to be effective. On the other hand, the Iraqi regime was in clear breach of its obligations under several United Nations Security Council resolutions. Its WMD programmes posed a threat to peace. Iraq’s neighbours regarded President Saddam Hussein as a danger. The right strategy was to engage closely with the Government of the United States in order to be in a position to shape policy and its presentation. The international community should proceed in a measured but determined way to decide how to respond to the real threat represented by the Iraqi regime. No decisions to launch military action had been taken and any action taken would be in accordance with international law.”

233. The Cabinet, “Took note, with approval.”

234. In his diaries, Mr Campbell provided more detail of the discussion. The points recorded by Mr Campbell included:

- Mr Blunkett had said "he didn't feel there was much support [for where policy on Iraq was going]".
- Several Cabinet members thought the "real concern" was the Middle East Peace Process.
- Mr Charles Clarke, Minister without Portfolio and Chairman of the Labour Party, said the Labour Party "would support provided the case was real and properly made". In his view, judgement of the UK would rest on success or failure. People "understood" Mr Blair's "position of support in exchange for influence".
- Mr Blunkett also "raised the international and legal basis for action". Support for [military intervention in] Kosovo and Afghanistan had been "pretty overwhelming", but "a military assault on Iraq would carry less weight. It would depend on the role of the UN."
- Mr Cook described Saddam Hussein as "a psychopath" and stated that there was "a fine balance" to strike on military action. Saddam would not listen to Mr Annan unless he believed "there might be military action". Mr Cook wasn't convinced that the [military] action [in December 1998] "had been productive". He "doubted whether it would be worth taking action" if Saddam was "still standing at the end", and Saddam would be "much cleverer than the Taliban". The best way of isolating Saddam would be progress on the MEPP. Mr Cook also warned against allowing the UK to become isolated in Europe.
- Mr Blair had said "people's concern's were justified. 'I do want to assure you that the management has not gone crazy.' What are the dangers? US unilateralism. Bush doing it for the wrong reasons. Lack of progress on the Middle East. Taking action which proves to be ineffective." The UK had to "try to influence and shape US strategy. But we have to try to put ourselves in the right position. Get the weapons inspectors back in … the only thing Saddam responds to was real fear. If we had regime change it would make a huge difference to the whole region."

235. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that it was the most important Cabinet discussion of Iraq he had attended in 2002.[80] It had lasted an hour and he had taken "seven and a bit pages of notes … and Iraq occupied six and a bit pages". Lord Wilson commented that that was not bad "as a full discussion without papers". He had gone "away feeling pretty pleased. I thought 'In my time as Cabinet Secretary I have seen the Cabinet begin to play its role as I think the Cabinet should play its role.'"

236. Cabinet had:

> "… raised all sorts of issues, not political issues particularly, issues about the legal position, about … what would be involved in military action, whether you could succeed … about the importance of the United Nations, about the prior importance of the Middle East Peace Process."

237. Lord Wilson also stated Mr Blair had finished the meeting by saying: "The concerns expressed are justified. The management hasn't gone crazy."[81] He added:

"… those are not the words of a man who has had the authority to proceed on a course which is likely to lead to military action. It is about a Cabinet which has expressed concern … They know that force is an essential ingredient in policy on Iraq.

" … and I think Robin Cook said that again, but the message was … they were worried about the direction the US Administration was going and they wanted the Prime Minister to use his power and influence to focus it on the United Nations, on getting the inspectors back in and on giving Saddam Hussein a real fright to get him to co-operate. They weren't talking about military action … [T]he whole flavour … was, 'Any decisions on this are a long way away' …"[82]

238. Lord Wilson also explained that Mr Cook had made a number of points in January 1998, about the need to be "ready to use force if necessary, because not being ready … would undermine leverage over Saddam Hussein; and … the United States were clear they had legal authority to take action whereas our legal advice was more nuanced … [T]hose are things you could transpose" to March 2002.[83]

239. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that there was "great anxiety about the intentions of the Bush Administration".[84]

240. Mr Straw added that he "would have been fairly circumspect" about his own views in the discussion.[85] He would not "have spilled out all the things that I was saying to the Prime Minister in private", not least because he was "concerned about the matter leaking".

241. Mr Campbell wrote that Cabinet was not exactly divided but there was "a lot of concern" about where policy on Iraq was going. It was not a "row" but it had immediately been briefed to the press as one.[86] The next day the papers were "full of division, threats of resignation over Iraq", which were "untrue".

242. In questions to Mr Cook later that day, Mr Dalyell asked for confirmation that the House of Commons would be consulted before a commitment to military action, not after.[87] Mr Cook responded that Mr Blair had said no decision had been taken, and no one anticipated one being taken in the near or medium future. Mr Cook added:

> "Indeed, there is no timetable or process by which such a decision could be taken. It would therefore be ludicrously premature … to commit myself to what the House may do in the event of a hypothetical outcome that is not expected for many months."

243. Mr Douglas Hogg (Conservative) asked for an early debate on Iraq, the publication of a document setting out "the chief areas of concern in the context of Iraq", and that, in the event of military action outside action in the No-Fly Zones, the House should be given an opportunity to vote on a substantive motion.[88]

244. Mr Cook replied that a decision might never be taken. He added that the areas of concern:

> "… were well known and unarguable. The fact is that the Iraqi regime has several thousand of unaccounted litres of toxic chemicals that would be appropriate to use in a chemical weapon; it has made a considerable investment in developing biological germ agents that could be used in biological weapons; and has proceeded intensively – and appears to be continuing to do so – with medium-range missiles that could deliver such warheads. In addition … Saddam Hussein used chemical weapons …
> "Given that history and the present record, it is entirely proper that the world should take action through every available channel, starting with the United Nations to ensure Saddam Hussein accepts what the rest of the world accepts: no regime should have access to weapons of mass destruction unless it fully participates in international regimes to control proliferation."

245. The following day, an article in The Guardian newspaper reported that, questioned by reporters at his weekly meeting, Mr Cook had:

> "… admitted that 'many people sometimes have contradictory instincts on this. Nobody likes military action.'
> "… also praised the Labour rebels as MPs who include some with 'long and honourable records in opposing proliferation and demanding strong action' against transgressors. That may have been a hint to colleagues that they should not be undermining efforts to keep Saddam nervous about the West’s intentions while efforts are made to re-open weapon inspections.”[89]

246. The article also reported “Signs of real unease” had begun to emerge “last night” about “the perceived hardening of Tony Blair’s opposition towards Iraq”. Officials had described the discussion in Cabinet as a thoughtful and sombre discussion of the options. Downing Street had denied that a Minister had spoken out against the military option.

247. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that, the day after the 7 March Cabinet, reports of the meeting “appeared in virtually every newspaper”.[90] The reports were not very accurate, but they had “caused huge ructions”.

248. Given Mr Blair’s subsequent actions, the question of what Cabinet Members understood they had endorsed is a matter of some importance.

249. Cabinet minutes do not provide a verbatim record of the discussion in Cabinet. Their purpose is to provide a record of the key points made and the decisions taken.

250. The discussion undoubtedly took place against a background of considerable Parliamentary, public and media debate about possible US military action to depose and replace Saddam Hussein and whether the UK would support and participate in such action.

251. In the previous week, both Mr Blair and Mr Straw had made public statements that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with, and Mr Straw reiterated to Cabinet the need for the British public and international opinion to understand “the true nature of the threat posed by the [Iraqi] regime and the need to respond effectively”.

252. The discussion in Cabinet was couched in terms of Iraq’s need to comply with its obligations and future choices by the international community on how to respond to the threat which Iraq represented.

253. Mr Blair and Mr Straw went to some lengths to assure their colleagues that no decisions had been taken and Cabinet was not being asked to take decisions.

254. Cabinet did endorse the conclusion that Iraq’s WMD programmes posed a threat to peace and a strategy of engaging closely with the US Government in order to shape policy and its presentation. But it did not discuss how that might be achieved.

255. Mr Blair had committed the UK to support the US in the fight against international terrorism, but given the absence of evidence of any Iraqi support for Islamic extremists, it is hard to see how that would have applied to US policy on Iraq.

256. There was no discussion of the nature of the strategy for dealing with Iraq. At that stage, Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon were yet to receive advice.

UN talks with Iraq, 7 March 2002

The UN and Iraq held their first talks for more than a year on the possible return of weapons inspectors, when Mr Annan met Mr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister on 7 March 2002, before a meeting with experts.[91]

The talks were described as exploratory and neither side predicted an immediate breakthrough. They ended with agreement to a further round of talks in April.

Mr Annan told journalists that the talks were an effort to prevent a new Middle East war and that he "didn't want to see a widening conflict in the region".

The Iraqis made no specific commitments to co-operate with UN resolutions and posed 19 questions about US/UK policies. The majority were about clarification of resolution 1284.[92]

The Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper'

257. The Cabinet Office co-ordinated background paper on Iraq, commissioned on 19 February, was sent to Mr Blair on 8 March.

258. The existing policy of containment was described as "the least worst option", which had been "partially successful".

259. The paper analysed two broad options, toughening the existing containment policy and regime change by military means, but it did not make any recommendations.

260. The Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper', commissioned by Sir David Manning and co-ordinated by the Overseas and Defence Secretariat, was sent to Mr Blair by Sir David Manning on 8 March, as part of the collection of "background briefs that you asked for", for the meeting with President Bush in April.[93]

[92] Minute Dodd to Manning, 5 April 2002, 'Iraq'.
[93] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 8 March 2002, 'Briefing for the US'.

261. The Cabinet Office paper described the UK’s policy objectives on Iraq as:

> “Within our objectives of preserving peace and stability in the Gulf and ensuring energy security, our current objectives towards Iraq are:
> - the reintegration of a law-abiding Iraq, which does not possess WMD or threaten its neighbours, into the international community. Implicitly, this cannot occur with Saddam in power; and
> - hence as the least worst option, we have supported containment of Iraq, by constraining Saddam’s ability to re-arm or build up WMD and to threaten his neighbours.
> Subsidiary objectives are:
> - preserving the territorial integrity of Iraq;
> - improving the humanitarian situation of the Iraqi people;
> - protecting the Kurds in northern Iraq;
> - sustaining UK/US co-operation, including, if necessary, by moderating US policy; and
> - maintaining the credibility and authority of the Security Council.”[94]

262. The Cabinet Office paper provided an analysis, drawing on recent JIC Assessments, of the existing policy of containment, which it described as having been “partially successful”. The policy had:

- effectively frozen Iraq’s nuclear programme;
- prevented Iraq from rebuilding its conventional arsenal to pre-Gulf war levels;
- severely restricted Iraq’s ballistic missile programmes;
- hindered Iraq’s biological and chemical weapons programmes;
- given some protection to the Kurds and the Shia through the operation of the No-Fly Zones; and
- Saddam was not seriously threatening his neighbours.[95]

263. Despite containment, there was considerable oil and other smuggling; Saddam Hussein led a brutal regime and provided a rallying point for anti-western sentiment, which was a cause of instability.

264. Incontrovertible proof of large-scale activity would be needed to convince the Permanent Five and the majority of the Security Council that Iraq was in breach of its obligations on WMD and ballistic missiles.

[95] Paper Cabinet Office, 8 March 2002, ‘Iraq: Options Paper’.

265. Reflecting the JIC Assessment of 27 February, that Iraq continued to pursue the development of weapons of mass destruction, the Cabinet Office paper stated that Iraq continued "to develop WMD, although our intelligence is poor". There was no greater threat now that Saddam would use WMD than there had been in recent years. Current intelligence was "insufficiently robust" to convince the P5 and the majority of the Security Council that Iraq was in breach of its obligations; the proof would need to be "incontrovertible and of large-scale activity to meet that criterion".

266. The JIC Assessments of Iraq's ability and intent to pursue weapons of mass destruction programmes, and the robustness of their judgements, is addressed in Section 4.1.

267. An improved containment policy would make a sanctions regime more attractive and reduce Iraq's illicit revenues. The return of the inspectors would also allow greater scrutiny of Iraq's WMD programme and security forces.

268. The US had, however, lost confidence in the policy.

269. The Cabinet Office paper stated that a policy to toughen containment would comprise:

- full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions;
- introduction of the revised sanctions regime and a Goods Review List in May as envisaged in resolution 1382 (2001);
- clarification of the modalities of resolution 1284 (1999) with a specific demand that Iraq re-admit UN inspectors with the aim of telling Saddam Hussein to admit inspectors or face the risk of military action;
- pushing for tougher action, especially by the US, against states breaking sanctions;
- maintaining the present military posture, including in the No-Fly Zones, and being prepared robustly to respond to any Iraqi adventurism; and
- continuing to make clear "without overtly espousing regime change" the view that Iraq would be better off without Saddam Hussein.

270. Toughening containment would put pressure on Saddam Hussein. The Goods Review List would make the sanctions regime more attractive. Better implementation of sanctions would reduce Iraq's illicit revenues. The return of inspectors would allow greater scrutiny of Iraq's WMD programme and security forces.

271. Some of the difficulties with the existing policy would, however, still apply. They included:

- Tougher containment would not reintegrate Iraq into the international community as it offered little prospect of removing Saddam Hussein.

- Iraq had progressively increased its international engagement and while the GRL might make sanctions more sustainable, the sanctions regime could collapse in the long term.
- Those states in breach of sanctions would want compensation.
- Saddam Hussein was only likely to permit the return of inspectors if he believed the threat of large scale US military action was imminent; and that such concessions would prevent the US from acting.
- Saddam Hussein was likely then to play for time, embarking on a renewed policy of non-co-operation.
- A “contract with the Iraqi people” would need “some detailed work” to be “at all credible”.

272. The US had lost confidence in containment. Some in the US Administration wanted Saddam Hussein removed. The success of Operation Enduring Freedom (the US military operation in Afghanistan), distrust of UN sanctions and inspection regimes, and unfinished business from 1991 were all identified as factors.

273. The Cabinet Office paper identified two possible types of future regime in Iraq:

- a government led by a Sunni military strongman; or
- a Sunni-led representative and broadly democratic government.

274. The second option would require the commitment of the US and others to nation-building for many years.

275. The paper stated that the UK should consider what sort of Iraq it wanted. It identified two possibilities:

- A “Sunni military strong man” who would be likely to maintain Iraqi territorial integrity. That might allow military forces to “withdraw quickly”. While outside assistance might be “traded” with assurances on WMD programmes and respect for human rights, there would be a strong risk of the Iraqi system reverting to type with a series of military coups until a Sunni dictator emerged who protected Sunni interests and with time could acquire WMD.
- A “representative, broadly democratic government”, which would be Sunni-led but within a federal structure which gave the Kurds guaranteed autonomy and the Shia fair access to government. Such a government was judged to be less likely to develop WMD and threaten its neighbours. But it would require the US and others to commit to nation-building for many years and entail a substantial international security force and help with reconstruction. The paper did not address how a broadly representative government would not be Shia-led.

276. The paper noted that even a representative government could seek to acquire WMD and build up its conventional forces, as long as Iran and Israel retained their WMD and conventional armouries.

277. The Cabinet Office paper stated that the only certain means to remove Saddam Hussein and his elite was to invade and impose a new government. That would be a new departure which would require the construction of a coalition and a legal justification.

278. Examining the internal position in Iraq, the paper stated:

- "In the current circumstances, a military revolt or coup is a remote possibility."
- "Unaided, the Iraqi opposition is incapable of overthrowing the regime. The external opposition is weak, divided and lacks domestic credibility. The predominant group is the Iraqi National Congress (INC) … The other major group, the Iraqi National Accord (INA) espouses moderate Arab socialism and is led by another Shia, Ayad Allawi. Neither group has a military capability, and both are badly penetrated by Iraqi intelligence …"
- "The internal opposition is small and fractured on ethnic and sectarian grounds. There is no effective Sunni-Arab opposition. There are 3-4m Kurds in northern Iraq … divided between two main parties, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) and the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP). These groups have an interest in preserving the status quo, and are more interested in seeking advantage over the other than allying against Saddam …"
- "The Kurds do not co-operate with the Shia-Arabs who form 60 percent of the population … Most Shia would like to have a greater say in Iraqi government, but not necessarily control: they do not want secession, Islamic autonomy or Iranian influence."

279. Three options for achieving regime change by military means were identified, which were described as "a new departure which would require the construction of a coalition and a legal justification". Those were:

- Covert support to opposition groups, internal revolt by the Kurds and Shia, and the defection, or at least acquiescence, of large sections of the Army.
- An air campaign providing overt support to opposition groups, leading to a coup or uprising. Pressure on the regime could be increased by massing ground and naval forces and threatening a land invasion.
- A full-scale ground offensive to destroy Saddam Hussein's military machine and remove him from power. An invasion would need to be preceded by a major air offensive to soften up Iraq's defences and be sufficient to pose a credible threat to Baghdad to persuade members of the Sunni military elite that their survival was better served by deserting to the coalition than staying loyal to Saddam. That would require fewer forces than Operation Desert Storm because Iraqi forces were considerably weaker than they had been in 1991. The paper added: “The greater investment of western forces, the greater our control of Iraq’s future, but the greater the cost and the longer we would need to stay. The only certain means to remove Saddam and his elite is to invade and impose a new government, but this could involve nation building over many years.” For logistical reasons, a ground campaign would not be feasible until autumn 2002.

280. The three options were not “mutually exclusive”. The first had a very low prospect of success and the second had no guarantee of success, but either or both would be “natural precursors” to the third.

281. While bases in only a few countries would be essential for a successful invasion, a wider and durable international coalition would be advantageous for both military and political reasons. Securing moderate Arab support would be greatly assisted by the promise of a quick and decisive campaign, and credible action by the US to address the MEPP.

282. Any coalition would need much tending over the difficult months of preparation:

“Iran, fearing further US encirclement and that it will be invaded next, will be prickly but is likely to remain neutral. With his regime in danger, Saddam could use WMD, either before or during an invasion. Saddam could also target Israel as he did during the Gulf war. Restraining Israel will be difficult. It could try to pre-empt a WMD attack and has certainly made clear that it would retaliate. Direct Israeli military involvement in Iraq would greatly complicate coalition management and risk sparking conflict more widely.”

283. The paper stated:

“At this stage we need to wait and see which options or combination of options may be favoured by the US Government.”

284. No legal justification for an invasion currently existed.

285. The Cabinet Office paper stated:

“A legal justification for invasion would be needed. Subject to Law Officers advice, none currently exists. This makes moving quickly to invade very difficult. We should therefore consider a staged approach, establishing international support, building up the pressure on Saddam, and developing military plans. There is a lead time of about 6 months to a ground offensive.”

286. A separate paper prepared by FCO Legal Advisers, ‘Iraq: Legal Background’, circulated as an annex to the Cabinet Office paper, set out the general legal background,

Iraq's obligations in the relevant Security Council resolutions, and the potential difficulties in relying in 2002 on existing resolutions to support the further use of force.[96]

287. As well as examining the legal base for the No-Fly Zones, the Security Council resolutions relevant to the sanctions regime and resolution 1284 which had established UNMOVIC, the FCO addressed three possible bases under international law whereby the use of force could be authorised in relation to the circumstances of Iraq. It stated that two of the bases – self-defence and humanitarian intervention – were not applicable at that time.

288. The third potential legal base was the possibility that the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 (1990) could be revived. That had happened in the past, most recently when Iraq refused to co-operate with the UNSCOM in 1997 and 1998. A series of Security Council resolutions had condemned Iraq.

289. Resolution 1205 (1998) had condemned Iraq's decision to end all co-operation with UNSCOM as a "flagrant violation" of Iraq's obligations under resolution 687 (1991), and restated that effective operation of UNSCOM was essential for the implementation of that resolution. In the UK's view, that had had the effect of reviving the authorisation to use force in resolution 678.

290. In a letter to the President of the Security Council in 1998, the UK had "stated that the objective of Operation Desert Fox was to seek compliance by Iraq with the obligations laid down by the Council, that the operation was undertaken only when it became apparent that there was no other way of achieving compliance by Iraq, and that the action was limited to what was necessary to secure this objective".[97]

291. The revival argument and the UK's position during the 1990s are set out in Section 5.

292. The FCO drew attention to potential difficulties in relying on existing Security Council resolutions to support further use of force in 2002:

> "The more difficult issue is whether we are still able to rely on the same legal base for the use of force more than three years after the adoption of resolution 1205. Military action in 1998 (and on previous occasions) followed on from specific decisions of the Council; there has now not been any significant decision by the Council since 1998. Our interpretation of resolution 1205 was controversial anyway; many of our partners did not think the legal basis was sufficient as the authority to use force was not explicit. Reliance on it now would be unlikely to receive any support.”[98]

293. The FCO also identified a difference in the view of the UK and US about the role of the Security Council in determining any breach of the cease-fire enshrined in resolution 687 (1991). It stated:

“As the cease-fire was proclaimed by the Council … it is for the Council to assess whether any breach of those obligations has occurred. The US have a rather different view: they maintain that the assessment of a breach is for individual Member States. We are not aware of any other State which supports this view.”

294. In relation to the possible legal grounds for the use of force set out in the FCO note, Sir Michael Wood, the FCO Legal Adviser from 1999 to 2006, told the Inquiry:

“I think the legal position was pretty straightforward and pretty uncontroversial. The first possible basis would be self-defence and it was clear to all the lawyers concerned that … a factual basis for self-defence was not present unless circumstances changed …

“The second possibility would have been the exceptional right to use force in the case of an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe. This was the Kosovo argument, the argument we used in 1999, and also used for the No-Fly Zones. Apart from the No-Fly Zones, it was clear that there was no basis, using that rather controversial argument, for the use of force in 2001/2002.

“So that left the third possible basis, which was with authorisation by the Security Council. There we had had a series of resolutions culminating in 1205 of 1998, which was seen as the basis for Operation Desert Fox … so there was a slight question whether that finding of a serious breach still had some force.

“But I think all the lawyers who looked at it … were very clearly of the view that it was not, and that if we sought to rely on that resolution of some years before, we wouldn’t have a leg to stand on.”[99]

295. The Cabinet Office paper stated that for the P5 and the majority of the Security Council to take the view that Iraq was in breach of the cease-fire provisions of resolution 687 (1991):

- they would need to be convinced that Iraq was in breach of its obligations regarding WMD, and ballistic missiles. Such proof would need to be incontrovertible and of large-scale activity. Current intelligence is insufficiently robust to meet this criterion …; or

- … Iraq refused to admit UN inspectors after a clear ultimatum by the Security Council; or
- the UN inspectors were re-admitted to Iraq and found sufficient evidence of WMD activity or were again expelled trying to do so."[100]

296. If the options for tougher containment or regime change were developed further a "full opinion should be sought from the Law Officers".

297. The Cabinet Office paper concluded that the use of overriding force in a ground campaign was the only option to offer confidence that Saddam Hussein would be removed and bring Iraq back into the international community.

298. That would require a staged approach and the US should be encouraged to consult widely on its plans.

299. In its "Conclusions", the Cabinet Office paper stated:

> "… despite the considerable difficulties, the use of overriding force in a ground campaign is the only option that we can be confident will remove Saddam and bring Iraq back into the international community."

300. The elements of a staged approach comprised:

- winding up the pressure: increasing the pressure on Saddam through tougher containment. Stricter implementation of sanctions and a military build-up will frighten his regime. A refusal to admit UN inspectors, or their admission and subsequent likely frustration, which resulted in an appropriate finding by the Security Council, could provide the justification for military action. Saddam would try to prevent this, although he has miscalculated before;
- careful planning: …
- coalition building: … Special attention will need to be paid to moderate Arab states and to Iran;
- incentives: … guarantees will need to be made with regard to Iraqi territorial integrity. Plans should be worked up in advance of the great benefits the international community could provide for a post-Saddam Iraq and its people. These should be published;
- tackling other regional issues: an effort to engage the US in a serious effort to re-energise the MEPP …
- sensitising the public: a media campaign to warn of the dangers that Saddam poses and to prepare public opinion both in the UK and abroad."

301. The Cabinet Office paper ended with a statement that the US should be encouraged to consult widely on its plans.

[100] Paper Cabinet Office, 8 March 2002, 'Iraq: Options Paper'.

302. The Cabinet Office also provided a paper, produced by the FCO, on the attitudes of selected third countries, which is addressed in the Box below.[101]

Attitudes of selected third countries, March 2002

The March 2002 FCO paper on the attitudes of selected third countries to military action in Iraq stated that countries were more likely to be supportive, “or at least neutral or less hostile” if:

- “some attempt is made to build UN legitimacy, ie a real effort to get the inspectors in; public presentation of the WMD evidence;
- the US are seen to be making a major effort to revive the MEPP;
- (with allies) there is genuine consultation;
- the US show that this time they are serious about getting rid of Saddam and have a plan that will work;
- the economic concerns of neighbouring states will be taken into account;
- they are convinced that the day-after questions are being addressed;
- the campaign has good prospects of being short as well as successful.”[102]

The FCO assessed that, of the Permanent Members of the Security Council:

- France would be “difficult but not impossible to bring on board”.
- Russia would be looking for “an economic quid pro quo (on debt and future business in Iraq)”.
- China’s interest in improving relations with the US “may overcome its traditional opposition to interference in other countries’ affairs”.

The FCO also advised that:

- In the absence of progress on the MEPP, Arab states would have “the greatest difficulties” in supporting an operation perceived to be serving Israeli interests.
- Turkey would want to know that the US was “focused on maintaining a centralised, secular Iraqi government” and would not want to be the only Islamic country supporting the US.
- Jordan could find itself under the greatest pressure if military action went ahead given its economic dependence on Iraq.
- “Public criticism but private neutrality” was probably the best that could be hoped for from Iran.
- Overt Israeli support would be counterproductive.
- In the EU, France and Germany could probably be brought onside “with careful attention from Washington and depending on the degree of UN cover”. Overt criticism was more likely from Italy. Spain did not want an open breach with the US.

303. SIS10 sent Sir David Manning an Annex to the Cabinet Office paper, outlining options for SIS activity, on 8 March.[103]

304. Addressing the options examined in the Cabinet Office paper, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "So that was the two sides of the argument … which side you came down on really depended on whether you thought post-September 11th we had to be change makers or whether we could still be managers. Up to September 11th we had been managing this issue. After September 11th we decided we had to confront and change …"[104]

THE PROCESS FOR PRODUCING THE CABINET OFFICE 'OPTIONS PAPER'

305. The Cabinet Office 'Options Paper' was prepared as a background paper. It contained no recommendation, and did not represent agreed inter-departmental advice for Ministers.

306. The paper was seen by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon and, later, by Mr Brown; but it was not approved by them or discussed collectively.

307. No further cross-departmental analysis and advice on the policy options was commissioned before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush.

308. Following discussions with the FCO and MOD, Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head (Foreign Affairs) OD Sec, had asked Sir David Manning on 15 February for a "quick meeting" to discuss what next on Iraq.[105]

309. Mr Drummond had identified two options:

- Continuing containment by tightening the No-Fly Zones and destroying Iraq's new air defence system; pursuing the revised sanctions regime; and moving towards clarification of resolution 1284, including being prepared to respond militarily if there were major finds or the inspectors' work was frustrated.
- Going "for the military option now". That could involve either "bomb plus stimulate an uprising in the South and/or Kurdish areas", which the FCO did not think would get rid of Saddam, or "bomb and invade".

310. Mr Drummond stated that the revised sanctions regime would have "limited impact" on Saddam Hussein's WMD efforts; and the military option would present legal difficulties.

311. Mr Drummond added:

> “The US position is critical. There is plenty of press speculation and third hand reporting from embassies about US intentions. Probably they do not yet have a plan, and could be reluctant to share with us because they believe we are firmly set on containment. The Cheney visit … next month may be important in gauging opinion. Iraq will no doubt be on the agenda for the visit to Crawford. We are planning a Whitehall meeting in early March. Before then, how should we be trying to get a better handle on US intentions?”

312. In his letter to Mr Webb on 27 February, Mr Ehrman concluded that the issues would “…need interdepartmental consultation soon. We should consider prompting the Cabinet Office to initiate the process.”[106]

313. In his minute to Mr Hoon of 27 February, Mr Webb asked for permission to participate in the process.[107]

314. A minute to Mr McKane forwarding a draft of the paper on 6 March stated: “The paper has been produced in close consultation with FCO, MOD, SIS and the Assessments Staff.”[108]

315. Mr McKane sent a folder of papers “commissioned by the Prime Minister” to Sir David Manning on 6 March, including a draft of the ‘Iraq: Options Paper’.[109] Mr McKane stated that the papers would be discussed in a meeting in Sir David’s office the following day; and that Sir David would “want to consider and discuss [the paper] with colleagues before deciding how to take it to the next stage”.

316. Copies of Mr McKane’s minute and the draft paper were sent to Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Ricketts, Mr Geoff Mulgan, Head of Policy in the Prime Minister’s Office, Mr Scarlett, Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, Mr Drummond and to Sir Richard Wilson’s Private Office.

317. The Government has been unable to find any record of Sir David Manning’s meeting on 7 March, at which the draft ‘Options Paper’ was discussed.[110]

318. A minute to Mr Hoon described the ‘Options Paper’ as “intended to be background reading … (rather than fully worked up policy positions)”; and informed him that the “current text” had not been agreed by the MOD.[111]

319. A minute from Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, recorded that:

- The 'Options Paper', and the (Assessments Staff) paper on WMD Programmes of Concern, had been submitted by Mr Ricketts to Mr Straw on 8 March.
- Mr Straw had asked for a meeting with officials to discuss "all this" and for details of what happened in 1998, "particularly the sequence of events … what was, in Washington's view, the legal base for a strike on Iraq … [and] more detail about the Iraqi National Congress".[112]

320. Mr Straw's comments on the draft WMD paper and his role in its development are addressed in Section 4.1.

321. In late March, as agreed between Mr Blair and Mr Brown, Mr Rycroft sent Mr Brown's Private Office a copy of the "latest version" of the Cabinet Office 'Options Paper' and the draft paper for publication on WMD "strictly for the Chancellor personally".[113]

322. The letter also drew Mr Brown's attention to:

- the JIC Assessment of 27 February, 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight';[114] and
- the CIG Assessment of 15 March, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'.[115]

323. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that the papers were "designed to prepare the Prime Minister for discussions with the President".[116]

324. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that he had not been directly involved in the production of the 'Options Paper'; his focus had been on the implications of 9/11, and "there wasn't really a great deal of capacity certainly inside the Secretariat to think seriously about Iraq".[117]

325. Mr McKane stated that, by that time it had been "clear that the US Government is shifting its sights towards Iraq and that the policy we had adopted in the spring of the previous year is not really producing the results that had been hoped for it".[118] The 'Options Paper' did not "express an opinion on whether we should stick with containment or a tougher form of containment or should start to shift more towards looking at regime change and military intervention".

326. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that the Cabinet Office ‘Options Paper’:

> “… was prepared in the same kind of way as the previous one; that is a framework for the paper was produced and different elements were commissioned from different Whitehall departments … It went through a number of drafts and was finalised in early March.”[119]

327. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that the initiative for the Cabinet Office paper had arisen from a discussion he had had with Mr McKane; and that it was “just a contingency”.[120]

328. Lord Wilson could not remember the precise origins of the paper:

> “All I can tell you now is that the idea of this paper was raised … and … I thought it was timely … We had not been looking at Iraq for a while. We used to do regular reviews of policy on Iraq and I thought it was about time we did another … I am not sure if No.10 knew or not …”[121]

329. Later in the hearing, Lord Wilson added:

> “Ever the optimist, I had rather hoped we would show the options paper to the Prime Minister or to No.10 … and get a meeting of DOP on it. Forlorn hope. I asked after a while … and I had been told that it had been wrapped up in the briefing for Crawford.”[122]

330. The Inquiry sought additional evidence from the two members of Mr McKane’s staff who had written the Cabinet Office paper. They were asked about the process for producing the paper, the basis for the judgements made, and what changes were made as a result of Sir David Manning’s meeting and who was responsible for the advice that led to those changes.

331. In a statement for the Inquiry, Mr Drummond wrote: “From 9/11 until February 2002, Afghanistan and other post 9/11 counter terrorism issues took a higher priority than Iraq in the Secretariat’s work.”[123] Mr McKane had handed over responsibility for co-ordination of policy on Iraq to him around the end of 2001.

332. Describing the production of the paper, Mr Drummond wrote that, by mid-February, Mr Blair had been expected to have “a preliminary discussion” on Iraq during his meeting with President Bush in early April. Mr Drummond’s recollection was that “the Secretariat had offered to produce an options paper as background”. The paper had to be prepared quickly in time for Mr Blair’s return from the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting which ended on 5 March.

333. Drafts were commissioned at a meeting on 21 February from the:

- FCO on policy objectives towards Iraq and the wider region, a tightened policy of containment, and legal advice on regime change;
- MOD on the military options for regime change; and
- SIS on possible successor regimes.

334. A draft paper had been circulated on 28 February for a discussion on 1 March and a further draft on 5 March for discussion the same day.

335. Mr Drummond had chaired the two discussions but he was unable to recall them in any detail and the files did not contain records of the contributions or what was discussed:

> "The paper clearly drew on the JIC and Assessments Staff judgements about the likelihood of Saddam having WMD and that his regime was unlikely to be removed by internal opposition … There was debate about continuing containment and that is recorded in the paper as an option, before considering regime change and the options for how that could be achieved."

336. Mr Drummond added:

> "As a background paper, no recommendations were made and … it was submitted as being in close consultation with FCO, MOD, SIS and the Assessment Staff rather than agreed word for word with them."

337. After Sir David Manning's meeting on 7 March, Mr Drummond had "made some changes … after further consultation" with the FCO, MOD and SIS, which "covered the difficulty of identifying successor regimes, that it was unlikely Iraq would disintegrate", and changes clarifying the legal advice.

338. Mr Drummond concluded:

> "At the time of drafting, we expected this paper to be the first of several that would help Ministers to reach conclusions on policy towards Iraq and hoped that there would be discussion with them."

339. In his statement, Mr Tom Dodd, who was a desk officer in OD Sec, wrote that he was the principal drafter of the paper.[124] He made similar points to Mr Drummond about the process, with more detail of the individuals and Departments with whom Mr Dodd had held bilateral discussions.

340. The judgements in the paper "drew on the collective wisdom of the time, informed by JIC judgements of the state of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein". The policy judgements had been "formulated in the first instance" by himself and Mr Drummond, then “endorsed or mutated in group discussion”. Sir David Manning had suggested some changes to the draft paper, but “they were not major”.

341. Mr Dodd remembered:

> “… spending some time debating as a group the final wording of the statement ‘the use of overriding force in a ground campaign is the only option that we can be confident will remove Saddam and bring Iraq back into the international community’.”

Lord Goldsmith’s request to be kept informed

342. Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, asked in early March to be involved in Ministerial thinking about Iraq as policy was being formulated not just to be asked for his advice at the last minute.

343. On 8 March, Mr Paul Berman, a member of the Attorney General’s Office, contacted the Cabinet Office to say that Lord Goldsmith had seen the previous week’s Cabinet Conclusions and would hope to be involved in Ministerial thinking about Iraq as policy was being formulated rather than be consulted formally only at the last minute.[125]

344. Mr McKane, explained to Mr Berman that Mr Blair had made clear to Cabinet that decisions on military action were not imminent; and that it was “well understood” that the Attorney General would need to be “properly engaged at the right time” but that was “most unlikely to be before the Prime Minister’s meeting with President Bush”.[126]

345. Mr McKane advised Sir David Manning that he thought there was:

> “… a good case for engaging the Attorney General in a discussion, so that he understands the options and the policy background, before he is asked formally for advice. Intriguingly Paul Berman said that the Attorney General did not rule out justification for military action based on Article 51 (self defence) but would certainly want to be assured that the alternatives (UN Security Council resolutions) had been thoroughly explored in the first instance.”

346. Sir David Manning replied to Mr McKane: “I think we should engage the Attorney after the Texan [Crawford] summit.”[127]

347. In a minute to Lord Goldsmith, Mr Berman recorded that he had told Mr McKane that Lord Goldsmith:

> “… wanted to be in a position to engage constructively with this issue. This meant keeping you in the loop from a very early stage, as policy was being formulated, so that your advice could be factored into the development of different options. It would not be helpful for you, or Ministerial colleagues, if you were presented at the last moment with a request for a 'yes or no' answer. You [were] always available to discuss these matters with Ministerial colleagues."[128]

348. Mr Berman also wrote that he had "recalled (and Mr McKane agreed) that the legal basis for the use of force in 1998 had been very difficult and contentious. Any proposed recourse to the inherent right of self-defence would also be far from straightforward."

349. Mr Berman had contacted Mr Michael Wood, the FCO Legal Adviser, who told him that a policy paper had already been submitted to No.10 but he (Mr Wood) could not send Mr Berman a copy. Mr Wood had provided a copy of the FCO paper ('Iraq: Legal background'). Mr Berman had "underlined to Mr Wood the importance of ensuring that LSLO [Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers] was fully kept in … the loop – in relation to the development of policy as well as any comments on the legal issues".

Discussions with the US Administration, March 2002

MR BLAIR'S MEETING WITH VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY, 11 MARCH 2002

350. The FCO briefing for Mr Blair's meeting with Vice President Cheney suggested that:

- Mr Blair should state that the UK supported the US objective of regime change in Iraq.
- It would be important to alert a sceptical world to the threat posed by Iraq.

351. The FCO briefing for Mr Blair's meeting with Vice President Cheney covered a range of issues but Iraq was identified as:

"… the main issue, including for the media given speculation that the US are moving towards early decisions on military action … This will … be an important opportunity … to get a feel for where the debate in Washington stands and what options are emerging."[129]

352. The FCO suggested that the key messages for Mr Cheney on Iraq were:

- "In complete agreement on objective. World a better place without Saddam in power. Need to ratchet up the pressure on Iraq."
- "Containment policy has had some success … Climate post 11 September could provide opportunities for enhanced containment, but cannot bring about regime change."

[128] Minute Berman to Attorney General, 11 March 2002, 'Iraq'.
[129] Letter McDonald to Rycroft, 8 March 2002, 'US Vice President's Call on the Prime Minister, 11 March'.

- “Military action requires key allies, particularly in the region, to be on board. That is why we see continuing with the UN route – i.e. ratcheting up pressure on Iraq to comply with UN resolutions and allow weapons inspectors back in as a necessary precursor. We doubt Saddam will co-operate but we must be seen to have tried.”
- “Also essential to alert sceptical world to the WMD threat … We are working on evidence paper.”
- “Meanwhile … should continue our efforts to get GRL implemented – will remind international community that our quarrel is not with the Iraqi people.”
- “… Introduction of revised sanctions regime will send an important signal of Security Council unanimity. Thereafter focus will be on clarification of UNSCR 1284. We should use this to put pressure on Saddam to readmit inspections.”
- “Consistent message we are getting from region and beyond is that if it is decided to launch military action, that action must succeed in removing Saddam, otherwise we will be worse off than we are now.”
- “Issues arising from regime change on which I would welcome your thoughts:
    - Assessment of Iraqi Opposition …
    - Require serious movement on MEPP to give us space in which to act;
    - Day after issues loom large. Territorial integrity of Iraq important. Likely replacement for Saddam – another Sunni strongman. Establishing representative Government would require long term commitment;
    - Genuine consultation and construction of convincing legal basis will be important …”[130]

353. Mr Blair told Vice President Cheney on 11 March that it was “highly desirable to get rid of Saddam”, and that the “UK would help” the US “as long as there was a clever strategy”.

354. That meant building up the case against Saddam carefully and intelligently; putting him in the wrong place over inspections and compliance with UN Security Council resolutions; and thereby helping to convince “international opinion to rally to the idea of regime change” and avoiding unintended consequences.

355. Mr Blair’s approach reflected a deliberate choice that the right way to get close to the US in order to influence it was to offer the UK’s support for its objectives.

356. In his public statement after the meeting, Mr Blair emphasised that no decisions had been taken.

[130] Note FCO, ‘Visit of US Vice President Dick Cheney 11 March: Iraq’, attached to Letter McDonald to Rycroft, 8 March 2002, ‘US Vice President’s Call on the Prime Minister, 11 March’.

357. The record of the meeting between Mr Blair and Vice President Cheney confirms that most of the discussion addressed US concerns, in the context of Al Qaida's pursuit of WMD, about the need for action to deal with the threat posed by Iraq and the potential link between terrorism and WMD.[131]

358. Mr Blair confirmed that "it was highly desirable to get rid of Saddam"; and that:

> "Arguing that this was in the interests of regional stability was probably a better line even than the threat from WMD … The UK would help … as long as there was a clever strategy, and one that worked. This meant building up the case against Saddam carefully and intelligently.
> "… If action was taken suddenly against Saddam now, the international community would ask what had changed. It was important to take enough time to put Saddam in the wrong place over inspections and compliance with UNSCRs. This would play an important part in convincing international opinion to rally to the idea of regime change.
> "… we also needed a proper strategy for dealing with the Iraqi opposition.
> "… We should also concentrate much more on the appalling nature of Saddam's regime.
> "… As far as military strategy was concerned, we must ensure that our forces were equipped to finish the job quickly and successfully … the Arab world … did not want a campaign launched against him [Saddam] unless we were determined to see it through to a successful conclusion.
> "… it was particularly important to guard against the law of unintended consequences … We must ensure that a campaign to bring about regime change in Iraq did not inadvertently destabilise other countries in the Middle East. The Arab street was very angry … We needed to generate a sense that we were determined to promote a peace process that would give justice to the Palestinians … If this problem were not tackled successfully, it would dominate the way that the Arabs thought about the Iraq problem."

359. Following confirmation that the US were considering deploying ground troops and a discussion of whether the US was looking for a wide international discussion, Mr Blair understood that the US would welcome whatever contribution the UK could make, but it was not looking for other help. Mr Blair also said that:

> "… the diplomacy surrounding action against Saddam would be important. We must avoid giving any appearance of having taken a decision and then making everything else fit round it."

[131] Letter Manning to McDonald, 11 March 2002, 'Conversation between the Prime Minister and Vice President Cheney, 11 March 2002'.

360. Mr Blair concluded that “one argument worth stressing” was that we “had paid a terrible price” by failing to act on warnings about Al Qaida and the Taliban:

> “We should not make the same mistakes again ignoring warnings about the international trade in WMD and the threat that this posed to us. We must educate the public.”

361. After the meeting, Mr Blair asked for further advice about the nature and role of the opposition to Saddam Hussein inside and outside Iraq; and for advice on the timetable for trying to get weapons inspectors back into Iraq and their remit.

362. In the press conference after the meeting, Vice President Cheney stated that London was “the first stop on an important trip to the Middle East” and President Bush had wanted him to “check in first” with Mr Blair.[132] Vice President Cheney referred to the “clarity and conviction” of Mr Blair’s assurance to President Bush on 2 October 2001 that the UK would stay with the US “until the last”, and said that he was “[soliciting] the views of important friends and allies” about the “threat of weapons of mass destruction and the important choices that await us in the days ahead”.

363. Asked about the second phase of the war on terrorism and what evidence there was that Saddam Hussein had, or shortly would have, the capability to threaten countries in Western Europe or the United States, Mr Blair replied:

> “Let us be under no doubt whatever. Saddam Hussein has acquired weapons of mass destruction over a long period of time. He is the only leader in the world that has actually used chemical weapons against his own people. He is in breach of at least nine UN Security Council resolutions … He has not allowed the [UN] weapons inspectors to do the job the UN wanted them to do in order to make sure that he can’t develop them … no decisions have been taken on how we deal with this threat, but that there is a threat … is not in doubt at all.”

364. Addressing the conflict between Israel and Palestine, Mr Blair said that the UK would “do everything we possibly can to assist the US in the efforts to bring about some relaunching” of the Middle East Peace Process.

365. Vice President Cheney stated that effective policies were needed to deal both with that conflict and Iraq: “We have an obligation to deal with both simultaneously.”

366. Asked whether, if Saddam Hussein allowed inspectors back into Iraq, that would negate the need for military action, Vice President Cheney replied:

> “… we feel very strongly … that it needs to be the kind of inspection regime that has no limitations on it … so … the outside world can have confidence that he is not hiding material that he has promised to give up.”

367. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the meeting with Vice President Cheney constituted the first "face to face" discussions with the US.[133] Mr Cheney wanted to discuss Iraq with Mr Blair before he consulted Middle East leaders about what should be done in Iraq and "their tolerance … for action".

368. Mr Powell explained Mr Blair's warning about "the law of unintended consequences" as: "If you are going to deal with something like Iraq, you have to think ahead about what might happen … including things you do not expect." Mr Cheney had said "that a coalition was nice, but not essential".

369. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he didn't think that Mr Cheney's message had been a "particular surprise", and:

> "… when the Prime Minister says you have got to have a clever plan … I think he is probably saying that you have got to go back through the UN system … he's clear in his own mind that it's very important to try to keep the international community together …"[134]

370. Sir David added that there was a difference between Mr Blair saying Iraq would be better off without Saddam Hussein and:

> "… saying that he's sympathetic to the idea that regime change is the purpose of the activity. He always made it clear there had to be disarmament. That was what we were looking for …
> "So I think it would be a mistake to assume that this conversation means the Prime Minister has signed up [to an invasion] …"[135]

SIR DAVID MANNING'S DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON, 12 TO 13 MARCH 2002

371. During a visit to Washington on 12/13 March, Sir David Manning reiterated the position Mr Blair had taken in his discussion with Vice President Cheney that the UK "would continue to give strong support to the idea of regime change" in Iraq, but a convincing plan would be needed.

372. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice's discussions were focused on how to achieve legitimacy and international support if the US decided to take military action to secure the removal of Saddam Hussein. Sir David and Dr Rice did not discuss the objectives of US and UK policy.

373. Sir David set out a list of concerns that would need to be addressed if the US wanted allies to participate in military action.

[135] Private hearing, 24 June 2010, pages 27-28.

374. Sir David reported that President Bush wanted to hear Mr Blair’s views before taking decisions, and that Mr Blair would have real influence.

375. Sir David also warned that there was a risk that the US Administration was underestimating the difficulties.

376. In his discussions with Dr Rice on Iraq in mid-March, Sir David Manning recorded that he had “made it clear that we would continue to give strong support to the idea of regime change, but we were looking to the US to devise a convincing plan of action. This would also need to answer the question of who would follow Saddam.”[136]

377. Sir David told Dr Rice that a series of issues would need to be addressed if the US decided on military action against Iraq.

378. One was whether the US “wanted company”. If it wanted the support of a coalition, it would have to address a number of concerns that would be critical in determining the attitude of potential partners. Those were the need to:

- “mount a public information campaign explaining the nature of Saddam’s regime and the nature of the threat he posed”;
- “describe the role that the US envisaged for the UN, and particularly for the weapons inspectors”;
- “provide a convincing plan setting out how a combination of outside military pressure, and external and internal opposition could topple Saddam”; and
- “provide an equally convincing blueprint for a post Saddam Iraq … acceptable to its neighbours as well as to its own population”.

Preparing public opinion and deciding who and what might replace Saddam Hussein were tough propositions.

379. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that the UK “hoped shortly to publish an unclassified paper giving as much detail as possible about Saddam’s WMD programme”. The UK would “share as much as possible” as a way of convincing governments and public opinion of the dangers of Saddam Hussein’s Iraq.

380. Sir David also pointed out the importance of taking:

> “… time and trouble over the UN observers. Demonstrating to international opinion that Saddam was in breach of the UNSCRs and continued to thwart the activities of Blix [Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chair of UNMOVIC] and his team was a crucial part of coalition building … It should not be impossible to persuade moderate public opinion that it was Saddam who was at fault if he flouted the conditions and blocked the inspectors … we should find ways of getting him to speak out publicly about what his inspection team would need if they were to function effectively.”

[136] Letter Manning to McDonald, 14 March 2002, ‘Discussions with Condi Rice on 12-13 March’.

381. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that the Israel/Palestine crisis, "where we were accused of double standards", would be "critical to Washington's prospects of constructing a coalition against Iraq". If the crisis "went on spiralling down, it could lead to a sharp divergence of view between Washington and the Europeans". That would "make the prospect of joint action against Iraq much more problematic". Sir David stated that the "urgent need for a process, and progress, towards peace" was "not an optional extra", it was "integral" to the strategy on Iraq. That would be the subject that Mr Blair would "concentrate on when he sees the President after Easter".

382. Sir David sent the account of his discussions with Dr Rice and other members of the US National Security Council (NSC) to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon's Private Secretaries and to key officials.

383. Sir David Manning sent a separate note to Mr Blair.[137]

384. Sir David reported that President Bush was grateful for Mr Blair's support and had registered that Mr Blair was "getting flak". Sir David had told President Bush that Mr Blair:

> "… would not budge in your support for regime change but you had to manage a press and Parliament and a public opinion that was very different from anything in the States. And you would not budge either in your insistence that, if he pursued regime change, it must be carefully done and produce the right result. Failure was not an option."

385. Sir David wrote that Dr Rice was still enthusiastic about regime change, but there were "some signs … of greater awareness of the practical difficulties and political risks". But President Bush had:

> "… yet to find answers to the big questions:
> - how to persuade international opinion that military action against Iraq is necessary and justified;
> - what value to put on the exiled Iraq opposition;
> - how to co-ordinate a US/allied military campaign with internal opposition …
> - what happens on the morning after?"

[137] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 14 March 2002, 'Your Trip to the US'.

386. Sir David advised Mr Blair that President Bush would want “to pick your brains”. He would “also want to hear whether we can expect coalition support”. Sir David wrote that he had told Dr Rice that if the US:

> “… wanted company, it would have to take account of the concerns of potential partners. In particular:
> - the UN dimension. The issue of the weapons inspectors must be handled in a way that would persuade European and wider opinion that the US was conscious of the international framework, and the insistence of many countries on the need for a legal base. Renewed refusal by Saddam to accept unfettered inspections would be a powerful argument;
> - the paramount importance of tackling Israel/Palestine. Unless we did, we could find ourselves bombing Iraq and losing the Gulf.”

387. Sir David concluded:

> “No doubt we need to keep a sense of perspective. But my talks with Condi convinced me that Bush wants to hear your views on Iraq before taking decisions. He also wants your support. He is still smarting from the comments from other European leaders on his Iraq policy.
> “This gives you real influence: on the public relations strategy; on the UN and weapons inspections; and on US planning for any military campaign. This could be critically important. I think there is a real risk that the Administration underestimates the difficulties. They may agree that failure is not an option, but this does not mean they will avoid it.
> “Will the Sunni majority really respond to an uprising led by Kurds and Shias? Will the Americans really put in enough ground troops to do the job …? Even if they do, will they be willing to take the sort of casualties … if it turns out to be an urban war, and Iraqi troops don’t … collapse … as Richard Perle and others confidently predict? They need to answer these, and other tough questions, in a more convincing way than they have so far before concluding that they can do the business.
> “The talks at the ranch will also give you the chance to push Bush on the Middle East. The Iraq factor means that there may never be a better opportunity to get this administration to give sustained attention to reviving the MEPP.”

388. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he had gone to Washington on 12 March for a “reconnaissance visit” in preparation for the meeting at Crawford, and that the intention was to “take soundings”.[138] The UK had been clear by then that Iraq would be on the agenda and he had wanted to establish “where they [the US] had got to in reviewing Iraq policy”.

[138] Public hearing, 30 November 2009, pages 11-12.

389. Sir David stated that he had also wanted to reflect Mr Blair's "preoccupations" and thinking. He told Dr Rice that if the US "was thinking about reviewing its policy and … wanted the participation of its allies … it would have to address allies' concerns … including obviously our own". He had set out the issues which would need to be addressed. Sir David had also said that, after Afghanistan, the idea of working with a coalition was a "powerful" one.

CABINET, 14 MARCH 2002

390. Summing up the Cabinet discussion on 14 March on the deteriorating position in the Middle East, Mr Blair referred to his planned meeting with President Bush and stated that:

> "… it was necessary to remain close to the Government of the United States and to persuade President Bush to re-engage completely in the [Middle East] Peace Process, not least because it would otherwise be difficult to gather support for addressing the threat posed by the Iraqi regime …"[139]

SIR CHRISTOPHER MEYER'S ADVICE, MARCH 2002

391. Sir Christopher Meyer wrote to Sir David Manning reporting his conversation with Mr Paul Wolfowitz, US Deputy Secretary of Defense, on 17 March.[140]

392. On Iraq, Sir Christopher took the same line as Sir David had in his discussions with the NSC about the actions necessary if the US wanted to build support for military action against Saddam Hussein.

393. Sir Christopher told Mr Wolfowitz that:

> "If the UK were to join with the US in any operation against Saddam, we would have to be able to take a critical mass of parliamentary and public opinion with us. It was extraordinary how people had forgotten how bad he was."

394. The UK was giving serious thought to publishing "a paper that would make the case against Saddam".

395. Sir Christopher reported that Mr Wolfowitz considered the "WMD danger … was crucial to the public case against Saddam, particularly the potential linkage to terrorism", but he saw "Saddam's barbarism" as an "indispensable" element of the case for action.

396. Sir Christopher and Mr Wolfowitz also discussed the potential role of the Iraqi opposition and "well documented" debate inside the Administration about supporting the Iraqi National Congress or a wider coalition of opposition groups. Mr Wolfowitz seemed to prefer the former and "brushed over" Sir Christopher's reference to the absence of Sunni in the INC and argued for replacing Saddam Hussein with a functioning democracy not another military officer.

397. Sir Christopher and Mr Wolfowitz also discussed developments in Afghanistan, including the planned deployment of 45 Commando Group and Sir Christopher’s view that:

> “… the greatest danger in Afghanistan was a slipping back to the conditions which had allowed Al Qaida to prosper in the first place; that the greatest safeguard against this was a continuing visible presence of the US military … for some time to come. Wolfowitz displayed the DoD’s customary distaste for an ISAF-type expansion to other Afghan cities. He thought there was a case for something akin to OSCE monitors in certain regions.”

398. Sir David thought the report sufficiently interesting to show to Mr Blair.[141]

399. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that Sir David Manning had given him a new set of instructions during his visit to Washington in March 2002.[142]

400. Sir Christopher described the new message for the Americans as:

> “Look, if you want to do regime change, and if this is going to require military action, you … can do it on your own … but if … you want your friends and partners to join you, far better that you should do it inside an alliance, preferably taking the UN route.
> “That … was the single most important message I delivered to the US Administration at that time.”

401. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry:

> “… I had to come up with a set of arguments, which … he [Wolfowitz] might find appealing enough not to become a serious obstacle to a policy that would involve the UN.”[143]

402. Later Sir Christopher added:

> “… I think the attitude of Downing Street … was … it was a fact that there was … the Iraq Liberation Act. It was a fact that 9/11 had happened and it was a complete waste of time, therefore … if we were going to be able to work with the Americans, to … say, ‘We can’t support it [regime change]’ … the attempt was made to square the circle … was actually … so to contextualise it, that regime change, if and when it happened, would be with the benefit of the support of the international community in the framework of UN action, quite possibly through a Security Council resolution.

"… What we said was, 'Let's do this cleverly … and that means … go to the UN and get a Security Council resolution …

"… You talked the talk of regime change, but you walked the walk, you hoped, of a UN Security Council resolution permitting the use of force, if that was what it was going to come to."[144]

403. Asked whether at that stage the US Administration was looking at options other than military action, Sir Christopher replied:

"… are you asking me at what point was it clear that war was inevitable? … that's a … hard question to answer. What was inevitable … was that the Americans were going to bust a gut to carry out the mandated policy of regime change."[145]

404. Asked how confident he was at that stage that the UK could influence the US, Sir David Manning replied:

"I wasn't confident, but I thought my job was to try … on two levels. One, on the role I had as an official reflecting the British Government's view that we needed to go back to the UN, we needed to get the inspectors back, the issue was disarmament not regime change. But I also felt very strongly personally that it was the way we should go …

"I wasn't confident it would work … there was a sense that the [US] Administration […] that military force had worked in Afghanistan … This was going to be the global war on terror. This was a 1945 or 1991 moment when they were going to change the world for the better on their watch. It was very tough but it was an historic moment and they would do whatever it took.

"We didn't really have that perception … So I was very conscious that there was a very strong sense of historical destiny at work in the Bush Administration …

"But I was also conscious that there were different views within the Administration …"[146]

405. Commenting on the media reaction in the US to Vice President Cheney's tour of the Middle East, Sir Christopher Meyer advised on 20 March that there had been "no public flinching by Bush et al from tackling Saddam"; and that "No attempt is being made by the Administration to counter the media supposition that it is no longer a question of whether, but when and how to take action against Saddam."[147] Public support for US action against Iraq was strong. A CNN poll earlier that week had shown 70 percent were in favour of military action.

406. Sir Christopher also reported that in discussions between the Foreign Affairs Committee and a range of contacts in the US about “the need to make a solid case to Europeans and others, the consensus response was that once the US showed it was serious, other countries would come on board. But, equally, there was no sense that serious military is action is imminent.”

Preparations for Crawford

FCO advice on the role of the Iraqi opposition and the history of weapons inspections

407. The FCO paper on the Iraqi opposition concluded that regime change led by the external opposition was not a viable option and the most realistic successor to Saddam Hussein would be a senior Sunni military or ex-military figure.

408. The FCO explained that the provisions of resolution 1284 were ambiguous because the P5 had been unable to reach agreement in 1999, and there had been no progress on clarification since.

409. There would be difficulties with securing agreement from Iraq, the US and Russia on its implementation. The US could seek to raise the barrier for Iraqi compliance; Russia was likely to take the opposite view. France might support the UK because it saw agreement on a tough inspection regime as the only realistic alternative to US military action.

410. On 15 March, in response to Mr Blair’s request for further advice following his meeting with Vice President Cheney on 11 March, the FCO sent Sir David Manning a Research Analysts’ paper on the opposition and a separate note summarising the history of attempts to get weapons inspectors back into Iraq.[148]

411. The FCO Research Analysts’ paper on the nature and role of the opposition to Saddam Hussein stated that the UK’s “ability to influence and/or direct the Iraqi opposition” was “reliant on contacts with the external Iraqi community, while the internal opposition remains closed to us”.[149] The paper described the internal and external opposition.

412. The Research Analysts concluded:

> “Various opposition groups … have told us of plans involving a national liberation movement in which Iraqis, backed from the outside, would launch a series of attacks on Saddam's forces with the intention of occupying specific territory. Allied air support would be required …

[148] Letter McDonald to Manning, 15 March 2002, ‘Iraq’.
[149] Paper Research Analysts [FCO], 14 March 2002, ‘Iraq: The Nature and Role of the Opposition to Saddam Hussein’.

"In any case, we do not assess the external opposition to be capable of leading a military operation as outlined above. They do not have the leverage within the military and security apparatus to realise a plan of this kind, and leading oppositionists are not credible figures for a provisional government. Regime change relying mainly or exclusively on the external opposition is therefore not a viable option.

"More realistic calculations suggest that the immediate successor to Saddam Hussein will be a senior Sunni member or ex-member of the Iraqi military …"

413. The note on inspections summarised the history of efforts to get inspectors back into Iraq, examined the future prospects for doing so through clarification of resolution 1284 (1999), and described the remit of UNMOVIC and the IAEA (International Atomic Energy Agency).[150] It described the "main feature" of resolution 1284 as being that it offered Iraq "a suspension of sanctions in return for co-operation with the weapons inspectors, including progress on key disarmament tasks. Resolution 687 (1991) had offered lifting of sanctions "only when the inspectors say disarmament is complete", which Iraq regarded as "an unattainable goal".

414. The FCO wrote that Iraq:

- remained "determined to escape sanctions without fulfilling its disarmament obligations";
- had "never accepted" resolution 1284;
- continued to "refuse to allow inspectors to return"; and
- justified its position by claiming that resolution 1284 was "so ambiguous" that the US could "easily deny" that co-operation had been "adequate".

415. Addressing the prospects for the future, the FCO advised that there was "no independent timetable as such" for the return of the inspectors. The "key" would be persuading Iraq to accept resolution 1284:

"While it is possible that the threat of military action might also prompt a change in the Iraqi position, we have always assumed that the only real prospect lies in clarifying … [resolution] 1284. We recognise there are ambiguities … They are there for a good reason: the P5 was unable to reach agreement. If positions remain as entrenched as they were during … negotiations, there is little prospect of the situation changing, which is why clarification has not been attempted sooner. But SCR 1382 [2001] now commits the Security Council to trying."

[150] Note, [undated], 'Iraq: Weapons Inspectors', attached to Letter McDonald to Manning, 15 March 2002, 'Iraq'.

416. The FCO reminded Mr Blair that the US was “reluctant to go down the road of clarification” because of fears it represented a “slippery slope towards a weaker inspections regime”. No Security Council member had “yet challenged this”, although the FCO predicted that “pressure may increase” following the talks between Iraq and Mr Annan on 7 March. “Nearly all of Iraq’s serious points” had related to clarification; and Mr Annan expected the Security Council “to provide answers” before the next round of talks in April. The US would “not be able to hold out against beginning clarification talks for much longer without appearing unreasonable”.

417. The FCO advised that the UK “would be willing to see some clarification” as long as this did not water down Iraq’s obligations or cut across UNMOVIC’s mandate or rights. That included:

- “Elaboration of post-suspension financial controls, i.e. how much, if any, control of the Iraqi economy, including oil revenues, should revert to the Iraqi government once sanctions are suspended.”
- “Definition of key remaining disarmament tasks”.
- “Clarification/shortening of the suspension timetable”.
- “Clarification of the triggers for suspension, i.e. what is meant by full co-operation with the inspectors.”

418. The FCO advised that the US would “resist strongly any attempt to lower the barrier for Iraqi compliance” and they “could even seek to raise it”. That probably meant that the US would adopt an “extreme position” and Russia was “likely to take the opposite extreme”. The FCO predicted that France might support the UK because it saw a “Security Council agreement on a tough inspection regime as the only realistic alternative to US military action”.

419. The FCO also explained that UNMOVIC had been given “all UNSCOM’s responsibilities, rights and resources”. It had additionally been tasked “with establishing a reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, under which outstanding disarmament issues would be addressed”. UNMOVIC and the IAEA were also asked to “draw up a list of key disarmament tasks and to report on the level of co-operation” they had received “so that the Security Council” could “judge whether the conditions for sanctions suspension” had been met.

420. The FCO concluded:

> “Neither SCR 687 or any subsequent resolutions contain any provision for ending … monitoring and verification, even after sanctions lift. It is our interpretation that ending monitoring would require a separate decision by the Security Council, hence … Iraq could be subjected to special scrutiny indefinitely, until we were completely satisfied that it no longer posed a threat.”

JIC Current Intelligence Group Assessment, 15 March 2002: 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'

421. A Current Intelligence Group (CIG) Assessment of the status of Iraq's WMD programmes was produced to inform Mr Blair's discussions with President Bush. It stated that Iraq continued to pursue a policy of acquiring WMD and their delivery means.

422. A CIG Assessment, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes', was "approved on behalf of the Committee" by Mr Miller on 15 March.[151] (The status of a CIG is explained in Section 2.)

423. The paper stated that it had been commissioned by the FCO "to aid policy discussions on Iraq", but the minutes of the JIC of 6 March suggest it was produced in response to a request from Sir David Manning specifically to inform Mr Blair's discussions with President Bush.[152]

424. The Key Judgements in the Assessment were:

- Iraq retains up to 20 Al Hussein ballistic missiles … The location and condition of these is unknown, but there is sufficient engineering expertise to make them operational.
- Iraq has begun development of medium range ballistic missiles over 1000km … but will not be able to produce such a missile before 2007 provided that sanctions remain effective.
- Iraq is pursuing a nuclear weapons programme. But it will not be able to indigenously produce a nuclear weapon while sanctions remain in place, unless suitable fissile material is purchased from abroad.
- Iraq may retain some stocks of chemical agents. Following a decision to do so, Iraq could produce:
  - significant quantities of mustard within weeks;
  - significant quantities of sarin and VX within months, and in the case of VX may already have done so.
- Iraq currently has available, either from pre Gulf War stocks or more recent production, a number of biological agents. Iraq could produce more of these biological agents within days.
- A decision to begin CBW production would probably go undetected.
- Iraq can deliver CBW weapons by a variety of means including ballistic missiles. Iraq's CBW production capability is designed to survive a military attack and UN inspectors."

[152] Minutes, 6 March 2002, JIC meeting.

425. In the main text, but not in the Key Judgements, the Assessment warned that the intelligence on Iraq’s WMD and ballistic missile programmes was “sporadic and patchy”. It added , however, that Iraq was:

> “… well practised in the art of deception, such as concealment and exaggeration. A complete picture of the various programmes is therefore difficult. But it is clear that Iraq continues to pursue a policy of acquiring WMD and their delivery means. Intelligence indicates that planning to reconstitute some of its programmes began in 1995. WMD programmes were then given a further boost with the withdrawal of UNSCOM inspectors.”

426. The Assessment and the uncertainties underlying its judgements are addressed in more detail in Section 4.1.

Mr Blair’s minute, 17 March 2002

427. Mr Blair concluded that the papers he had been given on Iraq did not constitute a properly worked out strategy and that he would need to provide the US with a far more intelligent and detailed analysis of a game plan.

428. Mr Blair asked for a meeting with military personnel. He did not seek a collective discussion with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and other key Cabinet colleagues.

429. Mr Blair sent a minute on 17 March to Mr Powell, and a copy to Sir David Manning, setting out three points in response to the briefing papers he had been given for the meeting with President Bush:

> “(1) In all my papers I do not have a proper worked-out strategy on how we would do it. The US do not either, but before I go [to Crawford], I need to be able to provide them with a far more intelligent and detailed analysis of a game plan. I will need a meeting on this with military folk.
> “(2) The persuasion job on this seems very tough. My own side are worried. Public opinion is fragile. International opinion – as I found at the EU – is pretty sceptical.
> “Yet from a centre-left perspective, the case should be obvious. Saddam’s regime is a brutal, oppressive military dictatorship. He kills his opponents, has wrecked his country’s economy and is source of instability and danger in the region. I can understand a right-wing Tory opposed to “nation-building” being opposed to it on the grounds it hasn’t direct bearing on our national interest. But in fact a political philosophy that does care about other nations – eg Kosovo, Afghanistan, Sierra Leone – and is prepared to change regimes on their merits, should be gung-ho on Saddam. So why isn’t it? Because people believe we are only doing it to support the US; and they are only doing it to settle an old score. And the immediate WMD problems don’t seem obviously worse than 3 years ago.

> "So we have to re-order our story and message. Increasingly I think it should be about the nature of the regime. We do intervene – as per the Chicago speech. We have no inhibitions – where we reasonably can – about nation-building ie we must come to our conclusion on Saddam from our own position, not the US position.
> "(3) Oil prices. This is my big domestic worry. We must concert with the US to get action from others to push the price back down. Higher petrol prices really might put the public off."[153]

430. Asked to explain his thinking in the minute Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

- The first sentence was asking: "How we would either get Saddam to cease being a threat peacefully or to get him out by force." He had been very open in public about that. The minute was "more about the politics".
- The WMD question was about the changed assessment of the risk and the difficulty of making the case that Saddam Hussein posed a threat.
- The message had to address the nature of the regime and the security threat to command the support of both the right and the left of the political debate.
- The change in the security risk after 11 September was the basis for changing the regime but the nature of the regime was why "we should be proud of having got rid of him [Saddam Hussein]".[154]

431. Mr Blair added:

> "So if September 11 hadn't happened, we would have carried on in the same way frankly that George Bush and I first discussed … in February 2001."

The threat to the UK

432. From March 2002, the Security Service advised that, in the event of a US attempt to topple Saddam Hussein's regime, the threat to the UK and UK interests from Iraq would be limited and containable.

433. Consideration of Iraq's capability effectively to threaten the UK had begun in early 2002.

434. On 22 March 2002, Ms Eliza Manningham-Buller, the Deputy Director General of the Security Service, wrote to Mr John Gieve, the Permanent Secretary of the Home Office, about the "possible terrorist consequences should the US, possibly with UK support, seek to topple Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq".[155]

[155] Letter Manningham-Buller to Gieve, 22 March 2002, 'Iraq: Possible Terrorist Response to a US Attack'.

435. The letter stated that since 1991, Iraq had been "implicated" in "only one terrorist plan directed against a Western target – a planned car bomb attack on ex-President Bush in Kuwait in 1993". The letter reflected the JIC Assessment, of 21 November 2001 (see Section 3.1), that Saddam Hussein was likely to order terrorist attacks only if he perceived that his regime was threatened. It stated:

> "If Saddam were to initiate a terrorist campaign … Iraqi capability to mount attacks in the UK is currently limited. We are aware of no Iraqi intelligence (DGI) officers based in the UK. There are up to […] DGI agents here who report on anti-regime activities. But most of these agents lack the inclination or capability to mount terrorist attacks. So if the DGI wished to mount attacks in the UK it would need to import teams from overseas."

436. Addressing a potential chemical or biological attack, the letter stated that there had been "media stories" during the Gulf Conflict and:

> "… a 1998 scare (arising from a tale put about by Iraqi émigrés) that Saddam planned to send anthrax abroad in scent bottles. Given Iraq's documented CB capabilities, we can anticipate similar stories again."

437. "Most Iraqi CB attacks" had, however, been "assassination attempts against individuals" and there was "no intelligence that Iraq has hitherto planned or sought mass-casualty CB terrorist attacks". If the survival of the regime was in doubt, Saddam Hussein's "preferred option would be to use conventional military delivery systems against targets in the region, rather than terrorism".

438. The letter also described the steps being taken by the Security Service in response to the potential threat.

439. Sir David Omand, Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator from September 2002 to April 2005, told the Inquiry that, in March 2002, the Security Service judged that the "threat from terrorism from Saddam's own intelligence apparatus in the event of an intervention in Iraq … was judged to be limited and containable".[156]

440. Baroness Manningham-Buller confirmed that position, stating that the Security Service felt there was "a pretty good intelligence picture of a threat from Iraq within the UK and to British interests".[157]

441. Baroness Manningham-Buller added that subsequent events showed that the judgement that Saddam Hussein did not have the capability to do anything much in the UK, had "turned out to be the right judgement".[158]

Advice from Cabinet Ministers

CABINET, 21 MARCH 2002

442. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 21 March that he would be meeting President Bush in the first week of April:

> "Their talks would focus on how to respond to the threat to international security represented by the Iraqi regime, efforts to build on the success of the Coalition's intervention in Afghanistan, how to achieve progress in the Middle East Peace process and gathering support for the New Economic Partnership for Africa's Development."[159]

443. No further discussion of the issues is recorded.

444. Cabinet also discussed the deployment of an infantry battlegroup based on 45 Commando Royal Marines to Afghanistan, and the nature of the task it would perform. Mr Blair concluded that:

> "… the troops were supported by the majority of the people in Afghanistan and would not be seeking to occupy territory, there was substantial United States air cover and there were troops from several Coalition partners involved. There was no parallel with the occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. The total number of British forces engaged in operations related to Afghanistan was substantial, but still only one-tenth of the number deployed during the 1991 Gulf War."

445. The deployment of the battlegroup, which was the largest deployment of UK forces since 1991, had been announced on 18 March.[160] That is addressed in Section 6.1.

MR HOON'S ADVICE, 22 MARCH 2002

446. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 22 March emphasising the importance of a counter-proliferation strategy in the Middle East.

447. On Iraq, Mr Hoon advised that the UK should support President Bush and be ready to make a military contribution; and that UK involvement in planning would improve the US process. One of Mr Blair's objectives at Crawford should, therefore, be to secure agreement to the UK's participation in US military planning.

448. Mr Hoon also stated that a number of issues would need to be addressed before forces were committed to military action, including the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy convincingly to explain why such drastic action against Iraq's WMD was needed now.

[159] Cabinet Conclusions, 21 March 2002.

449. Following a discussion with key officials, which is addressed in Section 6.1, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair, on 22 March, stating:

> “The key strategic problem is the spread of WMD – of which Saddam is only one unpleasant dimension. A more active counter-proliferation strategy is required for the region as a whole (for example any Iraqi government will seek WMD if Iran is getting them so our strategy must cover both). On Iraq, we should support President Bush and be ready for a military contribution … [W]e should be involved in the detail before we commit our forces.”
> “… In objective terms, Iran may be the greater problem for the UK … Ironically, we have Saddam Hussein bound into an established control mechanism. There is some substance in the US view that he as an individual is at the root of the WMD risk in Iraq. But any Iraqi government is likely to try and achieve a balance of forces with Iran. I strongly support the parallel campaign by Jack [Straw] to tackle Iran through the IAEA system.”[161]

450. Mr Hoon identified three factors that the UK should keep in mind in considering how to support President Bush:

- The US already has heavy land forces in the region … [and] is planning on the basis that it would take 90 days to deploy all necessary forces to the region; it would take us longer.
- Despite 10 years of searching, no one has found a credible successor to Saddam.
- If a coalition takes control of Baghdad (especially without catching Saddam), it will probably have to stay there for many years.”

451. Mr Hoon wrote that the UK “should support President Bush and be ready for a military contribution” for Iraq. Mr Hoon cautioned that the UK was:

> “… not privy to detailed US planning, either strategically across the region or on Iraq. Before any decision to commit British forces, we ought to know that the US has a militarily plausible plan with a reasonable prospect of success compared to the risks and within the framework of international law. Our involvement in planning would improve their process – and help address our lead time problem. It would enable either CDS to reassure you that there is a sound military plan or give you a basis to hold back if the US cannot find a sensible scheme … I suggest one of your objectives at Crawford should be to secure agreement to the UK’s participation in US military planning …”

[161] Letter Hoon to Prime Minister, 22 March 2002, ‘Iraq’.

452. Finally, Mr Hoon proposed that Mr Blair might raise with Present Bush "the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy, so that we can explain convincingly why we need to take such drastic action against Iraq's WMD now".

453. Copies of Mr Hoon's letter were sent to Mr Straw and to Sir Richard Wilson.

MR STRAW'S ADVICE, 25 MARCH 2002

454. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 25 March setting out the risks which could arise from discussions with President Bush, but suggesting the "case against Iraq and in favour (if necessary) of military action" might be made in the context of seeking regime change as an essential part of a strategy of eliminating Iraq's WMD, rather than an objective in its own right.

455. Mr Straw advised that the fact that Iraq was in flagrant breach of the obligations imposed on it by the Security Council provided the core of a strategy based on international law.

456. The case could be based on a demand for the unfettered re-admission of inspectors.

457. The US was likely to oppose any proposal for a new mandate from the UN Security Council, but the weight of UK legal advice was that a new mandate "may well be required".

458. Mr Straw also stated that, if the argument was to be won, the whole "case against Iraq and in favour (if necessary) of military action" needed to be narrated with reference to the international rule of law.

459. In his meeting on 18 March, Mr Straw asked for "detailed advice from FCO Legal Advisers on the provisions in international law for the use of the kind of force that might be required should the Americans set themselves the objective of regime change".[162]

460. Mr Straw concluded he would write to the Prime Minister to flag up the main issues for Crawford, including a media strategy, and asked for a draft, submitted through Sir Michael Jay.

461. Mr John Grainger, FCO Legal Counsellor in the Middle East Department, advised on 21 March that any action by HMG to assist any group to overthrow the regime in Iraq by violent means would be contrary to international law; and that any use of force with the objective of changing the Iraqi regime would be unlawful.[163] But regime change would not be unlawful if it was a consequence of the use of force permitted by international law.

[163] Minute Grainger to PS [FCO], 21 March 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Change'.

462. Mr Ricketts sent a personal minute advising Mr Straw that:

> “By sharing Bush’s broad objective, the Prime Minister can help shape how it is defined and the approach to achieving it. In the process he can bring home … some of the realities which will be less evident from Washington. He can help Bush make good decisions by telling him things his own machine probably isn’t.”[164]

463. Mr Ricketts added that “broad support for the objective” brought “two real problems which need discussing”. The first was the threat from Iraq on which Mr Ricketts wrote, “The truth is that what has changed is not the pace of Saddam Hussein’s WMD programmes, but our tolerance of them” after 9/11.

464. Mr Ricketts advised:

> “This is not something we need to be defensive about, but attempts to claim otherwise publicly will increase scepticism about our case …
> “US scrambling to establish a link between Iraq and Al Qaida is so far frankly unconvincing. To get public and Parliamentary support for military operations we have to be convincing that:
> - the threat is so serious/imminent that it is worth sending our troops to die for;
> - it is qualitatively different from the threat posed by other proliferators who are closer to achieving nuclear capability (including Iran).
> “We can make the case on qualitative difference (only Iraq has attacked a neighbour, used CW and fired missiles against Israel). But the overall strategy needs to include re-doubled efforts to tackle other proliferators … in other ways … But we are still left with a problem of bringing public opinion to accept the imminence of a threat from Iraq. This is something the Prime Minister and President need to have a frank discussion about.”

465. The second problem was the need to define an “end state” for any military action. Mr Ricketts advised:

> “Military operations need clear and compelling military objectives … For Iraq, ‘regime change’ does not stack up. It sounds like a grudge match between Bush and Saddam. Much better, as you have suggested, to make the objective ending the threat to the international community from Iraqi WMD before Saddam uses it or gives it to terrorists. That is … easier to justify in terms of international law, but also more demanding. Regime change which produced another Sunni general still in charge of an active Iraqi WMD programme would be a bad outcome (not least because it would be almost impossible to maintain UN sanctions on a new leader who came in promising a fresh start).”

466. Mr Ricketts added:

> "As with the fight against UBL, Bush would do well to de-personalise the objective, focus on elimination of WMD, and show that he is serious about UN Inspectors as the first choice means of achieving that (it is win/win for him: either Saddam against all the odds allows Inspectors to operate freely, in which case we can further hobble his WMD programmes, or he blocks/hinders, and we are on stronger ground for switching to other methods)."

467. Mr Ricketts concluded:

> "Defining the end state in this way, and working through the UN, will … also help maintain a degree of support among the Europeans, and therefore fits with another message which the Prime Minister will want to get across: the importance of positioning Iraq as a problem for the international community as a whole, not just for the US."

468. In a personal minute to Mr Blair on 25 March, Mr Straw advised:

> "The rewards from your visit to Crawford will be few. The risks are high, both for you and for the Government. I judge that there is at present no majority inside the PLP for any military action against Iraq …"[165]

469. Mr Straw wrote that making the case that "Saddam and the Iraq regime are bad" was "easy", but there were four areas where there was:

> "a long way to go to convince them as to:
> (a) the scale of the threat from Iraq and why this has got worse recently;
> (b) what distinguishes the Iraqi threat from that of eg Iran and North Korea so as to justify military action;
> (c) the justification for any military action in terms of international law;
> (d) whether the consequence of military action really would be a compliant, law abiding replacement government.
> "The whole exercise is made much more difficult to handle as long as conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is so acute …"

470. Mr Straw advised that the Iraqi regime posed "a most serious threat to its neighbours, and therefore to international security" but, from "the documents so far presented it has been hard to glean whether the threat from Iraq is so significantly different” as to justify military action. Without the attacks of 11 September, it was “doubtful that the US would now be considering military action against Iraq”. There was:

> “… Objectively, the threat from Iraq has not worsened as a result of 11 September. What has, however, changed is the tolerance of the international community (especially that of the US), the world having witnessed on September 11 just what determined evil people can these days perpetrate.”

471. Addressing the difference between Iraq, Iran and North Korea, Mr Straw wrote:

> “By linking these countries together in his ‘axis of evil’ speech, President Bush implied an identity between them not only in terms of their threat, but also in terms of the action necessary to deal with the threat. A lot of work will now need to be done to delink the three, and to show why military action against Iraq is so much more justified than against Iran and North Korea. The heart of this case – that Iraq poses a unique and present danger – rests on the fact that it:
> - invaded a neighbour;
> - has used WMD, and would use them again;
> - is in breach of nine UNSCRs.”

472. In relation to the position in international law, Mr Straw wrote:

> “That Iraq is in flagrant breach of international legal obligations imposed on it by the UNSC provides us with the core of a strategy, and one which is based on international law. Indeed, if the argument is to be won, the whole case against Iraq and in favour (if necessary) of military action needs to be narrated with reference to the international rule of law.
> “We also have better to sequence the explanation of what we are doing and why. Specifically, we need to concentrate in the early stages on:
> - making operational the sanctions regime foreshadowed by UNSCR 1382;
> - demanding the re-admission of weapons inspectors … to operate in a free and unfettered way …
> “… I believe that a demand for the unfettered re-admission of weapons inspectors is essential, in terms of public explanation, and in terms of legal sanction for any subsequent military action.
> “Legally, there are two potential elephant traps:
> (i) regime change per se is no justification for military action; it could form part of the method of any strategy, but not a goal. Of course, we may want credibly to assert that regime change is an essential part of the strategy by which we have to achieve our ends – that of the elimination of Iraq's WMD capacity; but the latter has to be the goal;

(ii) on whether any military action would require a fresh UNSC mandate (Desert Fox did not). The US are likely to oppose any idea of a fresh mandate. On the other side, the weight of legal advice here is that a fresh mandate may well be required. There is no doubt that a new UNSCR would transform the climate in the PLP. Whilst that (a new mandate) is very unlikely, given the US's position, a draft resolution against military action … could play very badly here."

473. Addressing the consequences of military action, Mr Straw wrote:

"A legal justification is a necessary but far from sufficient pre-condition for military action. We have also to answer the big question – what will this action achieve? There seems to be a larger hole in this than on anything. Most of the assessments from the US have assumed regime change as a means of eliminating Iraq's WMD threat. But none has satisfactorily answered how that regime change is to be secured, and how there can be any certainty that the replacement regime will be better.

"Iraq has had no underlying history of democracy so no-one has this habit or experience."

474. Mr Straw also wrote:

"I will talk to you about handling the PLP. But one thing which would help greatly is agreeing that any UK action would have to be endorsed by a substantive resolution of the Commons. There is precedent for this – in the Gulf War. It makes the Government look weak and condescending to its own parliamentary party, to evade a substantive vote. A more messy alternative expression of dissent (on the division for the adjournment) cannot be avoided if there is no substantive vote. The question will also be asked of you – if there can be substantive votes on a trivial issue like hunting, why not on war?"

475. Mr Straw's minute does not appear to have been sent to anyone outside No.10.[166]

476. A minute from Mr Patey states that Mr Straw and Mr Blair were due to meet on 26 March to discuss "amongst other things, Iraq".[167]

477. An undated manuscript note from Mr Powell to Mr Blair suggested that Mr Straw wanted to discuss his advice.[168]

[168] Manuscript comment Powell to PM, [undated], on Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 25 March 2002, 'Crawford/Iraq'.

478. There is no No.10 record of that discussion.

479. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that his recommendation was:

> "… not a route of regime change … [but] not containment.
> "Of course there was debate about whether we should just put up with containment, but the problem with just putting up with containment, not withstanding [resolution] 1409 [adopted in May 2002] was that it wasn't going anywhere … Meanwhile, the perception of the risk had completely changed …"[169]

480. Asked if the messages to the US Administration before 25 March that the UK was prepared to be part of a coalition pursuing regime change had pre-empted his advice, Mr Straw told the Inquiry that his minute to Mr Blair was part of the debate in the UK Government.[170] Part of that was how to handle the US.

481. Mr Straw added that the UK had succeeded in achieving its policy objective when the US was persuaded to go down the UN route "for the sole purpose, not of regime change, but of dealing with, 'The threat posed by Iraq to international peace and security'".

MR STRAW'S CONVERSATION WITH SECRETARY POWELL, 25 MARCH 2002

482. In a conversation with Secretary Powell, on 25 March, Mr Straw was reported to have described the political situation in the UK as:

> "… generally 'twitchy', mostly for domestic reasons. Everyone accepted the case against Iraq but not everyone acknowledged that post-11 September, our tolerance of threats to security had reduced. He explained the need for military action, should it take place later in the year, to be clearly within international law, even if not explicitly endorsed by UNSCRs. He understood American impatience with our approach … There would be a real problem if the objective of military action were regime change. The Foreign Secretary felt entirely comfortable making a case for military action to deal with Iraq's WMD and could even say that the means of meeting those concerns might be regime change, but this could not be the objective. Politically we needed a strategy to swing parliamentary, public and European opinion behind whatever course of action we took."[171]

483. When he saw the record of the conversation with Secretary Powell, Mr Wood reminded Mr Straw that a further decision by the Security Council was likely to be needed to revive the authorisation to use force in Iraq.[172]

484. Having seen the telegram reporting the conversation between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell, Mr Wood wrote to Mr Straw's office to remind him of the advice in the FCO paper, 'Iraq: Legal Background', including that:

> "… we would receive no support for reliance on the 1990 resolution authorising the use of force prior to Desert Storm in the absence of a further decision by the Council (whether by Presidential statement or by new resolution) that Iraq was in flagrant violation of its obligations under the cease-fire resolution.
> "… The Attorney General's advice will need to be sought at the appropriate stage before Ministerial decisions on actions or public statements."[173]

485. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry that was the first of a series of occasions on which he sent such a note:

> "I was obviously quite concerned by what I saw him [Mr Straw] saying … often reports are not accurate. They are summaries, they are short. He may well not have said it in quite the form it came out in the telegram, but whenever I saw something like that, whether from the Foreign Secretary or from the Prime Minister or from officials … I would do a note just to make sure they understood the legal position.
> "This is just an example of quite a few notes, but it certainly wasn't my impression that the Foreign Secretary really misunderstood the legal position at that stage."[174]

486. Sir Michael added:

> "This was quite early. It was before it had got into the bloodstream … of the Foreign Office and others, what the legal position was. So it was necessary just to remind people of what was the accepted view."[175]

487. Asked about Mr Wood's minute, Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "What we were seeking to do – that was just before Crawford – was to persuade the Americans to go down the UN route. There were still a number of views about whether or not [resolutions] 678 and 687 could 'revive' the authority for military action. As is well-known, I had told the Prime Minister that my view was that we had to go down the UN route in any event, but I also had to keep our negotiating position protected publicly, and that was why I used the words that I did."[176]

488. Preliminary discussions on the US and UK interpretations of the legal authorities for the use of force took place at the end of March.

489. In late March 2002, Lord Goldsmith, Attorney General, informed Mr Hoon and Mr Straw that there could be considerable difficulties in justifying the use of force without further action by the Security Council.

490. Lord Goldsmith was seeking to avoid Ministers making apparently authoritative statements before he had been asked to give his views.

491. On 24 March, both Mr Straw and Mr Hoon were interviewed on television and asked questions about the legal basis for any military action against Iraq.

492. In response to a question about whether international law provided a mandate to attack Iraq during an interview on Breakfast with Frost on 24 March, Mr Straw replied:

> “… we have never been involved in any military action in our history since the establishment of the United Nations without the backing of international law and we’re not going to be …
> “We don’t have a mandate to invade Iraq now, no … what we need to do however is to ensure the full compliance by Iraq … with these United Nations obligations … if Iraq refuses to comply … then the position in international law may very well change … Nobody wants military action … at all and the way out lies very clearly in Saddam Hussein’s hands.

493. Later the same day, in an interview by Mr Jonathan Dimbleby on ITV about the deployment of 1,700 Royal Marines to Afghanistan, Mr Hoon was asked whether, if Saddam Hussein did not allow weapons inspectors in or only allowed them in on terms which the US and UK found unacceptable, the UK would insist on having a mandate from the United Nations Security Council or were the existing resolutions enough to validate military action.[178] Mr Hoon replied: “In principle they would be, not least because those weapons of mass destruction might well be capable of posing a threat to the United Kingdom in which case we will be entitled to act in self defence.”

494. Asked whether Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, was correct to say that it was not tolerable to act militarily against Saddam Hussein without a UN mandate, Mr Hoon replied: “well what I am saying is that legally we would be perfectly entitled to use force without a specific United Nations resolution”.

495. In answer to a further question about what kind of necessity there might be to go back to the UN, Mr Hoon responded that would "depend on the circumstances on the ground, the nature of the information we had about the regime and crucially the extent to which Saddam Hussein was or was not prepared to accede to existing … resolutions." Pressed further, Mr Hoon added that it would: "Depend on the context … But as far as I understand the position legally we would be perfectly entitled to use force as we have done in the past without the support of a United Nations Security Council resolution."

496. A minute from Mr Patey recorded that the media were "playing up apparent differences between the Defence Secretary and Foreign Secretary over a legal basis for military action. No.10 will seek to play this down at the lobby briefing today".[179] He concluded that it would be "important not to get drawn in public on the legal position in respect of what are, at this stage, hypothetical scenarios".

497. Lord Goldsmith saw the transcripts of both interviews and wrote to Mr Hoon on 28 March pointing out that:

> "… the Law Officers' opinion has not been sought on the legality of possible action and I have not therefore offered any views on the legal position. The clarity of your statement and the apparently authoritative way it was produced puts me … in a difficult position.
> "I would not want to be definitive until I have had the benefit of full submissions … Nonetheless I think you should know that I see considerable difficulties in being satisfied that military action would be justified on the basis of self defence …
> "I am aware that another potential argument is that the breaches of Security Council resolutions by Iraq would revive the authorisation to use force in … resolution 678 (1990). I would welcome detailed submissions on that argument … but, in the absence of further action by the Security Council, there could be considerable difficulties in justifying reliance on the original authorisation to use force."[180]

498. Lord Goldsmith concluded by drawing attention to the advice of the then Law Officers in 1997, and that he "would of course be happy to discuss this matter with you and Jack Straw at any time".

499. Lord Goldsmith sent Mr Straw a copy of his letter, but it was not sent to No.10.

500. Following a discussion with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Hoon responded on 11 April stating that he had been speaking "in principle" about acting in self defence "if it were shown that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction which were capable of posing a threat to the UK”.[181] He did not think that curtailed Lord Goldsmith’s “ability to offer an opinion about the legal position in due course”. Mr Hoon added in manuscript that he was “sure that we can discuss this further”.

501. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that the interview with Mr Dimbleby had been long and that he had been pushed “quite hard on legality”.[182] He had been “trying quite hard not to answer any questions, and that’s quite difficult”. Mr Hoon added that Lord Goldsmith had not been “particularly concerned about the nature of my legal observation, I think he was more concerned that I might be, in effect, boxing him in when he came to write his own opinion”.

502. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry he had “achieved my purpose of making it clear that I didn’t want to see senior ministers making apparently authoritative statements on behalf of HM Government about the use of force before I had even been asked to express any view of it”.[183]

503. Mr Wood also reminded Mr Straw that a further decision by the Security Council was likely to be needed to revive the authorisation to use force in Iraq.

504. As agreed in Mr Straw’s meeting of 18 March, Mr Wood and Mr Grainger visited Washington on 28 March for talks on a range of subjects, not just Iraq, with Mr William H Taft IV, the US State Department Legal Advisor.[184] They also met Mr John Bellinger III, the NSC General Counsel.

505. The talks included a preliminary discussion of different US and UK interpretations of the legal authorities in various UN resolutions on Iraq for the No-Fly Zones and future use of military force but were not intended to reach an agreed position.

506. The record of the discussions was sent to Mr Paul Berman who sent it to Lord Goldsmith and Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers.[185]

Mr Charles Kennedy’s letter, 26 March 2002

507. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, wrote to Mr Blair on 26 March expressing concern about the possibility of military action against Iraq and arguing that before the UK lent its support for action the Government must be satisfied that there was no other course of action open to the international community.

508. Mr Charles Kennedy wrote to Mr Blair on 26 March "in advance of your meeting with President Bush to express the concern that many feel with regard to the possibility of military action against Iraq".[186]

509. Mr Kennedy wrote:

> "… those of us who believe that the case for fresh military action remains unproven are in no way apologists for a brutal dictator who subjects his own people to ignominy and deprivation, flouts international law, and continues to pose a threat to international security.
> "Military action should never be undertaken without clear and realistic political objectives that are capable of achievement, and always as a last resort after all other available means of achieving those objectives have been explored. I urge you to seek such avenues with the same vigour and determination which you showed in helping to build the international coalition against terrorism …
> "It is axiomatic that those of us who seek to make Iraq fulfil its obligations under international law, should ensure that any action taken to impose these obligations is supported by international law.
> "… there is no evidence to link Baghdad with the events of 11 September. Nor is there any published evidence of the chemical, biological or nuclear capability of Iraq since the withdrawal of the UNSCOM inspectors in 1998, but it would be reasonable to conclude from past history that there is a strong probability that such capabilities exist or at least are being actively pursued.
> "The return of the weapons inspectors … must remain the international community's priority. I would therefore urge engagement with the regime to solicit agreement on access …
> "Before the UK lends its support for action against Iraq, the Government must be satisfied that there is no other course of action open to the international community. I would also urge the Government should seek the views of the elected representatives of the British People in debate and a substantive motion before the House of Commons before any further British forces be deployed beyond present military commitments against Iraq."

Mr Powell's advice, 28 March 2002

510. Mr Powell advised Mr Blair that the objectives for his meeting with President Bush were to "agree sensible plans" on both Iraq and the MEPP; and to "capitalise" on his standing in the US and support for the US Administration.

---

[186] Letter Kennedy to Blair, 26 March 2002, [untitled].

511. In relation to the tactics on Iraq, Mr Powell suggested making the case against Saddam Hussein and then setting an ultimatum seeking the return of weapons inspectors.

512. Mr Powell advised Mr Blair on 28 March that:

> “Your meeting with Bush is an unusually important one and as timely on substance as it is untimely in terms of domestic politics.
> “On substance I think we have two basic aims:
> a) to agree sensible plans for Iraq and for the MEPP. On the former I would not major on UN authorisation or legal base or any of that. I would stick to how we come up with a military and political plan that is likely to be successful; how we get the necessary support; and how we set it up properly, with Afghanistan as the model – we need to make the case against Saddam and then set an ultimatum (in this case return of inspectors rather than handing over UBL). On the MEPP, the US are now engaged …
> b) to capitalise on your standing in the US and your support for the Administration …”[187]

513. Mr Powell foresaw the need: “In terms of positioning” to “wrestle with three important audiences – the PLP, US and Europe – all of whom want to hear different things”. He suggested:

> - Putting Iraq into the internationalist context. Refer back to Chicago …
> - Make the case against Iraq on grounds of the way it treats its own people as well as the WMD threat.
> - Set an ultimatum before we act rather than acting precipitately: we will only act if Iraq defies UN resolutions by refusing to accept the inspectors back in (and it does need to be anyone, anytime, anywhere).
> - Demonstrate we do not have double standards by showing we are persuading the Americans to engage seriously on the MEPP.”

514. Finally, Mr Powell advised on the need to position the Prime Minister’s approach “before, during and after” the visit and suggested that Mr Blair should make it clear that he was speaking as part of Europe as well as the UK: “You are a bridge not a poodle!” Mr Blair needed “warm words from him [President Bush] on MEPP in return for warm words from you on Iraq”. Mr Blair could use the speech at College Station, “to put Iraq into the wider context”.

515. Mr Powell told the Inquiry:

> "I actually put a note to the Prime Minister setting out what I thought we should focus on … This is not Kosovo. This is not Afghanistan. If you are thinking about Iraq, you have to think about it in a different way. You have to be able to put it in a political context. I referred … to the Chicago speech … You need to think about the long term, about the Middle East peace process … and how you'd put Saddam in a … proper framework to consider this sort of action."[188]

516. Mr Powell emphasised that he was not providing Mr Blair with options in his note on 28 March, and others had also given Mr Blair their views. His role was to help Mr Blair to focus before the meeting.

517. Mr Powell added that he was:

> "… talking about how we could influence the Americans … we were trying to replicate what we had done after 9/11 on Afghanistan. We were trying to say to them, 'Don't rush into anything. Move at a deliberative pace and, above all, build a coalition. Talk to people, go the UN route. Don't rush into unilateral action.' We believed unilateral action would have been a terrible thing by America, and we wanted to try and put it in a much wider political context."[189]

518. Mr Powell said that Mr Blair was:

> "… always clear that the world would be better off without Saddam Hussein … from the very beginning … he thought the best way to pursue this, as with Afghanistan, would be to go down the UN route and give Saddam every chance to comply, but, if he didn't, to build a coalition to deal with him."[190]

Sir Christopher Meyer's advice, 1 April 2002

519. Sir Christopher Meyer advised on 1 April that President Bush had raised expectations that the US would take military action against Iraq but questions were beginning to be asked about the risks.

520. Sir Christopher also warned about the implications of the US approach to nation building in Afghanistan.

521. In a telegram describing President Bush as "riding high" on his definition of himself as "Commander in Chief of the war on terrorism" which had transformed his Presidency, Sir Christopher Meyer advised that President Bush needed to:

> "… show if not victory, at least momentum, and he has raised expectations that this means taking the war to Iraq. Until recently, the overwhelming tide of opinion inside the Administration and out, was that the only decision still to be taken on Iraq was how to do it. Now, the question on everyone’s lips is how far Iraq has been pushed back by the Palestinian conflict: by the outcome of Cheney’s tour: and by a longer prognosis for operations in Afghanistan.

“There is no shortage of Bush insiders who tell us that the die is cast for a regime-change operation of some sort this autumn. But there is now a sense that the Administration are for the first time really staring the hard questions in the face: how much international support is needed: what smart options are available to topple Saddam: above all what happens afterwards. There is a doubt among some – no bigger than a fist sized cloud on the horizon – that Iraq might be too risky politically.

“There is no bigger obstacle than the Israeli Palestinian conflagration …”[191]

522. Separate advice from the Embassy to Whitehall analysing recent US polls a few days earlier reported strong support (88 percent) for removal of Saddam as an important foreign policy goal of the US, although only 46 percent favoured using ground troops to invade Iraq.[192] The Embassy concluded that US public opinion was ready to respond to strong leadership: the US had been attacked and:

“… if and when a persuasive case is made for specific action in Iraq as part of the war on terrorism, the American people will be up for it. But for now, it would be unwise to interpret the headline figures as depicting a bellicose and confident US ready to do whatever it takes to rid the world of Saddam.”

523. Sir Christopher Meyer also offered advice on the US approach in Afghanistan, where decisions had been taken:

“… in a very small circle of key officials around the President. Where Rumsfeld (and General Franks) have not been fully engaged, little action has resulted. Many in the Administration recognise that, on the ground, there is a real danger of losing Afghanistan because of a US fear of getting sucked into nation-building. But Rumsfeld has, in effect, blocked all but a minimalist approach.”[193]

524. Sir Christopher suggested that the UK should “vigorously” use the leverage from the deployment of 45 Commando Royal Marines to:

“… push for greater US engagement in international stability efforts … We have proportionately far more ground forces in Afghanistan than the Americans. If we are not careful, the US will try to pass to us lead responsibility for Afghan stability for the foreseeable future. Keeping us on as … lead nation until the end of June is exactly what the Americans wanted from the start."

525. Sir Christopher told the Inquiry that he had advised Mr Blair to focus on three things at Crawford:

- "… how to garner international support for a policy of regime change, if that is what it turns out to be."
- "If it involves removing Saddam Hussein, how do you do it and when …"
- "Above all … get them to focus on the aftermath …"[194]

526. Sir Christopher added that regime change in Iraq did not, at that time, "necessarily mean an armed invasion".

Advice on the economic effects of military action

527. In response to his concern about the impact that high oil prices might have on public support for military action, Mr Blair was sent advice by both the FCO and Mr Scarlett.

528. In his minute of 17 March, Mr Blair had described oil prices as his "big domestic worry"; and that higher petrol prices "really might put the public off".[195]

529. Mr Michael Arthur, the FCO Economic Director, sent Sir David Manning a briefing on the economic effects of military action against Iraq which concluded that: while military action against Iraq would pose some risk to the oil market, it should be containable; there would be unavoidable economic consequences for Iraq's neighbours, particularly Jordan; and economic effects on Iraq itself were inevitable.[196] It suggested that the UK should think about helping northern Iraq.

530. Mr Scarlett responded to a separate request from Sir David Manning for an update on Iraq's oil production, the importance of oil income to the Iraqi regime and the effect of a halt in oil exports on the world oil market on 4 April.[197]

531. Mr Scarlett advised:

- Iraq benefited from both manipulating the Oil-for-Food regime and illegal oil exports.
- It was "unlikely that Iraq would voluntarily cease its illegal oil sales".
- Iraq had halted oil exports under OFF for five weeks in mid-2001 to pressurise the Russians to resist UK/US proposals on revised sanctions.

- Iraq could “survive for several months at least and possibly several years” without any oil income, as it had between 1991 and the end of 1996.
- The contribution of revenues from OFF was not “regarded as necessarily crucial to regime survival”.
- Removal of access to revenue from illegal oil exports would be a “more direct threat to the regime”.
- There had been considerable successes in limiting oil smuggling through the Gulf, but it had “proved politically impossible to counter effectively Iraq’s other illegal oil exports”.
- While a sudden cut in Iraqi oil exports would probably cause a temporary spike in the oil price, the price rise would be “moderate” (less than US$5 per barrel).
- Market expectations would be a key factor in determining the duration of the spike. They were already influenced by “jitters over the Middle East and talk of war with Iraq”.

532. When Iraq announced on 8 April that it would halt oil exports under the UN Oil-for-Food programme for 30 days “or until Israel withdraws from Palestinian territories”, Mr Blair was advised that the market had already factored in the possibility of disruption given the situation in the Middle East and the possibility of from an Iraqi suspension of exports around the UN discussion of sanctions at the end of May.[198]

Chequers meeting, 2 April 2002

533. Mr Blair discussed the need for a strategy to remove Saddam Hussein and possible US military action in a meeting at Chequers on 2 April 2002.

534. The meeting was clearly intended to inform Mr Blair’s approach in his discussion with President Bush.

535. Following Mr Blair’s request in his minute of 17 March for a meeting with military personnel, a meeting was held at Chequers on 2 April. No formal record was made of the discussion or who was present.

536. Accounts given by participants suggest that Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary (representing Mr Hoon who was unable to attend), Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments), Lieutenant General Cedric Delves, senior UK liaison officer at CENTCOM, Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Powell, Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett were present.

[198] Minute No.10 [junior official] to Prime Minister, 8 April 2002, ‘Iraq Suspends Oil Exports; Impact on the Oil Markets’.

537. Mr Straw was overseas at the UK/Caribbean Summit at that time, but no FCO representative was present.[199]

538. Lt Gen Pigott produced a set of briefing slides at the meeting.[200] They identified a provisional end state for military action against Iraq which was defined as:

> "A law-abiding Iraq which is reintegrated in the international community, that does not threaten its neighbours, or global security."

539. The slides prepared for Lt Gen Pigott also contained elements related to Afghanistan, the need to eliminate international terrorism as a force in international affairs and a series of questions in relation to the goals and approach of any military action in Iraq, including that if the US wanted the UK to be involved in any military action, the UK would need to be involved in the planning.

540. Dr Simon Cholerton, Assistant Director in the MOD Secretariat (Overseas), advised Sir Kevin Tebbit:

> "… we believe that the key issue for the PM to raise with President Bush is the outcome the US would seek from any military action: would it simply be [to] control Iraq's WMD, remove Saddam from office (in the knowledge that a successor regime may well continue with Iraq's WMD programmes) or is it necessary to install a replacement regime? The answer to this question will be key to military planning; how action would fit into the framework of international law and help hugely in subsequent work to influence US policy."[201]

541. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that Adm Boyce and Lt Gen Pigott:

> "… gave a presentation. They warned it could be a bloody fight and take a long time to remove Saddam. The US were engaged in preliminary planning, but it was hard to read where they were going with it. We needed to get alongside that planning and be part of it …"[202]

542. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the meeting at Chequers was a "key meeting … to talk about what he [Mr Blair] should do at Crawford".[203]

543. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he did not remember the Chequers meeting as "outstandingly important", though he recollected that "things accelerate in the second quarter of the year".[204] There had been a similar meeting on Afghanistan which had explored the feasibility of military action.

544. Sir Richard Dearlove had discussed the Chequers meeting with colleagues on 4 April.[205] In response to questions from the Inquiry, Sir Richard confirmed that regime change didn’t necessarily mean military action and could, at that stage, have meant a variety of things.

545. Asked whether, from his memory of Chequers, Sir Richard thought Mr Blair would have taken that view, Sir Richard replied: “I think you have got to look at it in the broadest, most general sense”.

546. Asked if Mr Straw and Adm Boyce would have gone along with Mr Blair’s view, or were they more cautious, Sir Richard replied:

> “I am not sure. I think you’ve got to realise that SIS at this point is in a pretty extraordinary position … with an insight into what’s happening in the US which was probably much more profound than anyone else in Government has got.”

547. Sir Richard had also reported to his colleagues that: “WMD would only be one of several arguments pointing to the need to uproot Saddam.”

548. Sir Richard had told his colleagues that Mr Blair was seized of the fact that the WMD threat from Libya was more serious than that from Iraq.[206] Sir Richard added that it had been about that time the UK “discovered that Libya has an active nuclear programme”, which had been “something of a shock”.

549. Asked whether the concerns about WMD in other countries – Iran, North Korea and Libya – were more important than Iraq, and how important WMD was for making the case “to topple the [Iraqi] regime”, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that in April 2002 concerns about Iraq’s WMD were “above the level of routine” and there was “an assumption that Iraq’s interest in WMD” continued.[207] Mr Blair would “push” President Bush to pursue an active policy on Iraq “but the initial phase would be to prepare international public opinion”.

550. Asked how to interpret a reference in the record of the discussion [on 4 April] to Mr Blair wanting to lead, not just support the process of regime change, Sir Richard told the Inquiry he thought it was the former: “keeping our hands on what’s going on and not letting the Americans run away with the ball”.[208]

551. Mr Campbell produced the most detailed account of the meeting. In his diaries, he described it as:

> “… a repeat of the smaller meeting we’d had on Afghanistan. Boyce … mainly set out why it was hard to do anything …

"TB [Tony Blair] wanted to be in a position to give GWB [President Bush] a strategy and influence it. He believed Bush was in the same position as him, that it would be great to get rid of Saddam and could it be done without terrible unforeseen circumstances? …

"We were given an account of the state of Iraqi forces, OK if not brilliant, the opposition – hopeless – and Saddam's ways – truly dreadful. CDS [Adm Boyce] appeared to be trying to shape the meeting towards inaction, constantly pointing out the problems, the nature of the administration, only Rumsfeld and a few others knew what was being planned, TB may speak to Bush or Condi but did they really know what was going on? … He said apart from Rumsfeld, there were only four or five people who were really on the inside track.

"… but CDS would keep coming back to the problems … General Tony Pigott did an OK presentation which went through the problems realistically but concluded that a full-scale invasion would be possible, ending up with fighting in Baghdad. But it would be bloody, could take a long time. Also, it was not impossible that Saddam would keep all his forces back. He said post-conflict had to be part of conflict preparation. The Americans believed we could replicate Afghanistan but it was very, very different … [Lt Gen] Cedric [Delves] … said Tommy Franks [General Franks, Commander in Chief CENTCOM] was difficult to read because he believed they were planning something for later in the year, maybe New Year. He basically believed in air power plus Special Forces. CDS said if they want us to be involved in providing force, we have to be involved in all the planning, which seemed fair enough.

"TB said it was the usual conundrum – do I support totally in public and help deliver our strategy, or do I put distance between us and lose influence?

"We discussed whether the central aim was WMD or regime change. Pigott's view was that it was WMD. TB felt it was regime change in part because of WMD but more broadly because of the threat to the region and the world … [P]eople will say that we have known about WMD for a long time … [T]his would not be a popular war, and in the States fighting an unpopular war and losing is not an option.

"C said that the Presidential Finding, based on an NSC paper, made clear it was regime change that they wanted … There was a discussion about who would replace Saddam and how could we guarantee it would be better. Scarlett said it couldn't be worse …"[209]

Presidential Finding in early 2002

In an article in The Washington Post on 16 June 2002, Mr Bob Woodward wrote that President Bush had signed an intelligence order earlier in the year “directing the CIA to undertake a comprehensive, covert program to topple Saddam Hussein, including authority to use lethal force to capture the Iraqi President”.[210]

The order was:

> “… an expansion of a previous Presidential Finding designed to oust [Saddam] Hussein”.

The Finding directed the CIA to “use all available tools, including:

- Increased support to Iraqi opposition groups and forces inside and outside Iraq including money, weapons, equipment, training and intelligence information.
- Expanded efforts to collect intelligence within the Iraqi government, military, security service and overall population where pockets of intense anti-Hussein sentiment have been detected.
- Possible use of CIA and U.S. Special Forces teams, similar to those that have been successfully deployed in Afghanistan since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Such forces would be authorized to kill Hussein if they were acting in self-defense.”

The US perspective on Mr Blair’s position, pre-Crawford

552. Secretary Powell told President Bush that Mr Blair:

- would want to present the strategic, tactical and public affairs lines he believed would strengthen support for the US and UK; “common cause” in relation to the war on terrorism and Iraq; and
- recognised he would pay a political price for supporting the US on Iraq and wanted to minimise that. UK voters would be looking for signs that the UK and US were “equity partners in the special relationship”.

553. Secretary Powell told President Bush that Mr Blair would want to discuss “Afghanistan; Iraq; the Middle East; Russia and NATO enlargement; and trade and development”.[211]

554. Secretary Powell wrote that Mr Blair:

> “… continues to stand by you and the US as we move forward on the war on terrorism and Iraq. He will present to you the strategic, tactical and public affairs lines that he believes will strengthen global support for our common cause. […]

[211] Memorandum Powell to Bush, 28 March 2002, ‘Your Meeting with United Kingdom Prime Minister Tony Blair, April 5-7, 2002 at Crawford’.

"Blair and the UK are in Afghanistan with us for the long haul. He readily committed to deploy 1700 commandos, even though his experts warn that British forces are overstretched … […].

"On Iraq, Blair will be with us should military operations be necessary. He is convinced on two points: the threat is real; and success against Saddam will yield more regional success. Aside from his foreign and defense secretaries, however, Blair's Cabinet shows signs of division, and the Labour Party and the British public are unconvinced that military action is warranted now. Blair may suggest ideas on how to (1) make a credible public case on current Iraqi threats to international peace; (2) keep Iraq's neighbours on our side; (3) handle calls for a UNSC blessing that can increase support for us in the region and with UK and European audiences; and (4) demonstrate that we have thought through 'the day-after.'

"The UK will follow our lead in the Middle East, but Blair may seek greater US engagement […] He will argue that continued terrorist violence and Israeli military action are rapidly sapping European and Arab support for a tough line on Baghdad.

"… He is sharply criticised by the media for being too pro-US in foreign and security policy, too arrogant and 'presidential' (not a compliment …

"Blair knows he may have to pay a political price for supporting us on Iraq, and wants to minimize it. Nonetheless, he will stick with us on the big issues. His voters will look for signs that Britain and America are truly equity partners in the special relationship."

555. The US Embassy in London reported on 2 April that MPs in the Labour Party were opposed to military action and identified the actions likely to be needed to secure their support.

556. Mr Blair's challenge was to judge the timing and evolution of America's Iraq policy, and to bring his party and the British people on board, so that the UK could be the "keystone" for any coalition the US wanted to build.

557. On 2 April, a telegram from Ambassador William Farish, US Ambassador to the UK, reported that "for a noticeable time after" President Bush had "identified Iraq's development of WMD and missiles as a serious threat" in his State of the Union speech on 26 January, Mr Blair's Government "essentially kept quiet on whether it agreed".[212] That had "changed at the end of February" when Mr Blair "spoke out forcefully" at the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Australia.

[212] Telegram 7579 from AMEMBASSY London to SECSTATE Washington, 2 April 2002, 'Iraq Coalition-Building: UK Labor Party Not Yet Convinced'.

558. The Embassy reported that the Government had a week later released a Foreign Office briefing paper to the Parliamentary Labour Party “that outlined the case against Iraq”. That had been followed by the article in The Times by Mr Straw [on 5 March] and a similar piece by Mr Blair the following day. The subsequent “debate” on the issue in the House of Commons was described as “sharp”, with opposition to military action going “unfortunately, well beyond the ‘usual suspects’”. The large number of signatories of an Early Day Motion opposing support for US military action, 130 of whom 100 were Labour MPs, was “significant” and “many more … did not sign” but agreed with its thrust. The MPs were seen to be reflecting overall voter opinion.

559. Labour MPs who considered “themselves to be moderate and strongly pro-US” had told the US Embassy that they needed “more evidence of Iraq’s connivance with terrorism and/or willingness to use WMD before they could support HMG co-operation with military action”. Labour MPs had “especially” raised “concerns about the reaction of the Arab world”. “Several MPs” had also told the Embassy “that progress in the Middle East Peace Process could defuse some of their concerns”. “Another element raised was that there would be less negative fallout if military action were taken only after all other options were seen to have been exhausted” and “virtually all MPs with whom we spoke” wanted “the UN to endorse any military action”. MPs were worried:

> “… that the US is ‘looking for another fight’ and will ‘ignore even its close friends if they object’ … There is the impression … that the US is not acknowledging the relevance of the UK to the US agenda.”

560. Addressing what it would take to convince Labour Parliamentarians to support military action against Iraq, Ambassador Farish wrote that widespread revulsion with the Iraqi regime did not:

> “… necessarily translate into support for war. Some MPs would endorse action if they had proof that Iraq has continued to develop WMD since UN inspectors left. More would follow if convinced that Iraq has succeeded in developing significant WMD capability (not just CW, but BW and/or nuclear/radiological) and the missiles to deliver it. Many more would follow if they see compelling evidence that Iraq intends and plans to use such weapons. A clear majority would support military action against Iraq if Saddam is implicated in the 9/11 attacks or other egregious acts of terrorism. Other factors of influence include … Arab sentiment, progress in the MEPP, UN support, civilian casualties, and having a plan that works.
> “Since making his decision to move to a more robust public diplomacy on Iraq, Blair plus Straw and … Hoon have made a string of tough statements. Blair was especially forthright when standing alongside VP Cheney on March 11.”

561. Ambassador Farish concluded:

> “Blair has proved an excellent judge of political timing, and he will need to be especially careful about when to launch a ramped-up campaign to build support for action against Iraq. He will want neither to be too far in front, or behind, US policy. As one FCO official pointed out to us, if Blair unleashes a full scale campaign in Parliament and with the general public when Parliament returns from the Easter recess, and the US policy turns out to be on a longer-term trajectory, when the time comes for action, the PM may find that his preparations have come unglued. On the other hand, if he waits too long, then the keystone of any coalition that we wish to build may not be firmly in place. No doubt these are the calculations that Blair hopes to firm up when he meets the President at Crawford …"

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford, April 2002

562. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, sent a report of a visit to Washington by MOD officials to Sir David Manning on 4 April (see Section 6.1).[213]

563. Sir David Manning added in a manuscript comment: "… further request from Geoff Hoon that you should persuade Bush to include us in the US military planning process."[214]

564. Mr Campbell wrote that on 3 April Mr Blair "was anxious that we get the focus for the meeting at Crawford … off Iraq simply and on to the Middle East".[215]

565. Mr Rycroft sent Mr Blair an updated briefing pack for the meetings at Crawford to Mr Blair on 4 April.[216] For Iraq, that comprised:

- the folders of background papers requested by Mr Blair;
- a FCO steering brief;
- Sir Christopher Meyer's telegram of 1 April;
- the latest version of the draft paper for public release on Iraq's WMD;
- a draft paper on Iraq's human rights abuses;
- background papers on the Iraqi opposition and the weapons inspectors;
- the letter from Mr Charles Kennedy expressing concern about military action; and
- further background papers on ensuring the security of energy supply.

566. Sir David Manning provided a separate checklist of topics which described the objective on Iraq as:

> “Commitment from Bush to transparency and consultation. (The model is Afghanistan.) We need to start US/UK military planning (i.e. access for UK military planners in Washington and CENTCOM – the point CDS made at Chequers).”[217]

567. The Overseas and Defence Secretariat advised Sir David Manning on 5 April:

- The Iraq ‘Options Paper’ remained “current”.
- Mr Annan met an Iraqi delegation on 7 March. The Iraqis had made no specific commitments to co-operate with UN resolutions and posed 19 questions about US/UK policies. The majority were polemics but some were about clarification of resolution 1284. Mr Annan wanted the Security Council to answer those questions before further talks scheduled for 18/19 April. The UK position was that Mr Annan had no mandate to negotiate with Iraq and that he should urge them to talk to UNMOVIC and the IAEA about readmitting weapons inspectors.
- The US was working on a draft UN resolution to encapsulate recent agreements with Russia on the Goods Review List.[218]

568. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had “decided that he wanted to be totally supportive but also push for more US engagement”.[219] He “would make clear that the UK would support the US on Iraq, but also make the point about UN inspectors effectively as an ultimatum”. For the first time that Mr Campbell could recall, Mr Blair had produced “his own written checklist for the meeting” with President Bush. Mr Blair had wanted “to do Iraq and MEPP first so that he knew where he was”.

Mr Blair’s meetings with President Bush at Crawford, April 2002

569. Mr Blair met President Bush at Crawford, Texas, on 5 and 6 April. Much of the discussion took place in private meetings between the two leaders.

570. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that President Bush and Mr Blair had dined together [on the evening of Friday 5 April] and that there was a more formal meeting on the Saturday morning.[220] Sir David stressed that the discussions at Crawford had been about “many other things as well as Iraq” particularly the Middle East Peace Process.

571. A three-page record of the discussions on Iraq was circulated on a secret and strictly personal basis by Sir David Manning in a letter to Mr McDonald which was sent only to Mr Watkins (for Mr Hoon), Admiral Boyce, Sir Michael Jay, Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Christopher Meyer and Mr Powell.[221]

572. Much of the discussion took place privately between the two leaders. Sir David Manning recorded that the meeting on Saturday morning was informed:

- There was no war plan for Iraq.
- Thinking so far had been on a broad, conceptual level.
- A very small cell in Central Command in Florida had recently been set up to do some planning and to think through the various options.
- When the US had done that, US and UK planners would be able to sit down together to examine the options.
- The US and UK would work through the issues together.

573. Sir David recorded that Mr Blair and President Bush had discussed:

- the need to enhance not diminish regional stability;
- who might replace Saddam Hussein if action was taken to topple him;
- the impact of a moderate, secular regime in Iraq on other countries in the region;
- the need to manage public relations with great care;
- putting Saddam Hussein on the spot over UN inspections and seeking proof of the claim that he was not developing WMD; and
- the timing of possible military action. If a decision was taken to use military action, that would not take place before late 2002/early 2003.

574. Mr Blair said that it was important to go back to the United Nations and to present that as an opportunity for Saddam Hussein to co-operate:

> "… no one could doubt that the world would be a better place if there were regime change in Iraq. He was sure it was right to go the inspectors' route. But we would have to give careful thought about how we framed the ultimatum to Saddam to allow the inspectors to do their job."

575. Mr Blair thought that Saddam Hussein would probably try to obstruct the inspectors and play for time. That was why it was so important that they must be allowed in at any time and be free to visit any place or installation. He also identified the need for an accompanying public relations strategy that highlighted both the risks of Saddam's WMD programme and his "appalling" human rights record, and the importance of managing European public opinion and helping to construct an international coalition.

576. Mr Blair said he would emphasise that Saddam was being given an opportunity to co-operate. If "as he expected" Saddam failed to do so, it would be "very much harder to resist the logic that we must take action to deal with an evil regime that threatened us with its WMD programme”.

577. Mr Blair considered that the US and UK would “still face the question of why they had decided to act now; what had changed?” In his view one of the lessons of 11 September was that: “Failure to take action in good time meant that the risks would only grow, and might force us to take much more costly action later.”

578. Sir David Manning also recorded that, following a further conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair had concluded that President Bush wanted to build a coalition, and that had led him to dismiss pressure from some on the American right.

579. The record contained no reference to any discussion of conditions which would be necessary for military action.

580. A letter from Sir Christopher Meyer to Sir David Manning on 15 May indicated that Mr Blair and President Bush had also discussed the first quarter of 2003 as a timeframe for action against Saddam Hussein.[222]

581. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that, at Crawford:

> “… [President] Bush acknowledged the possibility that Saddam would allow inspectors in and let them go about their business. If that happened we would have to adjust our approach accordingly.
> “So it was absolutely clear we were not signing up for a war … we were signing up for going down the UN route and giving Saddam a chance to comply.”[223]

582. Asked if military options were discussed, Mr Powell replied:

> “I don’t recall them getting into any sort of discussion of military options …”

583. Mr Powell added that he thought Mr Blair’s message to President Bush was:

> “… if you are going to do this, you have got to do this in the most intelligent manner possible, like after Afghanistan, like after 9/11. You have got to put this on a political track … build support. You have got to go down the UN route. You have got to exhaust that UN route … to give Saddam a chance to comply.”[224]

584. Mr Powell stated that Mr Blair was talking about the things that would need to be done to make action against Iraq successful:

> “The first was to put the Middle East peace process in a different place … That strikes me as a fundamental point that he repeated again and again subsequent > to that meeting. He talked about what would happen on the day after … so … he … listed all the right questions …"[225]

585. The issue of conditions for military action and how those were interpreted by Mr Blair and others is addressed in Section 3.3.

586. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry, that Afghanistan was the main pre-occupation at that time.[226] In his view, "The sense that this was all about Iraq, in my recollection, was wrong."

587. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that there had been "a general discussion of the possibility of going down the military route but obviously, we were arguing for that to be if the UN route failed".[227]

588. President Bush wrote that he and Mr Blair had:

> "… talked about coercive diplomacy as a way to address the threat from Iraq. Tony suggested that we seek a UN Security Council resolution that presented Saddam with a clear ultimatum: allow weapons inspectors back into Iraq, or face serious consequences. I didn't have a lot of faith in the UN. The Security Council had passed sixteen resolutions against Saddam to no avail. But I agreed to consider his idea."[228]

589. Dr Rice wrote that President Bush and Mr Blair had "had an extended discussion about Iraq and the need to do something about Saddam. The President was clear that Saddam had to fear the international community if he was ever going to comply. He and Blair found common ground in that assessment …"[229]

590. In their press conference on 6 April, President Bush and Mr Blair both mentioned WMD in their introductory remarks, but neither mentioned Iraq specifically. Iraq was, however, raised in many of the questions.

591. President Bush stated:

- He and Mr Blair both agreed Saddam Hussein had to prove he was not developing WMD.
- US policy was regime change and all the options were on the table.
- Mr Blair understood that Saddam Hussein could not be allowed to "hook up" with a terrorist network.

592. Mr Blair stated that “doing nothing” was not an option; the threat of WMD was real and had to be dealt with. The lesson of 11 September was to ensure that “groups” were not allowed to develop a capability they might use.

593. In his memoir, Mr Blair characterised the message that he and President Bush had delivered to Saddam Hussein as “change the regime attitude on WMD inspections or face the prospect of changing regime”.

594. In the press conference President Bush said that the bonds between the peoples of the US and UK were “stronger than ever” and that they shared “common interests and a common perspective on the important challenges of our times”.[230] He was “extremely grateful” for Mr Blair’s “courageous leadership” since 11 September, and the world was “grateful for all that Great Britain has contributed in the war against terror”. He and Mr Blair both understood that “defeating global terror requires a broad based, long-term strategy” and “the importance of denying terrorists weapons of mass destruction”. They had also had “extensive conversations about the situation in the Middle East” where both nations were “strongly committed to finding a just settlement”. He and Mr Blair had “agreed to work closely in the weeks and months ahead on these difficult issues”.

595. Mr Blair said he agreed with President Bush on the Middle East and that they had also discussed international terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. They had agreed that “the issue of weapons of mass destruction cannot be ducked, it is a threat, it is a danger to our world and we must heed that threat and act to prevent it being realised”. In Afghanistan, it was important “not just that we root out the last remnants of the Al Qaida terrorist network … but also that we help that country to go from being a failed state … to a state that offers some hope of stability and prosperity for the future”.

596. In response to questions about the need for military action in Iraq, Mr Bush said he and Mr Blair had:

> “… of course, talked about Iraq. We both recognise the danger of a man who is willing to kill his own people harboring and developing weapons of mass destruction … He’s a man who obviously had something to hide.
> “He told the world that he would show us that he would not develop weapons of mass destruction and yet, over the past decade he has refused to do so. And the Prime Minister and I both agree that he needs to prove that he isn’t developing … [WMD]
> “I explained … the policy of my government is the removal of Saddam and that all options are on the table.”

---

[230] The White House, 6 April 2002, President Bush, Prime Minister Blair Hold Press Conference.

597. Mr Blair said that:

> "… any sensible person … asking the question, would the region, the world, and not least the ordinary Iraqi people be better off without the regime of Saddam Hussein, the only answer anyone could give … would be, yes.
> "… how we approach this, is a matter for discussion … for considering all the options. But a situation where he continues to be in breach of all the United Nations resolutions, refusing to allow us to assess … whether and how he is developing these weapons of mass destruction. Doing nothing is not an option …
> "But the President is right to draw attention to the threat of weapons of mass destruction. That threat is real. How we deal with it, that's a matter we discuss. But … we have to deal with it …"

598. Asked whether removal of Saddam Hussein was now the policy of the British Government, Mr Blair replied:

> "… it has always been our policy that Iraq would be a better place without Saddam Hussein. I don't think anyone can be in any doubt about that for all the reasons I have given. But how we proceed … how we make sure that this threat that is posed by weapons of mass destruction is dealt with, that is a matter that is open. And when the time comes for taking those decisions, we will tell people about those decisions …"

599. Asked whether regime change was a change in policy, President Bush replied that it was not:

> "… the worst thing that can happen is to allow the man to abrogate his promise, and hook up with a terrorist network. And then all of a sudden you've got one of those shadowy terrorist networks that have got an arsenal at their disposal, which could create a situation in which nations down the road get blackmailed. We can't let that happen, we just can't … And, obviously, the Prime Minister is somebody who understands this clearly …"

600. Asked about the absence of a direct linkage between Al Qaida and Saddam Hussein, President Bush replied:

> "… he wouldn't accept that. But can't they see the linkage between somebody who's willing to murder his own people and the danger of him possessing weapons of mass destruction, which he said he would not develop? I see the linkage between someone who is willing … to use chemical weapons in order to keep himself in power, and at the same time develop a weapon that could be aimed at Europe, aimed at Israel, aimed anywhere, in order to affect foreign policy …
> "I can't imagine people not seeing the threat and not holding Saddam Hussein accountable for what he said he would do, and we're going to do that. History has called us into action. The thing I admire about the Prime Minister is he doesn't need a poll or focus group to convince him the difference between right and wrong. And it's refreshing to see leaders speak with moral clarity when it comes to the defense of freedom.

"… We will hold Saddam Hussein accountable for broken promises. And that's what a lot of our discussion … has been about. And … we are going to continue our discussions."

601. Mr Blair added:

"You talked about no linkage there. There is a reason why United Nations resolutions were passed … calling upon him to stop developing weapons of mass destruction … and that is because we know he has been developing these weapons.

"We know that those weapons constitute a threat. Three days after the 11 September when I made my first statement to the House of Commons … I specifically said then that this issue of weapons of mass destruction has to be dealt with … [W]hat happened on the 11th of September was a call to us to make sure that we didn't repeat the mistake of allowing groups to develop a destructive capability and hope that, at some point, they weren't going to use it. They develop that destructive capability for a reason.

"Now we've made it very clear to you how we then proceed and how we deal with this. All the options are open. And I think after the 11th September this President showed that he proceeds in a calm and a measured and a sensible, but in a firm way. Now that is precisely what we need in this situation too."

602. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that he and President Bush had "delivered a strong message" during the press conference, which he characterised as:

"It was basically: change the regime attitude on WMD inspections or face the prospect of changing regime."[231]

603. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the "worry" about the press conference was that "we had a different position on regime change" and they had spent some time discussing how to avoid exposing a "huge gulf between us".[232]

College Station speech, 7 April 2002

604. As suggested by Mr Powell, Mr Blair used his speech at College Station on 7 April to argue for an internationalist approach in dealing with Iraq.

605. Mr Blair advocated a policy of "an enlightened self interest that put fighting for our values at the heart of the policies necessary to protect our nations".

[232] Public hearing, 18 January 2010, page 35.

606. Leaving Iraq to develop WMD in breach of its obligations to the Security Council was "not an option", although the moment for decision on how to act had not yet been reached. Saddam Hussein had to let the weapons inspectors back in with unrestricted access.

607. Mr Blair used his speech at the George Bush Senior Presidential Library at College Station, Texas on 7 April to set out an internationalist approach drawing on his speech in Chicago in 1999.[233]

608. Mr Blair identified two views of international affairs: one, which was utilitarian, where "each nation maximises its own self interest"; the other was utopian, where "we tried to create a better world". In Mr Blair's view those two views were merging and he advocated an approach of "an enlightened self interest that put fighting for our values at the heart of the policies necessary to protect Our nations". "Engagement in the world on the basis of these values, not isolationism from it, is the hard headed pragmatism for the 21st century."

609. Citing the example of intervention in Kosovo, Mr Blair stated that it was "still costing us time, effort and money, but it's a lot less than if we had turned our back and let the Balkans plunge into civil war".

610. Mr Blair described instability as "contagious" and that "the surest way to stability is through … values of freedom, democracy and justice". Promotion of those values was:

> "… part of our long-term security and prosperity. We can't intervene in every case. Not all the wrongs of the world can be put right, but where disorder threatens us all, we should act."

611. Mr Blair described the response to the terrorist attacks on 11 September as one where "the world stood firm. America took the lead, but it led a coalition of extraordinarily wide international proportions." Mr Blair warned there was "a real danger we forget the lessons of September 11".

612. In Mr Blair's view there was "no escape" from facing events and "dealing with them". Four "policy positions" should guide those responses.

613. Firstly:

> "… the world works better when the US and EU stand together …
> "… The international coalition matters. Where it operates the unintended consequences of action are limited, the diplomatic parameters better fixed …"

---

614. Secondly:

> “… we must be prepared to act where terrorism or weapons of mass destruction threaten us. The fight against international terrorism is right. We should pursue it vigorously. Not just in Afghanistan but elsewhere. Not just by military means but by disrupting the finances of terrorism … But there should be no let up.
> “If necessary the action should be military and again, if necessary and justified, it should involve regime change. I have been involved … in three conflicts involving regime change …
> “Britain is immensely proud of the part our forces have played and with the results but I can honestly say that the people most pleased have been the people living under the regime in question …
> “We cannot, of course, intervene in all cases but where countries are engaged in the terror or the WMD business, we should not shirk from confronting them. Some can be offered a way out, a route to respectability. I hope in time that Syria, Iran and even North Korea … A new relationship is on offer. But they must know that sponsoring terrorism or WMD is not acceptable.
> “As for Iraq, I know that some fear precipitate action. They needn’t. We will proceed as we did after September 11, in a calm, measured, sensible but firm way. But leaving Iraq to develop WMD, in flagrant breach of no less than nine separate UN Security Council resolutions, refusing still to allow weapons inspectors back to do their work properly, is not an option. The regime of Saddam is detestable. Brutal, repressive, political opponents routinely tortured and executed: it is a regime without a qualm in sacrificing the lives of its citizens to preserve itself, or starting wars with neighbouring states and it has used chemical weapons against its own people.
> “As I say, the moment for decision on how to act is not yet with us. But to allow weapons of mass destruction to be developed by a state like Iraq without let or hindrance would be grossly to ignore the lessons of September 11 and we will not do it. The message to Saddam is clear: he has to let the inspectors back in, anyone, any time, any place that the international community demands.”

615. Thirdly, quoting the plight of the Middle East, the dispute between India and Pakistan and conflicts in the Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan and Angola, Mr Blair stated:

> “… we should work hard to broker peace where conflict threatens a region’s stability because we know the dangers of contagion …”

616. Fourthly, Mr Blair argued:

> “Prevention is better than cure. The reason it would be crazy for us to clear out of Afghanistan once we had finished militarily, is that if it drifts back into instability, the same old problems will re-emerge. Stick at it and we can show, eventually, as in the Balkans, the unstable starts to become stable."

617. In the concluding section of his speech, Mr Blair stated that an integrated approach was needed. He was not suggesting that nothing should be done without unanimity:

"That would be a recipe for the lowest common denominator – a poor policy. I am arguing that the values we believe in are worth fighting for … We shouldn't be shy of giving our actions not just the force of self-interest but moral force.

"And in reality, at a certain point these forces merge. When we defend our countries … we aren't just defending territory. We are defending what our nations believe in: freedom, democracy, tolerance and respect towards others.

"… Fighting for these values is a cause the world needs …

"But if that's what I and many others want … It means we don't shirk our responsibility. It means that when America is fighting for those values, then, however tough, we fight with her. No grandstanding, no offering implausible but impractical advice from the comfort of the touchline, no wishing away the hard not the easy choices on terrorism and WMD, or making peace in the Middle East, but working together, side by side.

"That is the only route I know to a stable world …

"If the world makes the right choices now – at this time of destiny – we will get there. And Britain will be at America's side in doing it."

618. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had written the speech "pretty much … himself". He would make it clear that the UK would "support" the US on Iraq "but also make the point about UN inspectors effectively as an ultimatum".[234]

619. The references in the speech to the UN and the use of the word "justified" in relation to regime change were "strengthened" after the discussions with President Bush.[235]

620. Sir Michael Jay commended the speech in a telegram to FCO posts on 7 April and invited them to draw on it.[236]

621. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that Mr Blair's College Station speech was not intended to develop a new policy on Iraq; and that there was "no intention of changing policy on regime change in Iraq". He added that the comments on regime change were in the context of a need for the international community “to take action where we need to take action, but you can’t do that just on the basis of the wish for regime change”.[237]

622. A brief account of the outcome of the visit was provided in a telegram from the FCO on 10 April, providing additional points which Mr Ricketts had used in briefing EU Ambassadors.[238] In relation to Iraq, it stated:

> “The Prime Minister came away convinced that President Bush would act in a calm, measured and sensible but firm way. There was no question of precipitate action. But they agreed that Iraq’s WMD programmes were a major threat to the international community, particularly when coupled with Saddam’s proven track record on using these weapons. Letting that programme continue unhindered was not an option. The Prime Minister and President Bush agreed that action in the UN was the priority. It was essential to get the weapons inspectors deployed to begin to assess the extent of the Iraqi WMD programmes. The Prime Minister had been tough in his demand that Saddam must let the inspectors back in: ‘any one, any time, any place that the international community demands’.”

Reports to Parliament

623. Mr Straw was concerned about the potential reaction in Parliament to developments on Iraq.

624. Mr Straw advised that Parliament should be given a chance to vote on a substantive motion before any military action.

625. Mr Straw warned Mr Blair that Lord Goldsmith had expressed “serious doubt” about whether existing resolutions would provide “sufficient cover” for military action.

626. Mr Straw also advised that Mr Blair should avoid being “pinned down” on whether a new UN resolution would be required to provide the legal basis for military action.

627. Mr Straw welcomed Mr Blair’s decision to make a statement to Parliament about the discussions with President Bush but made a number of points in relation to Iraq:

- Mr Blair should concede that any military action in Iraq should be decided in a debate on a substantive motion in the House of Commons, not a debate on the adjournment. This was “quite a point of principle with many in the PLP”.
- The shift of focus to the re-admission of weapons inspectors was welcome and would “greatly help in making the argument for military action if (as I suspect) Iraq fails properly to comply”.

[238] Telegram 73 FCO London to Madrid, 10 April 2002, ‘The Prime Minister’s Meeting with President Bush, 5-7 April’.

- But it drew the UK and the US "inexorably into questions of cover in international law for any such military action". Lord Goldsmith had expressed "serious doubt" that any existing resolution would provide "sufficient cover".
- Mr Straw's "strong advice" was "not to get pinned down on the question … of whether a new UNSC mandate would be needed for military action". Mr Blair should "readily acknowledge" that the UK had "always operated within the framework of international law".
- Mr Straw had asked for work on whether it would be possible to strengthen the forthcoming resolution bringing the Goods Review List into operation "in respect of weapons inspectors".
- Mr Blair could say that the document [for publication] on Iraq would be produced "shortly". In Mr Straw's view the UK could "certainly get something out pretty quickly".
- The Early Day Motion signed by more than 150 members of the PLP had gained support because "it spoke of no military action 'at this time'; and called for weapons inspectors to go back".[239]

628. During PMQs on 10 April, Mr Blair emphasised the threat Iraq posed to the world, and the need for Saddam Hussein to comply with the UN resolutions and allow weapons inspectors back into Iraq. The region would be a better place without Saddam Hussein, but the method of achieving that was "open to consultation and deliberation".

629. During PMQs on 10 April, Mr Iain Duncan Smith, leader of the Opposition, and other MPs asked a number of questions on Iraq.[240]

630. Stating that Iraq would "if left unchecked … be able to deploy its weapons of mass destruction against targets in western Europe, including the United Kingdom", Mr Duncan Smith asked Mr Blair:

- "… to confirm reports that he told President Bush … that if military action is needed against Saddam Hussein, the British Government will support and, if necessary contribute to it?";
- "… to confirm that getting rid of Saddam Hussein may now be an objective of the Government";
- whether he believed that "countering the growing threat from Saddam Hussein" was "about protecting lives in Britain and the lives of British forces abroad, and not just about supporting our allies"; and
- in a reference to his speech at College Station, whether Mr Blair believed that those who refused to accept the need to act "misunderstand the nature of the threat, or that they will simply refuse to accept any evidence they are given".

631. In response, Mr Blair stated:

- “The time for military action has not yet arisen. However, there is no doubt at all that the development of weapons of mass destruction by Saddam Hussein poses a severe threat not just to the region, but to the wider world … [I]n my first statement to the House … after 11 September, I made it clear that the issue of weapons of mass destruction had to be, and should be, dealt with. How we deal with it will be a matter for consultation and deliberation in the normal way. After 11 September, we proceeded in a calm and sensible way, and we shall do so again, but we must confront the issue of weapons of mass destruction.”
- “… there is no doubt at all that the region would be a better place without Saddam Hussein … the Iraqi people would rejoice most at Saddam Hussein leaving office … that regime has a particular record: the Iran-Iraq war … the annexation of Kuwait … and perhaps the most appalling act of all, the use of chemical weapons on the Kurdish people … However, the method of achieving that is … open to consultation and deliberation. When the judgements are made, I have no doubt at all that this House – indeed, the whole country – will want to debate the issue thoroughly.”
- “… The key issue is that this is not something that has suddenly arisen … Before 11 September, a whole series of negotiations took place about potential new United Nations Security Council resolutions to put in place a better sanctions regime, and about how we try to ensure that weapons inspectors get back inside Iraq. The reason why the Security Council resolutions that were originally proposed and passed demand that weapons inspections take place … is precisely that the threat of weapons of mass destruction is real and present.”
- “The issue is quite clear … Saddam Hussein has a very clear message from the international community: the weapons inspectors should go back in – anyone, any place, any time … Simply turning our backs on the issue of weapons of mass destruction is not an option. That is why I think it so important that we stand with the United States in saying this issue is one that has to be, and will be, confronted. We will do so in a sensible and measured way, but we cannot allow a state of this nature to develop those weapons without let or hindrance.”

632. Asked by Mr George Howarth (Labour) for an assurance that, before any military action which might become necessary was contemplated, Saddam Hussein would be “given every opportunity to comply with” the Security Council’s resolutions, Mr Blair replied that Saddam Hussein was:

> “… in defiance of the resolutions … However, he has the opportunity to comply now. He is not in any doubt about what is necessary. The United Nations resolutions are clear; there are nine and he is in breach of every one. The international community’s position is also clear. Whatever people think about the action that will follow, he must comply with the resolutions.”

633. Mr Blair's subsequent statement to the House of Commons focused on the discussions with President Bush on the crisis in the Middle East.

634. On Iraq, Mr Blair reiterated his statements that decisions would be "sensible", and that the House of Commons would have a proper opportunity to debate them before action was taken.

635. Mr Blair assured Parliament that the question of whether action in respect of Iraq would have the backing of international law would be considered "very carefully"; but that the time to debate any legal basis was when such action was taken.

636. Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons on 10 April concentrated on the crisis in the Middle East.[241]

637. Addressing Iraq in the context of stability in the Middle East Mr Blair stated:

> "There will be many occasions on which to debate Saddam Hussein's flagrant breach of successive UN resolutions on his weapons of mass destruction … [His] regime is despicable, he is developing weapons of mass destruction, and we cannot leave him doing so unchecked. He is a threat to his own people and to the region and, if allowed to develop these weapons, a threat to us also.
> "Doing nothing is not an option … [W]hat the international community should do through the UN is challenge Saddam to let the inspectors back in without restriction … If he really has nothing to hide, let him prove it.
> "… no decisions on action have been taken. Our way of proceeding should be and will be measured, calm and thought through. When judgements are made, I shall ensure the House has a full opportunity to debate them."

638. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, stated that the issue of Iraq:

> "… crosses the political spectrum – there is genuine unease in the Labour party, among the Liberal Democrats and perhaps in sections of the Conservative party … that unease is a reflection of genuine and sincerely held shades of opinion throughout the country. Therefore, as a result of his discussions with President Bush, will the Prime Minister acknowledge that no country can conduct a foreign policy on the basis of 'my ally, right or wrong'? Although I am not implying that the Government are seeking to do so, there is a need for discernment. Many of us hope that the Government may be able to temper some of the ideas of the American Administration …"

---

[241] House of Commons, Official Report, 10 April 2002, columns 22-38.

639. Mr Kennedy welcomed the fact that “if decisions on Iraq have to be reached at some point in the future”, Mr Blair had confirmed the House of Commons would have “an opportunity to debate the matter fully”.

640. Mr Kennedy asked for confirmation that, if that stage was reached, “incontrovertible evidence” would “be presented publicly, preferably at the level of the United Nations Security Council”. That would be “most important, not just for the legitimacy of any action under international law, but for maintaining a political consensus”.

641. Mr Blair replied:

> “… Some people will be against taking action in respect of Iraq no matter what it does, but I accept entirely that there are many people who are concerned … whether that action will be sensible, whether it will have the backing of international law and whether proper thought has been given to the consequences for the wider region … [T]hose are questions that we shall consider very carefully …
> “… most people would accept … Saddam Hussein does lead a despicable regime, that he is a threat in respect of weapons of mass destruction and that it is important that we deal with that threat …
> “… it is the case that Saddam Hussein poses a threat. That is why the UN resolutions are there … [T]his is somebody who has a track record of absolutely extraordinary aggression on his neighbours, on his own people, on everyone that he sees advantage in being aggressive towards … That is why British pilots are still flying over the No-Fly Zone in order to protect people in Iraq. That is why the inspectors went in, could not do their job properly and then came out.
> “… in the end we can all respond to concerns but we have to take decisions on them. I can assure people that those decisions will be sensible and that the House will have a proper opportunity to debate them before we act upon them.
> “I have never taken the view that we support the US right or wrong … But I do believe … that the relationship is special and … that it is a fundamental part of British foreign policy and should remain so. All I can say is that in my dealings with the Administration and with this President, we have found them immensely open and consultative, and where they have acted they have acted not just with consultation but in what I would regard as a sensible way.”

642. Mr Douglas Hogg (Conservative) asked Mr Blair to tell President Bush that “many in this country are not yet persuaded that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein is sufficiently great to justify military action, especially when the Middle East is in such a turbulent state”.

643. Mr Tam Dalyell (Labour) asked whether President Chirac (of France) had told Mr Blair that he had taken “the thuggish young Vice-President of Iraq” [Saddam Hussein] to the "French equivalent of Aldermaston"; and that it was to his (Mr Dalyell's) discredit that he "like many others, turned a blind eye to the huge amount of arms being poured into Iraq in the 1980s by our country and others". He also stated that Iraq had been given a "clean bill of health on nuclear capacity" by the International Atomic Energy Agency in January 2002; and that Mr Hoon had "an invitation to send a scientific delegation of his choosing to Iraq at the beginning of March". Mr Dalyell asked: "… would it not be wise at least to go and talk to Iraq? If nothing comes of that, so be it, but is it not high time that we started serious discussions?"

644. Mr Blair replied that sending a team out to Iraq was "best done through the United Nations" and that Saddam Hussein had "the opportunity to prove that he has nothing to hide by letting the inspectors back in unconditionally". There was "some truth" in the point that everyone had turned a blind eye "to what was happening in Iraq in the 1980s" but "what we are learning about the international community is that when we turn a blind eye, sooner or later the problems come back to us full frontally. That is precisely what happened in Afghanistan, and it is one reason why … we should certainly not turn a blind eye to what Saddam Hussein is doing." There was "no doubt" that Saddam Hussein was "still trying to acquire nuclear capability and ballistic missile capability. Furthermore, although we do not know what has happened, we suspect that the piles of chemical and biological weapons remain."

645. Mr Stuart Bell (Labour) referred to Saddam Hussein's attacks using chemical weapons on Halabja and other villages in northern Iraq in 1988 and 1999 which had affected "4 million people" and asked: "Can we not remind ourselves of how important it is that Saddam Hussein lives with UN resolutions, and the sooner he does so the better?"

646. Mr Blair replied that Mr Bell was "right to remind us of the nature of Saddam's regime and the way it deals with its political opponents". He added that "most people realise that" Saddam Hussein "constitutes a threat".

647. Mr Robert Wareing (Labour) stated that everyone would agree that the "world would be better off without" Saddam Hussein's regime, but Mr Bradshaw had told the House that "the objective of British foreign policy was to remove the threat of Iraq's weapons and not to replace the Iraqi Government, which was described as a matter for the people of Iraq". President Clinton had stated that sanctions "must remain as long as Saddam Hussein lasted".

648. Mr Wareing asked:

> "What is the current view and policy of the British Government? If they take the latter position, there is no incentive to get the current regime in Iraq to change tack and allow the inspectors back in. I happen to remember that, initially, the inspectors left of their own accord; the difficulty now is to get them back in."

649. Mr Blair replied:

> “Of course, the policy is to protect ourselves against weapons of mass destruction, but obviously that cannot be divorced from the regime, because it is the regime that is responsible … regime change in Iraq has been the policy of successive American Governments … precisely because of the fear of weapons of mass destruction … [I]t is for that very reason that the international community has said to Saddam Hussein, ‘Let the inspectors back in’. That is what I am saying, but it must be done unconditionally.”

650. In relation to Mr Blair’s comments about Saddam Hussein’s chemical weapons attacks on the Kurds, Ms Joyce Quin (Labour) asked Mr Blair to confirm that “the maintenance of the breadth of the international coalition against terrorism” remained “an important priority for him and President Bush”. She stated that it was:

> “… important to ensure that those who have already been victims … will not suffer a second time in any action against Iraq. Indeed we should not repeat the mistakes of the past, in which one evil regime was replaced by another, but try to create as far as possible the conditions for a multi-ethnic, religiously tolerant, representative regime in Iraq, if and when Saddam Hussein’s regime is changed.”

651. Mr Blair replied:

> “I strongly agree … about the international coalition. It is important that we build as much support as possible for any action that we may undertake. She is entirely right that, if the regime in Iraq is to change, it is important that it changes to one that is genuinely broad based. I hope that we have provided some symbol of our good intentions … by what has happened in Afghanistan … I am sure that she, like me and many others … would be one of the first to say that many people in Iraq would rejoice at Saddam Hussein’s departure. I hope that at some stage we shall be able to furnish the House with details of the way in which his regime operates, because its brutality is scarcely believable.
> “It is important to proceed in a measured way. As I said in my speech in Texas, I have been involved in three regime changes … and I can honestly say that we should not regret any of them. Let us proceed with care … we must ensure that, if we ever get a regime change in Iraq, what follows is an improvement on what is there now.”

652. Mr Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru) welcomed Mr Blair’s reference to seeking an early United Nations Security Council resolution but asked whether one would be “sought before any further action is taken against Iraq”.

653. Mr Blair replied: “The time for debating any legal basis of action against Iraq is when we take such action.”

Cabinet, 11 April 2002

654. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 11 April that regime change in Iraq was greatly to be desired but no plans for achieving that had been tabled during his discussions with President Bush at Crawford.

655. Reflecting Mr Straw's advice, Mr Blair emphasised to Cabinet on 11 April that it would be important for the Government not to "tie its hands" in relation to the need for a further Security Council resolution.

656. Mr Blair had stated publicly that doing nothing was not an option, and that the threat from Iraq had to be dealt with.

657. Mr Blair suggested that the US Government recognised the need to embark on a process involving a clear ultimatum and an effort to gather international consensus for action.

658. Mr Blair did not disclose that he had informed Vice President Cheney on 11 March that the UK would help the US to achieve its objective of regime change provided that there was a clever plan.

659. Mr Blair reported his discussions with President Bush to Cabinet on 11 April.[242] He told colleagues that the talks with President Bush had been dominated by events in Israel and the Occupied Territories.

660. On Iraq, Mr Blair said that the US Government wanted to see a change of regime, which was greatly to be desired. No plans for achieving that had, however, been tabled. The significance of the crisis in Israel and the Occupied Territories for policy in Iraq was recognised. He had consulted his hosts about his speech, at College Station on 7 April, which had made clear that Iraq should unconditionally permit UN weapons inspectors to return. That suggested the US Government recognised the need to embark on a process involving a clear ultimatum and an effort to gather international consensus for action.

661. In the subsequent discussion a number of points were made. Those included:

- A UN resolution would be helpful in cementing support both internationally and in the UK for any military action against the Iraqi regime. It would, however, be important not to become boxed in by stating that a UN Security Council resolution would be a necessary pre-condition for military action against the Iraqi regime.
- Saddam Hussein was in breach of nine UN resolutions. He could avert action by the international community if he were to abide by those resolutions.
- It was important to encourage the US to remain engaged in the Middle East and to take account of the concerns of the international community, including the Secretary-General of the UN.

[242] Cabinet Conclusions, 11 April 2002.

- The impact of events in the Middle East on attitudes among the ethnic minorities in the UK, and the encouragement that could give to political extremists, should not be under-estimated.

662. Mr Blair concluded that it was important to maintain the maximum possible level of international support for policy towards the Middle East, including Iraq. Given the impossibility of foreseeing precisely how events would unfold, it was important for the Government not to “tie its hands”. If Saddam Hussein were to reject a clear ultimatum on the return of weapons inspectors, there would be widespread understanding of the need to take appropriate action.

663. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote that there had been “a full Cabinet discussion” after the visit on 11 April “where we set out our objectives”.[243]

664. Asked whether the Cabinet was discussing regime change and how it might have been effected, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> “… from 11 April … the Cabinet was discussing this. We are going to have to deal with this issue now. Everybody knew that the Americans were taking a different and stronger line. The issue was very simple. He [Saddam Hussein] either had a change of heart, or regime change was on the agenda. That was clear from the minutes, from the discussion at Cabinet and indeed from the whole of the public discourse around this.
> “Now you could have regime change happening in a number of different ways. There didn’t need to be military action but the likelihood was that’s what would happen.”[244]

665. Lord Wilson confirmed that the flavour of the discussion was of turmoil in the Middle East and the Arab world, although “we were left in no doubt by Crawford … that the Americans wanted regime change”, which “in a sense” was “not news”. In addition to Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, four Cabinet Ministers had spoken on Iraq.[245]

666. Lord Wilson described Mr Blair’s report to Cabinet on 11 April as:

> “… skilfully touching on the things Cabinet had been concerned about and reassuring them that nothing was imminent and he was using his influence to bring the American President in the direction he wanted to go. Indeed, I think he may have been congratulated by one Cabinet Minister on shifting American thinking in … the direction of the United [Nations].”[246]

667. Lord Wilson added that he did not think “anyone would have gone away thinking they had authorised a course of action likely to lead to military action”.

668. Mr Straw continued to make clear, as he had suggested in his letter of 25 March, that action in support of regime change in Iraq would be justified only as a means to remove the threat from WMD.

669. SIS activity was discussed in a meeting with Mr Straw and Mr Wright on 11 April.[247]

670. Mr McDonald's record of the meeting stated that Mr Straw had noted that:

> "… legally and politically, regime change in Iraq was justified only as a means to the end of removing the threat of their WMD. If Saddam Hussein were to allow in weapons inspectors, that would change the equation: to seek regime change would no longer be possible for us because our desired end state would have been achieved."

671. Mr Straw also agreed with Mr Wright that the focus was on operations which built up the forces of opposition and democracy.

The perceptions of key officials

672. The evidence offered to the Inquiry and accounts in memoirs provide some indications of the perceptions held by key officials about the UK's strategy before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford.

673. In his memoir, Sir Christopher Meyer described his view of the position before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush.[248] He wrote that the debate about Iraq in Washington "had become deafening", although on the eve of Mr Blair's visit the escalating violence between Israel and the Palestinians had "reached such a pitch that for a while it pushed Iraq into the background". It had been clear to him that President Bush was:

> "… determined to implement the official American policy of regime change; but the how and when … were uncertain. It made war probable but not inevitable … There were one or two people in Washington, whose judgement I respected, who thought that when Bush finally realised the scale of his Iraqi ambition, he would see that the risk was too great.
> "It was time to put our fix into American thinking before it coagulated …"

674. Sir Christopher added:

> "The central issue was to influence the Americans. Blair had already taken the decision to support regime change, though he was discreet about saying so in public. It would be fruitless to challenge a fixed … policy that had bipartisan support in the US. It was hard to see how Saddam could be de-fanged without being removed from power. Blair was also wedded to the proposition that, to have influence in Washington, it was necessary to hug the Americans close …”

675. Sir Christopher wrote that “Support for regime change caused deep concern inside the Foreign Office.” There were questions about the legal basis and uncertainties about the consequences of action. Those were tough questions on which the UK wanted the US to focus. In his conversation with Mr Wolfowitz on 17 March, Sir Christopher had taken his cue from Sir David Manning’s exchanges with Dr Rice, and:

“To reinforce my credentials as something to say worth listening to, I emphasised the Prime Minister’s commitment to regime change. I wanted Wolfowitz to know that we were starting from the same premise, and that in Britain it was not without political cost. It was the diplomacy of ‘Yes, but …”

676. Sir Christopher described the approach as identifying tough questions which would need to be answered if the US wanted coalition partners and support from the international community, including the need for a “clever plan which convinced people that there was a legal basis for toppling Saddam”.

677. Sir Christopher told the Inquiry that, in his speech at College Station on 7 April 2002, Mr Blair had tried to:

“… draw the lessons of 9/11 and apply them to the situation in Iraq, which led, I think, not inadvertently, but deliberately, to a conflation of the threat by Usama Bin Laden and Saddam Hussein.”[249]

678. Sir Christopher added that the speech represented “a tightening of the UK/US alliance and the degree of convergence on the danger that Saddam Hussein presented”. It drew on Mr Blair’s speech on humanitarian intervention in Chicago in 1999, and “was a rather sophisticated argument for pre-emption”, that Saddam Hussein’s record was “too bad” and the potential threat he presented could not be ignored.

679. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that by the time Mr Blair and President Bush met at Crawford:

“… they weren’t there to talk about containment or sharpening sanctions. There had been a sea change in attitudes in the US Administration to which the British Government, progressively from October [2001] onwards, had to adapt and make up its mind where it stood.”[250]

680. In his statement, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

“I was aware of the theoretical option to promote regime change through the use of force; but it was not until February or March 2002 that I heard that serious preparations might have begun in Washington for an attack on Iraq. Even then I gave these relatively little credence … my conception of the difficulties and downsides of taking on such a task outweighed my understanding of the determination of the Bush Administration to undertake such an initiative."[251]

681. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

"It wasn't until the Crawford meeting … that I realised that the United Kingdom was being drawn into quite a different sort of discussion, but that discussion was not made totally visible to me … nor did I have any instructions to behave any differently in the United Nations as a result of what might have been going on in bilateral discussions with the United States.

"… I wasn't being politically naive, but I wasn't being politically informed either, and I had a job to do to maximise the strength of the United Nations instruments on Iraq at the time … and that continued to mean acting under the resolutions we had."[252]

682. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry:

"Our view, the Prime Minister's view, the British Government's view throughout this episode was that the aim was disarmament. It was not regime change. The Prime Minister never made any secret of the fact that if the result of disarming Saddam was regime change, he thought this would be a positive thing, but, for the Americans, it was. It was, 'We want regime change in order to disarm Saddam Hussein.'"[253]

683. Sir David told the Inquiry that at Crawford Mr Blair was saying:

"Yes, there is a route through this that is a peaceful and international one, and it is through the UN, but, if it doesn't work, we will be ready to undertake regime change."[254]

684. Sir David Manning believed Mr Blair had wanted to influence US policy towards Iraq:

"I think that when it became clear … that the United States was thinking of moving its policy forward towards regime change, he [Mr Blair] wanted to try and influence the United States and get it to stay in the UN, to go the UN route, which is what we spent the rest of the year trying to do, but he was willing to signal that he accepted that disarmament might not be achieved through the UN route.

"But I don't think he felt … that these were moments of decision in February and March before he went to Crawford. I think he saw that much more as an attempt to find out where the Americans had got to, but to impress on them his own conviction that we needed to ensure that inspections were continued.”[255]

685. Asked whether the US had already changed tack, Sir David replied:

“I think you are right about the Americans moving onto a different track … the perception … was that containment was probably finished … but I don’t think, at that stage, there was a view in London … that we had completely given up on containment. We were waiting … to see what sort of pressure the US would produce in the light of the debate that we knew was taking place in handling Iraq.

“Our concern … and the Prime Minister’s view … was that it [action on Iraq] must be retained within the United Nations … I don’t think he thought … that it was likely that the President … would accept containment any longer, and I suspect that he probably didn’t think containment was relevant any longer; but I think he did think that there was everything to play for in terms of trying to ensure that the Iraq problem remained managed in an international context, rather than that the Americans went unilaterally for regime change.”[256]

686. Asked when Iraq became a priority for the UK, Sir David Manning responded:

“In the early months of 2002 … we knew that we had to deal with Iraq as a more pressing priority because the US Administration were going to insist on making it more prominent. They were concerned about a threat from Iraq in a new way because they believed threats internationally were now threats they had to meet rather than contain.

“… Iraq was given a salience, it was given an importance because the US Administration was determined to confront the international community over this perceived threat. Therefore we had to respond to that.”[257]

687. Asked about the rationale for focusing on Iraq in the early months of 2002, Sir David Manning replied:

“… because the US Administration was determined to confront the international community over this perceived threat. Therefore, we had to respond to that … This was something that the Prime Minister wanted resolved in an international context … he wanted the inspectors to be reintroduced into Iraq … and he believed international pressure was the best way of trying to ensure that happened, and that in turn was the best way of managing the Iraq crisis that had been given a new prominence by an American Administration that was no longer willing to settle for containment.”[258]

688. Mr Campbell told the Inquiry that he disagreed with Sir Christopher Meyer's analysis that Mr Blair's position had shifted from a policy of containment and disarmament to one of regime change.[259] He described Mr Blair's policy, before Crawford, at Crawford and afterwards as "to pursue disarmament of Saddam Hussein through the United Nations".

689. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the policy:

> "… was to persuade the Americans to take a multilateral approach, to put the focus on the UN, to give Saddam a chance to comply with the UN Resolutions and to force the issue there … the only way you can get Saddam's attention is by the threat of military force."[260]

690. Mr Powell added that it was "a shift to a policy of disarmament through the UN", leading to military action and regime change, "If that is what was necessary to remove the threat of weapons of mass destruction".

691. Asked whether he thought "the Foreign and Defence Secretaries were trying to pull back on the Prime Minister's reins in giving advice", Sir David Manning told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, I think probably I did. How far, I'm not sure, but … certainly the Foreign Secretary was keen … to make it very clear there were risks … and not to be more forward than was wise for the Government, especially when he didn't know exactly where the policy was going to take us … I think it probably was an attempt to say let's just see where the Americans are going on this. It's a position I would certainly sympathise with."[261]

692. In the context of a reference during his evidence about his visit to the US in March 2002, to his strong personal view that the issue was disarmament not regime change, Sir David Manning was asked how much he was trying to influence Mr Blair.[262] Sir David responded that he:

> "… certainly argued strongly for the UN route with the Prime Minister, and subsequently argued very strongly that we needed two resolutions. I also argued very strongly with him that we needed more time."

693. Sir David added, "that's what you are paid for". Mr Blair had wanted to know what he thought.

694. Asked about the rationale for focusing on Iraq first, Sir David responded that he thought there were a number of reasons. One was:

> “… that the Americans were determined to focus on it. We weren’t given a choice … In the international system, whether it wanted to have a good look at Iraq at this point or not, it really had no option because Bush was going to do this …
> “The question was therefore how far you could get inside the argument and try and shape it and shape what happened, and I think that’s where the Prime Minister was in April. They are going to do something. We have to try and be in a position to affect the policy.
> “He believed … that given his own relationship with Bush, he probably had a good chance of doing that. So therefore he was determined to have that discussion, though … he didn’t need any persuading that Iraq was a problem … he felt Iraq was a serious destabilising influence in the system, but I don’t want to pretend that it would have been his top priority at this stage if it hadn’t been one of Bush’s top priorities … it wouldn’t …”[263]

695. Asked whether Mr Blair was more forward leaning about getting rid of Saddam Hussein than his principal advisers, including Sir David himself, Sir David responded that, in terms of Mr Blair’s position as a very prominent actor on the international stage:

> “Iraq fits into a pattern … interventionism in the Balkans … Kosovo … Sierra Leone … Afghanistan, he’s very much an activist … much more inclined to push and take the bold action than probably other members of his Cabinet.”[264]

696. Asked if Mr Blair would have listened to a contrary opinion if one had been “argued powerfully” at the Chequers meeting, Sir David told the Inquiry that Mr Blair would have listened but:

> “… he was somebody who was very comfortable with his own convictions … believed he had a capacity to influence the international system in quite profound ways, had a quite a lot of success doing this … he had a sense that he could actually act for the good, he could change things, and that this was absolutely a role that he felt he could command.”[265]

697. Sir David added:

> “I don’t want to suggest he’s not open to argument … He was absolutely up for argument and didn’t hold it against you. But I think this is part of a deep conviction that there are moments when you can change things, you’ve got to have the courage to do it, and he was up for that.”[266]

> "I think it was to find out where Bush was going [on Iraq] … What did Bush really think and what were Bush's intentions […]
> "… he said to me afterwards … Bush is interested in going the international route and he's not simply going to become – I can't remember his wording – the creature of the American right or something like this."
> "He came away … reassured that it was quite possible to persuade Bush to use the international system, rather than to bypass it."[267]

699. Sir David Manning did not believe that in April and May 2002 Mr Blair:

> "… made his mind up he was going to send troops. I think he was always ready to do it, but he always hoped he wouldn't have to … I certainly didn't feel [Crawford] was a moment of decision, no."[268]

700. Sir David added that the discussion at Crawford had been "evolutionary" but it had "crystallised the sense that we had that American thinking had gone up a gear".

701. Sir David stated:

> "But I think the reality, as far as the … international politics were concerned, that the Americans were focused on Iraq, and the issue was how we were going to manage this."[269]

702. Asked where the UK emphasis was on the policy options when he joined No.10 in February 2002, Mr Matthew Rycroft, one of Mr Blair's two Private Secretaries for Foreign Affairs, told the Inquiry:

> "From my recollection by the time I joined Downing Street the British Government had essentially decided that continued containment was not going to work … we were on a track of … dealing with Iraq's WMD … what dealing meant was to be determined by the policy over the coming months."[270]

703. Mr Rycroft told the Inquiry:

> "Undoubtedly the thought was in the Prime Minister's mind that if at the end of this we were going to go down the military intervention route, then … the aftermath would be many years."[271]

704. Mr Rycroft added that Mr Blair would have seen the advice he had received from the Defence and Foreign Secretaries as “caution verging on sort of unnecessarily pessimistic”.[272]

Mr Blair’s evidence

705. Mr Blair set out his position on the preparations for Crawford and the position he adopted in his discussions with President Bush in his evidence to the Inquiry in 2010 and 2011, and in his memoir in 2010.

706. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that, after the Cabinet Office ‘Options Paper’ in March 2002, there were “a whole series of government discussions about smart sanctions”.[273]

707. Asked how the options on Iraq had been identified and reviewed, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that a decision had been taken after 11 September:

> “… that this issue had to be confronted … It could be confronted by an effective sanctions framework. It could be confronted by Saddam allowing the inspectors back in to do their work properly and compliance with the UN resolutions, or, in the final analysis … if sanctions could not contain him and he was not prepared to allow the inspectors back in, then the option of removing Saddam was there.”[274]

708. Asked whether he had had a meeting to discuss the ‘Options Paper’ and take decisions on it, Mr Blair told the Inquiry he had talked to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, there had been a meeting of “the key people to decide where we were then going to go”, and the meeting at Chequers had been a “very structured debate”.[275]

709. Mr Blair confirmed that the ‘Options Paper’ had not been discussed in Cabinet.[276]

710. Mr Blair subsequently told the Inquiry:

> “Well, the ‘Options Paper’ really said two things. It said you can either go for containment. We can’t guarantee that that’s successful. He will probably continue to develop his programmes and be a threat, but nonetheless that is one option. The other option is regime change.”[277]

711. Mr Blair added:

> “… there’s nothing in those papers … that wasn’t surfaced as part of the discussion … [which] all the way through was: what is the judgment? … That was certainly part of the discussion that was going on in Cabinet. Now you can say, and I would be perfectly happy if you did say, look it is better to disclose all those or give everybody a copy of those papers. I certainly didn't say they shouldn't be, but the content of those papers, that is something that was very, very adequately discussed and the issue was clear in the end. There was not a great dispute about what we thought about the facts. The facts were he is continuing to develop WMD. He has the intention of doing that. It is crucial to his regime. On the other hand, so far we have contained him."

712. Asked what Admiral Boyce had advised (at Chequers), Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the concern was to make sure that the UK "got alongside" any US planning and "did it [the military campaign] as quickly as possible".[278]

713. Mr Blair described the Chequers meeting in his memoir as a meeting:

"… with senior army officers … not specifically in preparation for Crawford, but to kick around the basic questions of what military action might entail. There had been discussion about whether our aim was focused on WMD or regime change. I had emphasised that the two were linked, and also that it was hard at this point to say that the nature of the WMD threat specific to Iraq had changed demonstrably in the last few years. It was the assessment of risk that had."[279]

714. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that, after the meeting at Chequers and before the meeting with President Bush, there had been "quite an intensive interaction on this whole issue … smart sanctions, because I needed to get a sense of whether this policy … was really going to be a runner or not".[280]

715. Asked whether by the time of the meeting at Crawford he had reached the point of regarding the removal of Saddam Hussein's regime as a valid objective of UK policy, Mr Blair responded:

"No, the absolutely key issue was the WMD issue …"[281]

716. Asked what he intended to achieve at Crawford, Mr Blair replied he intended:

"… to get a real sense from the Americans as to what they wanted to do, and this would be best done between myself and President Bush, and really to get a sense of how our own strategy was going to have to evolve in the light of that."[282]

717. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that "nothing was actually decided at Crawford", and explained the importance of a "close and strong relationship" between a British Prime Minister and the President of the US and being able to discuss what the issues were "in a very frank way". His conversation with President Bush had been "less to do with the specifics about what we were going to do on Iraq" or the Middle East. The principal part of the conversation had been about his view that “dealing with the various different dimensions” of the “whole issue … to do with unrepresentative extremism within Islam in a different way”. He “wanted to persuade President Bush, but also get a sense from him where he was on that broader issue”.[283]

718. Mr Blair added:

> “The only commitment I gave, and I gave this very openly, at the meeting was a commitment to deal with Saddam.”[284]

719. Asked whether he and President Bush were agreed on the ends but not the means, Mr Blair replied:

> “We were agreed on both … we were agreed that we had to confront this issue, that Saddam had to come back into compliance with the international community, and … the method is open …
> “… one major part of what President Bush was saying to me was just to express his fear … that if we weren’t prepared to act in a really strong way, then we ran the risk of sending a disastrous signal to the world.”[285]

720. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he could not “explain how people have come to the view that there was some different commitment given”. What he had said to President Bush was “we are going to be with you in confronting and dealing with this threat”, as he had said at the subsequent press conference.[286]

721. Asked what conclusions President Bush would have taken from the meeting about his commitment to deal with Saddam Hussein through military action, Mr Blair replied:

> “I think he took … exactly what he should have taken, which is that, if it came to military action because there was no way of dealing with this diplomatically, we would be with him … because, as I had set out publicly … we had to confront this issue, it could be confronted by a sanctions framework that was effective … we didn’t have one. It could be confronted by a UN inspections framework … or, alternatively, it would have to be confronted by force … We had been through this with Saddam several times … the fact is that force was always an option. What changed after September 11 was this, if necessary, and there was no other way of dealing with this threat, we were going to remove him.”[287]

722. Asked whether the commitment had been given for tactical reasons, Mr Blair replied:

> "It wasn't so much for tactical reasons … I believed if you wanted to make a real change to this whole issue – this is very important to understanding … my strategic thinking …
> "What I believed we confronted was a new threat … based, not on political ideology, but on religious fanaticism …
> "What I was trying to set out, not for tactical reasons, but for deep strategic reasons, is: what did we need to do to make a successful assault on this ideology that was so dangerous? Therefore, the Middle East Peace Process was absolutely fundamental … to dealing with this issue."[288]

723. Asked if there was an identity of view at the meeting on how to deal with Iraq, Mr Blair replied:

> "We were of course pushing the UN route … the American view was regime change … because they didn't believe Saddam would ever, in good faith, give up his WMD ambitions or programmes."[289]

724. Asked if his view of the means to achieve the objective was different from the US because it was not keen on the UN route, Mr Blair replied:

> "We did have to persuade them [the US], although I think it is fair to say that, even at that meeting [Crawford], President Bush made it clear that America would have to adjust policy if Saddam let the inspectors back in and the inspectors were able to function properly."[290]

725. Addressing the key messages in his speech at College Station, Mr Blair drew the Inquiry's attention to his argument that the international community should not shrink from confronting regimes which were "engaged in terror or WMD". Some could be offered "a route to respectability" but, in relation to Iraq the point he was making was that:

> "… the issue was very simple … the need to make absolutely clear that from now on you did not defy the international community on WMD."[291]

726. Mr Blair added that when a regime was brutal and oppressive it was a bigger threat when it possessed WMD than "otherwise benign" regimes.[292]

727. Mr Blair said that Iraq posed a “conjoined” threat, “it was an appalling regime and we couldn’t run the risk of such a regime being allowed to develop WMD”.[293]

728. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the American position, after the passage of the Iraq Liberation Act in 1998, was “for regime change” because it did not “trust he [Saddam Hussein] is ever going to give up his WMD ambitions”. The UK position was: “We have to deal with WMD ambitions. If that means regime change, so be it.” Mr Blair’s view was that they were “different ways of expressing the same proposition”.[294]

729. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that “planning was inevitable and right, not because war was inevitable but because it was an option and … had to be planned for”. The meeting in Crawford was “the first time we got to grips with it [Iraq] properly”.[295]

730. Mr Blair continued:

> “From my standpoint, by this time, I had resolved in my own mind that removing Saddam would do the world, and most particularly the Iraqi people, a service. Though I knew regime change could not be our policy, I viewed a change with enthusiasm not dismay.
> “In my Chicago speech of 1999, I had enunciated the new doctrine of a ‘responsibility to protect’, i.e. that a government could not be free grossly to oppress and brutalise its citizens. I had put that into effect in Kosovo and Sierra Leone.
> “… because war should be the last not the first resort, I had come to a firm conclusion that we could only do it on the basis of non-compliance with UN resolutions. Tyrant though he was, Saddam could not be removed on the basis of tyranny alone.
> “… I was clear about two things.
> “The first was that Saddam had to be made to conform to the UN resolutions …
> “The second was that Britain had to remain … ‘shoulder to shoulder’ with America. This is not as crude or unthinking a policy as it sounds. It didn’t mean we sacrificed our interest to theirs; or subcontracted out our foreign policy. It meant that the alliance between our two nations was a vital strategic interest and, as far as I was concerned, a vital strategic asset for Britain.
> “It implied we saw attacks on the US as attacks on us … It argued for an attitude that did see us genuinely as at war together, with a common interest in a successful outcome … our job as an ally … should be to be with them in their hour of need.

I know all this can be made to sound corny or even … self-deceiving in terms of our effect on US decision-making. I was well aware that ultimately the US would take its own decisions in its own interests. But I was also aware that … Britain and Europe were going to face a much more uncertain future without America … our alliance with the US mattered …

"So when they had need of us, were we really going to refuse; or, even worse, hope they succeeded but could do it without us? I reflected and felt the weight of an alliance and its history, not oppressively but insistently, a call to duty, a call to act, a call to be at their side, not distant from it, when they felt imperilled."[296]

731. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote:

"We needed to get alongside that [US] planning and be part of it. Of course, as ever, that presented a dilemma: If you wanted to be part of the planning, you had to be, at least in principle, open to being part of the action early on, because I could see … this might have to end with Saddam's forcible removal, I resolved to be part of the planning. From around April, we were then fairly closely involved even in the early stages of US thinking.

"None of this meant that war was certain. It wasn't and indeed a constant part of the interaction between George and myself through those months, probably up to around November, was acute anxiety that since we were planning for the possible, that meant in the media mind that it was inevitable. We had the basic concepts ironed out: Saddam had to comply with the UN resolutions and let the inspectors back in: he couldn't, on this occasion, be allowed to mess about – his compliance had to be total; and if he refused we were going to be in a position where we were capable of removing him. So the diplomacy and the planning proceeded along separate but plainly at certain points connected tracks.

"It made domestic politics, however, highly uncomfortable. Naturally people were reading the reports, assuming everything was decided and taking positions accordingly. If we said that war was not agreed, they asked if we were planning; if we accepted we were doing some form of planning, that meant war was indeed agreed. The notion of a contingency was too subtle. And, to be fair, many of the noises emanating from parts of the US system did suggest that there was only one direction in which policy should go."[297]

732. In his account of the discussions with President Bush, Mr Blair wrote:

"Behind closed doors … our talk was more nuanced. We shared the analysis about the nature of the Saddam government, its risk to security and also the wider problems of the region. My concern then and subsequently was to locate the question of Saddam in the broader context of the Middle East as a region in transition. Even then, though less clearly than today, I saw the disparate issues as essentially part of the same picture. Therefore I made a major part of my pitch to George the issue of the Israeli-Palestine peace process. To me this was the indispensable soft-power component to give equilibrium to the hard power that was necessary if Saddam was to be removed.”[298]

733. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair if there was “an explicit, recorded statement of what the UK’s objectives were in April 2002”, and how they had been agreed.[299] It also asked:

- what the UK objectives were in September 2002 and what process had been used to revise those objectives between April and September;
- how the US had interpreted comments in his meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld on 5 June and in his Note to President Bush on 28 July; and whether he had any concerns that that “pre-empted collective discussion” with Cabinet colleagues.

734. In his statement Mr Blair chose to address those points together, writing:

“Though the meeting at Crawford provides a convenient breakpoint for the purposes of the narrative, I want to stress it did not result in an alteration of policy. The policy had been clear since 9/11: we wanted to take a tougher line altogether on terrorism and WMD globally, and sought to bring Saddam into compliance with UN authority … [T]he Crawford meeting was … a chance to explain how best to implement it … Prior to the visit I had studied the Cabinet Office Options Paper, together with recent JIC reports. I had also had the Chequers meeting with CDS and read-outs of the military interaction with Washington.

“The objectives of our policy were not secret. They were set out in numerous statements by myself and other Ministers …

“The objective never changed between April and September 2002. It remained … to bring Saddam back to full and unconditional compliance with UN resolutions in respect of which he had been in breach for over a decade. It was absolutely clear that we were going to be with the US in implementing this objective. There can be no-one who was in any doubt about my determination on that score. I expressed it publicly. I made it clear also to President Bush I would be with him in tackling it … I could not and did not offer some kind of ‘blank cheque’ in how we accomplished our shared objective … I would never engage in any military campaign our military thought unwise or unachievable. What I was signalling was there would be no withdrawal of support for something we thought right and do-able, simply for reasons of political pressure, i.e. I was going to be steadfast as an ally … I sent this signal both because I believed in the substance and because we would be right alongside the US thinking from the outset.

> "My public pronouncements – especially at Crawford … and in the speech the next day, could have left no-one in any doubt as to my position."[300]

735. In his statement, Mr Blair wrote that there had been "a full Cabinet discussion" after the visit on 11 April "where we set out our objectives", and that:

> "The issues were regularly debated in Cabinet. I was answering questions on it, giving press interviews. It was a dominant news issue. I was constantly interacting on it, therefore, with colleagues, MPs and the media, and in the most plain terms."[301]

736. Asked if the meeting with President Bush at Crawford had been a turning point, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "It wasn't a turning point. It was really that all the way through we were saying this issue now has to be dealt with. So Saddam either comes back into compliance with UN resolutions or action will follow."[302]

Conclusions

737. As a means to sustain international support for a policy of containment and improve its effectiveness, the UK continued to pursue agreement to measures for implementation of the smarter economic sanctions regime, agreed in November 2001, in the first months of 2002.

738. But continuing divisions between Permanent Members of the Security Council meant there was no agreement on the way forward on the re-admission of weapons inspectors and establishing the verification and monitoring regime identified in resolution 1284 (1999). Without inspections, there was no route for Iraq to secure the lifting of economic sanctions.

739. There were clear signals from Washington that the US Administration was determined to deal with Iraq and key figures were contemplating military action to achieve regime change.

740. The JIC assessment of 27 February and the Cabinet Office 'Options Paper' of 8 March concluded that a large scale ground invasion was the only sure way to remove Saddam Hussein.

741. In public statements at the end of February and in the first week of March 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Straw set out the view that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with.

742. Iraq needed to disarm or be disarmed in accordance with the obligations imposed by the UN; and that it was important to agree to the return of UN inspectors to Iraq.

743. The focus on Iraq was not the result of a step change in Iraq’s capabilities or intentions.

744. Although the possibility of future military action provided the context for the discussion at Cabinet on 7 March, Mr Blair and Mr Straw emphasised that no decisions had been taken and Cabinet was not being asked to take decisions.

745. The discussion was couched in terms of Iraq’s need to comply with its obligations and future choices by the international community on how to respond to the threat which Iraq represented.

746. Cabinet endorsed the conclusion that Iraq’s WMD programmes posed a threat to peace and a strategy of engaging closely with the US Government in order to shape policy and its presentation. But it did not discuss how that might be achieved.

747. Mr Blair sought and was given information on a range of issues before his meeting with President Bush. But no formal and agreed analysis of the issues and options was sought or produced; and there was no collective consideration of such advice.

748. The advice offered to Mr Blair by Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Mr Powell assumed that the US objective would be regime change and that the UK would be likely to support US-led military action in some circumstances if that could be shown to be necessary to eliminate Iraq’s WMD.

749. At Crawford, Mr Blair offered President Bush a partnership in dealing urgently with the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. He proposed a strategy based on an ultimatum calling on Iraq to permit the return of weapons inspectors or face the consequences.

750. Mr Blair’s approach reflected the thinking in Mr Straw’s advice of 25 March. Proposing that the US and UK should seek an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein to readmit weapons inspectors provided a route for the UK to align itself with the US without adopting the US objective of regime change.

751. President Bush agreed to consider the idea but there was no decision until September 2002.

752. It was subsequently reported that, in his discussions with President Bush, Mr Blair set out a number of considerations in relation to the development of policy on Iraq, which were subsequently described by others as “conditions” for action (see Section 3.3).

753. Following his meeting with President Bush, Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein had to be confronted and brought back into compliance with the UN.

754. The statements made in public by Mr Blair clearly implied the use of force in the event that Saddam Hussein failed to comply with an ultimatum.

755. The acceptance of the possibility that the UK might participate in a military invasion of Iraq was a profound change in UK thinking. Although no decisions had been taken, that became the basis for contingency planning in the months ahead.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the development of UK policy on Iraq following Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford on 5 and 6 April 2002, at which Mr Blair proposed a partnership between the US and UK urgently to deal with the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's regime, including Mr Blair's Note to President Bush at the end of July proposing that the US and UK should use the UN to build a coalition for action.

2. This Section does not address:

- the development of a dossier setting out the publishable evidence on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD), the history of weapons inspections and Iraq's human rights abuses, which is addressed in Section 4.1; or
- MOD work on possible options for a UK contribution to a future military operation, which is addressed in Section 6.1.

3. The roles and responsibilities of key individuals and bodies are described in Section 2.

Key findings

- By July 2002, the UK Government had concluded that President Bush was impatient to move on Iraq and that the US might take military action in circumstances that would be difficult for the UK.
- Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July sought to persuade President Bush to use the UN to build a coalition for action by seeking a partnership with the US and setting out a framework for action.
- Mr Blair told President Bush that the UN was the simplest way to encapsulate a "casus belli" in some defining way, with an ultimatum to Iraq once military forces started to build up in October. That might be backed by a UN resolution.
- Mr Blair's Note, which had not been discussed or agreed with his colleagues, set the UK on a path leading to diplomatic activity in the UN and the possibility of participation in military action in a way that would make it very difficult for the UK subsequently to withdraw its support for the US.

Development of UK policy, April to June 2002

A UK contribution to US-led military action

4. After Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford, the MOD began seriously to consider what UK military contribution might be made to any US-led military action and the need for a plausible military plan for the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime.

5. In his letter to Mr Blair of 22 March 2002 (see Section 3.2), Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, had cautioned that, "before any decision to commit British forces, we ought to know that the US has a militarily plausible plan with a reasonable prospect of success compared to the risks and within the framework of international law".[1]

6. Mr Hoon had also suggested UK involvement in US planning would "improve" the US process and enable Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS) to either "reassure you that there is a sound military plan or give you a basis to hold back if the US cannot find a sensible scheme".

7. Much of the discussion at Crawford took place privately between the two leaders.[2] Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), recorded that the meeting on Saturday morning was informed of a number of points, including:

- There was no war plan for Iraq.
- Thinking so far had been on a broad, conceptual level.
- A very small cell in Central Command (CENTCOM) in Florida had recently been set up to do some planning and to think through the various options.
- When the US had done that, US and UK planners would be able to sit down together to examine the options.
- The US and UK would work through the issues together.

8. Sir David Manning also recorded that Mr Blair had concluded President Bush probably wanted to build a coalition.

9. Mr Hoon discussed Iraq with Adm Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), on 8 April (see Section 6.1). He commissioned work on military options as a "precaution against the possibility that military action might have to be taken at some point in the future".[3]

10. On 12 April, Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, sent Mr Hoon a "think piece" to give context to the work on Iraq.[4]

11. Mr Webb explored potential end states for military action in Iraq in the context of Mr Blair's "commitment to regime change ('if necessary and justified')" in his speech at College Station on 7 April. Mr Webb added that:

- "Commitment on timing has been avoided and an expectation has developed that no significant operation will be mounted while major violence continues in Israel/Palestine."
- "Both Crawford and contacts with the Pentagon confirm that US thinking has not identified either a successor or a constitutional restructuring to provide a more representational regime: Various ideas for replacements have been aired over the years and none so far look convincing …"

12. Mr Webb's view was that "the prospects for finding a stable political solution" were "poor in the short term". The US had "sufficient forces to undertake a military operation … without anyone else's help"; but to "achieve a successful regime change, the UK would need to be actively involved (one might also argue that the Prime Minister has effectively committed us)".

13. Mr Webb set out the MOD's thinking on military issues. On the way forward, he wrote:

"Despite the massive scale of commitment, there are arguments that preventing the spread of WMD should be given the highest priority in coming years … [I]t remains the greatest risk to Middle East and international stability in the medium-term; and in the long-term countries like Iraq and Iran are on course to threaten Europe and UK direct. It is arguable that preventing this spread by making an example of Saddam Hussein would do more for long-term stability than all the displaced [military] activities combined …

"By demonstrating our capacity for high intensity warfare at large scale [the deployment of a division] the UK would also send a powerful deterrence message to other potential WMD proliferators and adversaries.

"… There would come a point at which preparations could apply some valuable pressure on Saddam; or be seen as a natural reaction to prevarication over inspections. In general … until that point … we should keep a low profile …"

14. Mr Webb concluded:

"Even these preparatory steps would properly need a Cabinet Committee decision, based on a minute from the Defence Secretary …"

15. In April the MOD established "a small group of senior officials and military planners to think about the issues that would be involved in any military operation in Iraq, as the basis for initial contingency planning in the MOD".[5] That body, which was chaired by Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments) (DCDS(C) and was known as the Pigott Group, considered issues related to UK participation in a US-led ground offensive in Iraq. Participants included the FCO, the Cabinet Office and the intelligence Agencies.

16. The work of the Group is addressed in more detail in Sections 6.1 and 6.4.

JIC Assessment, 19 April 2002

17. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) judged on 19 April that it would be politically impossible for Arab states to support military action against Iraq.

18. Regional states would prefer UN inspections or covert operations to topple Saddam Hussein to a US-led attack, but US determination and a willingness to deploy overwhelming force could help bolster regional support.

19. There was consensus amongst Iraq's neighbours that its territorial integrity must be preserved.

20. At the request of the JIC, an Assessment of "Iraq's relations with its neighbours … what influence Iraq has over them and how it is trying to improve its position; where Iraq's neighbours' concerns and interests lie" and an evaluation of "the regional reactions so far to the prospects of a US-led attack on Iraq" was produced on 19 April.[6]

21. During the discussion of the draft, the JIC had been told that Israel's attack on Jenin in the Occupied Territories had produced a "seismic shift" and there were "few, if any, Arab countries who would support a strike against Iraq".[7]

22. The JIC asked for the position of Iran and Saudi Arabia to be brought out more clearly in the final Assessment.

23. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- "The current Israel/ Palestinian crisis makes Arab support for an attack on Iraq politically impossible at present. There is no sign that strong anti-US sentiment will dissipate quickly, even if there is progress towards an equitable resolution of the Palestinian issue."
- "Iraq exerts considerable economic leverage over Jordan and Syria. Iraqi propaganda successfully plays up Iraq's suffering under sanctions. And Iraq uses its support for the Palestinians to gain popularity in the Arab street."
- "But Iraq has no real allies. Iran, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia remain concerned by Iraq's conventional military capabilities. Iran is also concerned by its development of WMD."
- "Turkey would probably be willing to provide basing for a US-led attack on Iraq … Saudi Arabia is very unlikely to provide basing for an attack, though it might permit overflights. A strong case for action would need to be made. US determination and willingness to deploy overwhelming force could help bolster regional support. However, all would strongly prefer covert operations to topple Saddam rather than a full-scale attack."

---

[7] Minutes, 17 April 2002, JIC meeting.

- "Regional states would prefer UN inspections to a US-led attack on Iraq. Such an attack would provoke large-scale protests across the Arab world. Jordan would be particularly exposed to internal instability, but the Gulf States would also be nervous. None of Iraq's neighbours would regret Saddam's overthrow and none would provide practical … support for Iraq against a US-led attack."
- "There is consensus among Iraq's neighbours that its territorial integrity must be preserved, but there are great mutual suspicions and differences over the place of the Kurds and the Shia in any new Iraqi regime, the regime's nature and its relationship with the West."[8]

24. Key points from the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 19 April 2002: 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes'

The Assessment stated:

> "Arab attitudes towards Iraq, and particularly towards any prospective US-led attack, are inextricably linked to bilateral relations with the US, events on the ground in the Occupied Territories and perceived Western 'double standards' in favour of Israel … We judge that, in the present circumstances, even the most pro-Western Gulf States […] would find it politically impossible to support a US-led attack on Iraq. We judge it unlikely that the current strong anti-US sentiment will dissipate quickly. Only significant progress towards what the Arab world would see as an equitable resolution of the Palestinian issue would mitigate this. Even if this is achieved, recent events in the West Bank will make it harder in the medium-term to win regional support for military action against Iraq."

Iraq-related concerns had "dropped significantly down the Arab agenda" and Iraq was "rarely perceived as the greatest security threat within the region". The Gulf States saw "Iran as the greater long-term threat and want an Iran-Iraq balance".

The "conjunction of the threat of US military action and the pressure in the UN to permit the return of weapons inspectors" had "led Iraq to pursue a revitalised foreign policy". That had included:

- talks with the UN Secretary-General;
- several attempts to win over its neighbours;
- an Iraqi declaration at the Arab League Summit on 27 March 2002 that it recognised Kuwait's sovereignty and independence;
- a marked decline in the number of militant attacks on Iran which suggested that Iraq had "at least temporarily restrained the MEK [Mujahideen e Khalq]"; and
- an Arab League resolution that its members would not support an outside attack on any other member.

Iraq's neighbours remained "suspicious of its intentions" and were "focused on economic gains".

[8] JIC Assessment, 19 April 2002, 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes'.

Addressing the longer term, the JIC stated:

> "… given real progress on Israel/Palestine, it might be possible to rebuild support for action against Iraq …"
> "… Saudi Arabia … has said it opposes an attack … Turkey, as a NATO ally, would probably provide basing if asked, despite its reservations […]."

Regional attitudes to an attack would "remain tentative" until US plans were "closer to completion and military preparations begin", but "a number of themes" were "already discernible". These included:

- "[G]overnments in the region would want any military campaign to be short and decisive."
- "[M]utual suspicions among Iraq's neighbours" meant regional co-operation was "likely to be minimal."
- Iran wanted "a greater role for the Iraqi Shia in a new regime, but any pro-Iran Shia regime, though unlikely would be anathema to the Gulf Arabs". Iran and Turkey were "keen not to set a precedent for their own Kurdish regions, […] A power vacuum could cause particular problems and might tempt Iran and/or Turkey to intervene."
- Gulf Monarchies might be "willing to support a representational Government, but would equate democracy with Shia rule".
- Iran's "sense of encirclement would be heightened by the presence of US forces, particularly if they remained in Iraq for an extended period".

In a concluding section entitled "Making the case", the JIC assessed:

> "For governments expected to support a US-led attack, the justification and evidence will be crucial in managing their public expectation. Given that we judge Iraq had no responsibility for … the 11 September terrorist attacks, Iraq's neighbours are likely to demand stronger proof of Iraq's development of WMD … using Saddam's brutal and repressive regime alone as a justification would not attract much support. A UN Security Council resolution authorising force would reduce regional governments' objections to an attack. Partly because their populations will not be persuaded by any likely justification for a military option, Iraq's neighbours, except for perhaps Kuwait, would prefer UN inspections to a US-led attack. […] Equally, it is possible that by offering to allow inspectors back into Iraq (even if he obstructed them) and making some new but limited concessions to the disarmament process, Saddam could strengthen his regional political position, at least in the short term."

Mr Blair's interview on BBC Breakfast with Frost, 21 April 2002

25. In an interview on BBC Breakfast with Frost on 21 April, primarily about the Budget, Mr David Frost asked Mr Blair how close action was on Iraq.[9] Mr Blair replied:

> "We have not taken any decisions on Iraq at all … we have identified weapons of mass destruction as a crucial issue … Saddam Hussein is a threat, the world would be better off without Saddam Hussein in power, but … we will not take decision 'til we have looked at all the options …"

26. Mr Blair added that Saddam Hussein should allow the weapons inspectors to return. That was what the United Nations had told him to do. Saddam Hussein was in breach of UN resolutions and needed to fulfil those obligations.

27. Asked whether there were differences between him and Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Blair said:

> "… all we have decided … is that weapons of mass destruction have to be dealt with … how we deal with it, however, is an open question."

28. Mr Blair's comments on Iraq's WMD capability and the timetable for the publication of the "dossier" on those capabilities are set out in Section 4.1.

Resolution 1409 (2002)

29. Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, was advised that there was little prospect of agreement in the Security Council to any language demanding the return of weapons inspectors.

30. A resolution implementing the "smart sanctions" regime was agreed on 14 May, but compromises were necessary to secure Russian support and tougher measures on tackling cross border smuggling were not included.

31. Since the adoption of resolution 1382 in November 2001, the UK had continued to pursue agreement on a new resolution introducing a smart sanctions regime.

32. Following Mr Blair's discussions with President Bush at Crawford, Mr Straw advised Mr Blair on 9 April that the shift in focus to the re-admission of weapons inspectors drew the UK "inexorably into the question of cover in international law" for military action in the event that, as Mr Straw suspected, Iraq failed to comply (see Section 3.2).[10]

33. Mr Charles Gray, Head of the FCO Middle East Department, wrote that Mr Straw asked for advice on:

- what, assuming a resolution authorising military action against Iraq is unachievable, we might hope to get in the Security Council to sustain the pressure on Iraq and to begin to build a legal base for possible military action; and

- whether the May resolution giving effect to the Goods Review List (GRL) agreed in November 2001 (resolution 1382) might "repeat in stronger terms the Council's demands for the unconditional return of the inspectors".[11]

34. Mr Gray advised that he did "not think there was any prospect in foreseeable circumstances" of getting a resolution "explicitly authorising military action"; and it was "conceivable" that this might lead to "severe pressure, to the point of facing a draft resolution forcing us to back away from this option altogether".

35. Mr Gray also advised:

- Officials were "strongly inclined not to jeopardise" the GRL resolution "by attempting to include military action language in its implementing resolution".
- The prospects for inserting language into the resolution "rolling over the Oil-for-Food programme" at the end of May "might be better", but UK actions on Iraq were "now subject to minute scrutiny in the Council". Russia and Syria would "quickly detect language which smacked of easing the justification for military action".
- It might be possible to insert a demand for the return of inspectors into the Oil-for-Food resolution but success would depend on the demands of other members. If the talks between Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, and Iraq made progress, the UK might seek a separate resolution calling for the return of inspectors; but the difficulties involved would be "considerable".

36. Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, told the Inquiry:

> "Towards the end of 2001, the Russians signalled to us that they might be more amenable to a smart sanctions regime … in February or so of 2002, the US … Secretary [of State] Colin Powell went serious on getting the smart sanctions regime and there was a series of bilateral negotiations between Washington and Moscow which was out of sight of the Security Council … The UK had no part in those negotiations."[12]

37. Cabinet was informed on 9 May that a revised system of sanctions was likely to be adopted by the UN.[13]

38. The Security Council adopted resolution 1409 on Iraq on 14 May. It introduced a new sanctions regime, with a revised GRL and new procedures for applications for licences to trade with Iraq, with effect from 30 May. Trade in commodities or products, other than military or military-related ones as defined in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991) or covered by the GRL, would be permitted. Applications for licences to trade still had to be scrutinised by the Office of the Iraq Programme, the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), and the 661 Committee; and exporters would still be paid through the UN escrow account established by resolution 986 (1995) only after verification by UN agents that items had arrived in Iraq.

39. Although the resolution was adopted unanimously, Syria made a statement arguing that it was time to lift sanctions against Iraq; it was unreasonable to impose sanctions for an unlimited period of time; and the Council had lost credibility by compelling some countries, and not others, to implement its resolutions. Syria rejected the "double standards … whereby Israel carried out its policy of blatant aggression against the Palestinian people, despite the statements of United Nations representatives concerning the war crimes that it [Israel] committed in Jenin".[14]

40. There was no reference in either the resolution or any statements in the Security Council to the need for clarification of resolution 1284 (1999) as requested by Iraq in its meeting with Mr Annan.

41. Nor was there discussion of a renewed call for Iraq to permit weapons inspectors to return to Iraq. That remained the subject of continuing talks between Iraq and Mr Annan and debate between the five Permanent Members (P5) of the Security Council.

42. Mr Straw informed Cabinet on 16 May that resolution 1409 had been adopted, and that the provision to limit scrutiny by the UN sanctions committee to applications to export military and dual-use equipment was a significant step forward in ensuring that the sanctions regime could not legitimately be blamed for causing humanitarian problems in Iraq.[15]

43. There was no further discussion of the policy.

44. In his written statement to the Inquiry, Mr Carne Ross, First Secretary responsible for the Middle East at the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York, stated that the UK's position on Iraq was under "unceasing pressure, mainly from Iraq's allies" in the Security Council:

> "… for sanctions to be eased to reward Iraq for past progress in disarming itself … and to incentivise Iraq to co-operate once more with the weapons inspectors. There was also significant concern over the humanitarian impact of sanctions … There was also a broader complaint, particularly in the Arab world, that the US/UK practised double standards in demanding the full implementation of resolutions on [15] Cabinet Conclusions, 16 May 2002.

Iraq, but ignoring Israel's failure to implement resolutions demanding that it leave the occupied Palestinian territories."[16]

45. Other points made by Mr Ross in his statement included:

- "… it was not our view in New York that containment was collapsing either through the ineffectiveness of sanctions or the deterioration of international support. While there were serious sanctions breaches, it was not the UK judgement that these permitted significant rearmament, which was our major concern …";
- "… the collapse of effective sanctions was not a foregone conclusion, as some witnesses have misleadingly suggested … we undertook … sustained and detailed work … to end Iraq's manipulation of the official price of its oil exports, so that it could extract an illegal 'surcharge' …"; and
- "… the UK never made any co-ordinated and sustained attempt to address sanctions busting."

46. Mr Ross subsequently told the Inquiry:

- "It [containment] was a continuing state, and … to maintain containment you had to constantly adjust it.[17]
- "… It is astonishing to me … that neither the US nor the UK did anything about Saddam's illegal bank accounts which we knew to exist in Jordan.[18]
- "Nobody questioned at all in the Security Council that the arms embargo should be lifted. I don't think there was a single country that said at any point we should let Iraq import arms again. I think the question was: what kind of controls, short of that, do we really need to make sure that Iraq's WMD is controlled …"[19]

47. Asked about pursuing resolution 1409 while the Bush Administration was planning regime change, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

"It was entirely natural to me that we should try and maximise containment of Iraq because I didn't see an alternative … So it was very welcome that we had a smart sanctions regime in [resolution] 1409, although that didn't mean … that there weren't other aspects of policy on Iraq that needed to be followed up.

"We needed to curtail smuggling, which was increasing through Jordan, Syria and Turkey, and which Secretary Powell had not expended a huge amount of effort on behalf of his Administration to close from early 2001 onwards, which surprised me."[20]

48. Subsequently, Sir Jeremy added:

> "Somehow, the need to stop smuggling through Syria got caught up with the need not to offend or to make too expensive the Turkish and Jordanian angles to this … I regarded it as a pity that more pressure was not put on all three because the business of smuggling was more important than the business of maintaining that part of the relationship with those three countries … I understood that was the choice of the United States, not to expend capital on stopping the smuggling … there were equivocal views within the US Administration about how much effort and energy and capital to expend on maintaining sanctions and a containment regime that might, anyway, not do the trick."[21]

49. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the fact that the provisions to tighten the borders could not be agreed with Russia was important, and that, while the sanctions framework agreed in the resolution might have been successful, it was "at least as persuasive an argument that it wouldn't have been".[22]

50. Asked whether containment was still the policy of Government, Lord Wilson of Dinton, Cabinet Secretary from January 1998 to September 2002, responded:

> "… Containment was the status quo … No-one questioned it. No-one said, '… Let's discontinue that as a policy.' It was noted as a success … After that [Cabinet discussion on 16 May 2002] there was no further discussion of containment … for it to end you would need to have a discussion about it. There was no discussion about it."[23]

51. Lord Wilson stated that Mr Blair had been disappointed that concessions had been made to secure Russian support for the resolution, and regarded it as a significant weakness.[24]

52. Lord Wilson, told the Inquiry that the "Americans had got engaged in getting it [the resolution] through".[25]

53. In his memoir, published in 2012, Mr Straw wrote:

> "… resolution 1409 was inadequate and stood no chance of plugging the gaping holes in the sanctions framework. This failure to get comprehensive and robust 'smart sanctions' effectively marked the end of the 'containment' policy, especially for those of us who regarded Iraq as a significant threat."[26]

54. In early May 2002, the international effort to resolve the India/Pakistan crisis was the FCO's principal foreign policy concern and the major preoccupation for Mr Straw, Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), and Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director.

55. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry:

> "… The main thing in April, May, into June … was India, Pakistan. Can I impress on this Committee that was far more important than Iraq. The Middle East Peace Process was far more important than Iraq … Iraq was not the major thing in those months. The Queen Mother had died; Alastair Campbell was involved in a row with Black Rod; street crime … There were all sorts of issues around which engaged attention.
> "If you had said to me 'Where are we on Iraq?' I would have said: 'Things are going on, No.10 has started talking to Washington.' But nothing major."[27]

Discussions with the US and France

56. In discussions with the US, Mr Straw and Sir David Manning confirmed Mr Blair's position that the UK would support the US if President Bush decided on military action.

57. In a meeting with Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, on 17 May, Sir David set out what he described as the conditions "stipulated" by Mr Blair.

58. Mr Blair had a meeting on Iraq with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce on 2 May but there is no record of the discussion.[28]

59. Iraq was not discussed at Cabinet that day.

60. In a discussion on 8 May, Mr Straw told Mr Colin Powell, the US Secretary of State, that Mr Blair "had always taken the view that if in the end President Bush decided on military action, the UK had a duty to support him".[29] Mr Straw wrote that:

> "… the rhetoric (in the US) might get beyond what was possible. Powell agreed this was a considerable danger. I had rather gathered that the more military options were considered, the more, not less, difficult military action appeared."

61. Mr Straw's minute was sent to Sir David Manning and Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US.

62. Sir David Manning was in Washington on 17 May, for discussions on a range of issues including India and Pakistan and the Middle East Peace Process (MEPP).[30]

63. In preparation for Sir David Manning's visit to Washington, Sir Christopher Meyer reported in a personal letter that he had been told by a senior official in the State Department that:

- The timeframe discussed between the Prime Minister and Bush was still valid: the first quarter of next year was "realistic" for action against Saddam Hussein.
- CENTCOM was hearing from British military sources that we were contemplating contributing an armoured division.
- This was serious stuff which was leading Administration hawks to forget the "but" in our "yes, but …"[31]

64. Sir Christopher also recorded that it was doubtful that much work had been done on handling the UN and getting the weapons inspectors back in and that the nightmare would be if Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, judged that the Iraqis were co-operating and the US did not.

65. Sir Christopher advised that the UK had "been drawn into a fierce inter-agency battle on the Middle East and Iraq". That was "unavoidable if we are to retain a handle on what is going on [in] areas of vital importance to our national interest. But it does mean that we have to tread with the greatest care".

66. Sir Christopher told the Inquiry, that he had been told by a senior American official "shortly after Crawford" that there were problems with the UK's "yes, but" approach: "the 'yes' was greedily devoured by the American Administration, but the 'buts' had kind of faded away".[32]

67. In discussions with Dr Rice on Iraq, Sir David told her that the UK's "offer of military support for a campaign against Saddam was firm. But we must go the UN inspectors route first; we must stabilise Arab/Israel … and we must prepare public opinion."[33] He was assured that the UK would be brought into the planning process at a very early stage, once such planning got under way.

68. In a separate report to Mr Blair, Sir David warned that, in the light of the US perception that the UK was considering providing an armoured division, there were dangers that the "moderates in Washington" were worried that "the hawks" would

"now simply ignore the conditions that you have stipulated".[34] Sir David reported that he had twice made very clear to Dr Rice that:

> "… before we would commit to military action, we must exhaust the UN inspectors route; there must be progress in stabilising Arab/Israel; and there must be a campaign to explain the Saddam menace to domestic and international public opinion."

69. In a meeting with Mr Richard Armitage, the US Deputy Secretary of State, Sir David Manning had been told that "a UK officer at Tampa had said that the UK would provide an armoured division". That had been "dropped into the conversation" of the most senior US policy-makers.[35]

70. Asked about that meeting and the fact that Mr Armitage had been told that Mr Blair had discussed the question of a British armoured division taking part in the invasion with President Bush at Crawford, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry: "Yes I didn't know that."[36]

71. Sir David subsequently stated:

> "I think the message that he [Mr Blair] wanted to be with the Americans in the broad sense would be correct … throughout the crisis he felt if push came to shove, the Americans should not be left to do this on their own. But I think at this stage still he believes there may be a better way to do this, and I think his willingness to stay engaged will also have been a calculation that that would have improved the chances of persuading the Americans to go back to the UN.
> "So I don't myself think … in April or May … he had made his mind up he was going to send troops. I think he was always ready to do it, but always hoped he wouldn't have to."[37]

72. Asked, in the context of an offer of a division, whether the military planners were getting ahead of the policy, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he was:

> "… surprised they had said that because certainly later … when there is a request from the MOD to the Prime Minister to give an indication of what he would be willing to sign up for, he refuses. So it doesn't seem logical to me."[38]

73. A letter from Sir Christopher Meyer on 20 May following up Sir David's visit reported that "military planning was grinding on", and described the UK conditions as "preconditions for action against Saddam".[39]

74. In a meeting with French officials, Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, stated that a continuing threat of US action was needed to influence Iraqi behaviour, whatever some might think of the consequences of the threat.

75. Following a visit to Paris by Mr Chaplin, the British Embassy Paris reported that officials in the French Foreign Ministry:

- did not expect much movement in Iraq's third meeting with Mr Annan in Vienna, which was best described as a dialogue not a negotiation;
- were looking to see how to raise the dialogue with Iraq to persuade it to agree the return of inspectors but were sceptical about whether Iraq would agree a regime similar to that which had applied until 1998;
- took the firm position that Iraq had to make clear its willingness to agree the return of inspectors before talks on clarification of resolution 1284 (1999) could start;
- were less convinced than before that US military action was inevitable; and
- saw the return of inspectors as the best way to avoid military action and would want to maintain the unity of the P5 as the means to deliver it.[40]

76. In relation to UN authority for military action, a French official stated:

> "… past precedent demonstrated that formal authorisation by the UN was not an absolute requirement for military action. What would be indispensable, as a minimum, would be a statement by the Security Council (not necessarily in the form of a SCR [Security Council resolution]) that Iraq was in breach of its obligations, and a warning making clear to Iraq what the consequences of a continued violation would be. The Quai had given this advice to Chirac [Mr Jacques Chirac, President of France] for his meeting with Bush."

77. Another French official stated that the US had no answer to the question of what would happen "the day after". The Kurds and Shia were ready to come in behind the US, but would not go out ahead of them. The greatest fear of ordinary Iraqis was what would come after Saddam Hussein "with or without US intervention". The Shia were in a majority, but there was no question of the leadership being anything other than Sunni. It was far from clear that the Republican Guard would be able to keep control if there was a change of regime.

78. Mr Chaplin argued that the best way to avoid military action was to make resolution 1284 a reality. The UK would follow Dr Blix on the procedures he thought necessary for the inspectors to do their job: "But it was hard to see the US agreeing to a regime less intrusive than the last one." After the adoption of the GRL, the prospect of lifting sanctions would be less enticing for Iraq:

> "A continuing threat of US action … was needed to influence Iraqi behaviour, whatever some might think of the consequences of the threat."

79. A French official agreed, adding:

> "… if the fear of US intervention receded, there would be no co-operation at all from the Iraqis, which in turn would strengthen the hands of the hawks in Washington."

80. The personal view of the French official was:

> "… we would be in exactly the same position on Iraq in five years' time – and that would represent the least bad option, given the regional instability that would ensue from any military action."

81. The paragraph on France's views of the UN authority for military action was drawn to the attention of Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, with the comment that it was: "An important statement from a Permanent Member of the UNSC."[41]

Definition of the UK's objective

82. Mr Hoon advised Mr Blair on 31 May that he and Mr Straw had agreed a preliminary UK objective to guide planning which, rather than calling directly for the elimination of Iraq's WMD capability, called on Iraq to abide by its international obligations on WMD.

83. The first meeting of the Pigott Group in late April considered how to define the objective, or "end state" of a military operation.[42] Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw:

> "As we found in the run-up to the Afghanistan operation, defining the objective of an operation is crucial … The MOD had tried their hand at a definition of the 'end-state' which was discussed at length, and I undertook to produce a further version.
> "I have now done so … it would be helpful to know whether the Foreign Secretary thinks we are on the right lines. At this stage, it is only to inform MOD contingency planning: at the right point, these issues would have to be negotiated carefully and at a high level with the Americans, who will have their own priorities. My proposal is as follows:
> – 'A stable and law-abiding Iraq, within its present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to global security or to its neighbours, and abiding by its international obligations on control of its WMD.'"

[42] Minute Ricketts to Private Secretary [FCO], 25 April 2002, 'Iraq: Contingency Planning'.

84. Mr Ricketts added that three issues had been debated in the Pigott Group:

> "… should there be specific reference to regime change, e.g. 'no longer governed by its current leadership'? My own view is that regime change would be a by-product of a military operation not its objective (indeed, I believe such an objective would be illegal);
> "… should the 'end state' be stated more explicitly as the removal of Iraqi WMD or (more achievable) the removal of the threat posed by Iraqi WMD? There is a serious issue here of the credibility of any objective we declare for a campaign, since any likely future Iraqi regime would presumably feel the same national security imperatives for pursuing WMD programmes as the current regime, given potential threats from Iran. My formula above concentrates on Iraq abiding by its UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] undertakings. But as an alternative I think it would be credible to aim at an 'end state' in which the threat posed by Iraqi WMD was removed (i.e. behaviour change if not regime change);
> "… should there be anything more explicit about a future regime abiding by international norms on the treatment of its own population? I have got 'law abiding' which is designed to capture that. There is a risk of overloading a definition of the 'end state' with desirable outcomes which cannot be achieved by military means."

85. Mr Michael Wood, FCO Legal Adviser, responded:

> "In the event of military action, we should need to be satisfied that there was a proper legal basis, and what we say publicly would need to be consistent with that legal basis."[43]

86. Mr Wood agreed that regime change could not of itself be a lawful objective of military action. He also warned that:

> "Some of the elements in your proposed objective or 'end state' would not justify military action … The mere possession of nuclear weapons, or indeed a general risk that they may be used, does not bring into play the right of self-defence … If, on the other hand, the legal basis were to be authorisation by the Security Council, any action would need to be within the four corners of that authorisation. The Security Council has not authorised the use of force to establish 'a stable and law abiding Iraq … cooperating with the international community' or 'regime change'. It follows from the above that the language you propose in … your minute could not serve as the public aim of any military action."

[43] Minute Wood to Ricketts, 29 April 2002, 'Iraq: Contingency Planning'.

87. On 3 May, Mr Ricketts sent a very slightly amended definition of the end state, agreed by Mr Straw, to Mr Webb:

> "A stable and law-abiding Iraq, within its present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security, and abiding by its international obligations on control of its WMD."[44]

The previous reference to "global security" was replaced by "international security".

88. Mr Ricketts added:

- If the end state were to be used "as a public justification for military action", it would be "necessary to add whatever legal base was approved by the Attorney General".
- "For the record, the Foreign Secretary was strongly against any specific reference to 'regime change'."

89. Mr Webb's response of 10 May recorded that there was some discussion in the Pigott Group about the language on WMD on the grounds that a follow-on regime might only be happy if it retained some WMD as long as its neighbours continued to do the same.[45] He suggested that the end state should be amended to "abiding by its international obligations on WMD".

90. On the question of legal justification, Mr Webb noted Mr Straw's caution but added:

> "I presume … we are all still working to the line in the Prime Minister's Crawford speech that it might become justified and necessary. Consistent with that we see it as a likely – though not certain – way point in a campaign to secure the strategic objective. Following the meeting we have proposed to the Defence Secretary we take forward rapidly two distinct pieces of work, one on military contingency planning … and the other on coalition options which will need to factor in legal considerations. Rather than submitting our Ministers' conclusions to the Attorney General for his approval, we should prefer the usual approach of his putting advice to colleagues as part of a collective decision."

91. When Mr Webb visited Washington in mid-May, he discussed draft objectives with US officials.[46] His report of US views included:

- The elimination of WMD by Iraq should be a firm objective. The view that an Iraq government was unlikely to stay in office if it could not provide a counter-weight to an Iran which had a WMD capability was discounted.

- The US "understood – and even seemed to accept – the Foreign Secretary's point that regime change should not be an objective in its own right but a point on a path to a stable Iraq".
- A Department of Defense (DoD) official said that "no one in Washington now thought that replacement of Saddam by another military strong man now made sense: the US would end up being responsible for his actions even if he went wrong on them". The official was looking more to a government which "represented a wide range of tribal groups", while acknowledging that democracy would be unlikely. Mr Webb commented that this "does not … chime" with the views of others in the US.
- The US "clearly envisage remaining in Iraq for some time" but had taken Mr Webb's point that "permanent basing would create an adverse reaction in the region".
- Momentum in Washington had "flagged" since his last conversations in February; US resolve was "unabated" but "the sense was more sine die than poised".

92. Mr Webb's discussion of the possible scale and timing for any UK military contribution is addressed in Section 6.1

93. Mr Hoon informed Mr Blair on 31 May that he and Mr Straw had agreed a "preliminary objective" to guide work on contingency planning for military operations of:

> "A stable and law-abiding Iraq, within its present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security, abiding by its obligations on WMD."[47]

94. Sir Peter Ricketts told the Inquiry that it was "hard to imagine that an Iraq [as envisaged in the objective] … would still have Saddam Hussein in charge".[48]

Meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld, 5 June 2002

95. In preparation for a visit to the UK by Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Secretary of Defense, on 5 June, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 31 May.

96. UK contingency planning had concluded that, for the UK to have influence on US planning, a significant military contribution would be needed. This was defined as at "division level" for land forces.

97. To take planning further, greater clarity on US thinking was needed.

98. Mr Hoon also identified that exposing the constraints on the UK's ability to contribute forces before the end of 2002 could reduce its influence.

---

[48] Public hearing, 1 December 2009, pages 20-21.

99. Mr Blair decided that the UK should not expose the constraints it faced to Secretary Rumsfeld.

100. In advance of a visit by Secretary Rumsfeld, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 31 May with an update on the military contingency planning on Iraq.[49]

101. The minute was also sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Richard Wilson, Cabinet Secretary.

102. Mr Hoon advised Mr Blair that the MOD had been taking forward contingency planning in the absence of discussions with the US, but: "To make further progress we now need greater clarity on US thinking."

103. Detailed work showed that the UK would not be able significantly to contribute offensive operations before the end of November 2002 because of the constraints of operations in Afghanistan on air transport.

104. Mr Hoon wrote that the key message from the contingency planning exercise was that:

> "… if we wish to contribute meaningfully to any operation our Armed Forces would need plenty of warning time … We are clear that, for the UK to have influence on detailed planning, the US would require a significant contribution to any large scale operation. Our own analysis indicates that this would have to be at division level for land forces …"

105. Mr Hoon also stated that, to plan properly, the UK needed to know:

- what outcome the US was seeking;
- when the US might wish to take action; and
- how long the US saw itself remaining in Iraq.

Mr Hoon added that the UK needed to clarify the policy basis and legal justification for any action.

106. Mr Hoon identified that the UK faced a dilemma:

> "On the one hand, if we discuss the detail and timescales of a potential UK military contribution to a US-led coalition, it could send a misleading signal that we have decided to support a specific line of military action. (Such a signal could be used in Washington by the supporters of military action to promote their cause.) Equally if we are not clear with the US at this stage about our military constraints, we face the danger of our not being able to bring anything meaningful to the table at the right time and the consequent loss of influence that would bring. Finally it could be precisely our readiness to participate that would allow you to counsel the President against proceeding if no convincing plan were to emerge."

107. Reflecting on the approach the UK should adopt with Secretary Rumsfeld, Mr Hoon recommended:

"… there would be more mileage in raising practicalities. I would make clear that our conditions for involvement in military action remain as you have set them out: public opinion would need to be prepared; the UN inspectors would need to be given every chance of success; and there would have to be an adequate degree of stability in the Arab/Israel conflict."

108. Mr Hoon added:

"Further, by raising in general terms, that our contingency planning has shown we need plenty of warning in order to be able to contribute to military action I would reinforce the need for the UK to be exposed fully to US thinking as soon as possible."

109. Mr Blair wrote alongside the last point: "No. That will send a wobbly message."[50]

110. Mr Blair's decision on the tactics to be adopted demonstrated he did not intend to set "conditions" for UK support for the US. He was focusing on the conditions for success.

111. Mr Blair told Secretary Rumsfeld that the UK would be with the US in any military action. That would best be done by ensuring a broad coalition and avoiding unintended consequences.

112. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, advised Mr Blair that Secretary Rumsfeld wanted to ignore the UN inspectors track so Mr Blair would need to:

"… reiterate the conditions you attach to any UK involvement in any military operation, including a proper go down the UN route. You also need to press Rumsfeld to involve us closely in the military planning and warn him that we may face longer warning times than the US."[51]

113. Mr Blair's response amplified his comment on the minute from Mr Hoon:

"… We should say we'll be with you. Here's how to make it happen successfully; not: here are our conditions for being with you."[52]

114. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon met Secretary Rumsfeld on 5 June.[53] The record of the discussion on Iraq confirmed that the US would begin discussions with the UK at the military level.

115. Mr Blair commented that "removing Saddam would be excellent for the Iraqi people and for the Middle East region", and that "The UK would be with the US in any military action." That would best be done "by ensuring a broad coalition of support and acquiescence" and avoiding "unintended consequences" which might arise "if military action occurred while the Arab world were hostile".

116. Regional countries would want the territorial integrity of Iraq maintained and to know what the long-term plan for Iraq would be.

117. Mr Blair expected Saddam Hussein to "play this cleverly, trying to draw us into a debate about UN weapons inspectors etc".

118. Mr Blair told Mr Rumsfeld that he had "not yet decided about public handling". The UN inspectors would be "important for European opinion". In Mr Blair's view: "Some would say that a further UNSCR would be required, but in the end they might … accept a final demand for unconditional access for the inspectors. We had to avoid a negotiation with Saddam … we would probably be in a better position with an ultimatum that Saddam refused than with no ultimatum." In his view "the WMD threat provided a sufficient reason for action against Saddam" but building up "a public picture of the history of the regime" would help convince European opinion of the need for action against Saddam Hussein.

119. Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Washington, reported on 7 June that Mr Blair's message at College Station to Saddam Hussein on the weapons inspectors had "heavily influenced" the US views on the UK's approach towards inspections, "particularly in the NSC [National Security Council] and OSD [Office of the Secretary of Defense]"; the US "assume we are on board for a tough approach".[54]

The need to address the legal basis for military action

120. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec, raised the question of when Lord Goldsmith should be brought in to the discussions on the legal basis for military action.

121. On 22 May, Lord Goldsmith received a visit from Mr William Taft IV, the Legal Adviser to the US State Department.[55] Mr Wood's note of this meeting recorded:

> "The meeting lasted about an hour, and consisted entirely of an informal discussion, between lawyers, on legal aspects of the use of force … The discussion was a good one, though it did not significantly add to our knowledge of the US position."

122. Mr McKane wrote to Sir David Manning and others in No.10 on 18 June suggesting that it might be necessary to:

> "… confront the legal base for military action sooner rather than later. The MOD say that the US will not admit the UK to detailed joint planning unless we are able to agree that regime change is a legitimate and legal objective."[56]

123. Mr McKane added:

> "… the question is when to start to engage with the Attorney General, bearing in mind, on the one hand, the difficulty of framing a case in the abstract and, on the other hand, the need to be able to assure the US that we will not face insuperable problems downstream on the legal base. I will provide further advice on this point shortly."

124. Sir David Manning asked Mr Jonathan Powell: "Are you content? We certainly need much greater precision from the MOD."[57]

125. Mr Powell replied: "I think there is a danger of getting ahead of ourselves here unless this is absolutely necessary, to get into detailed military planning with the US. I suggest you discuss with TB on the way to Paris."[58]

126. Before he spoke to Mr Blair, Sir David Manning asked Mr McKane to "confirm that it is now absolutely necessary to get into the detailed planning with the US" and added: "I suspect it is if we are to have a voice."[59]

127. The Inquiry has not seen any written response.

Cabinet, 20 June 2002

128. Mr Blair was questioned about the UK's approach to Iraq during Cabinet on 20 June.

129. The minutes record that Mr Hoon stated that, except for continuing patrols in the No-Fly Zones, no decisions had been taken in relation to military operations in Iraq. The discussion with Secretary Rumsfeld was not mentioned.

130. Cabinet did not discuss Iraq between 20 June and 24 July when the House of Commons rose for the summer recess.

131. Iraq was discussed in Cabinet on 20 June.[60]

132. Mr Hoon told his colleagues that he would be making a statement about withdrawing troops from Afghanistan.[61] If asked whether the Government was withdrawing personnel from Afghanistan to prepare for operations against Iraq, he would make it clear that no decisions had been taken in relation to military operations, except for the continuing patrols over the No-Fly Zones (NFZs).

133. In his diaries, Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote that, Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, had said that "if Bush sent in Saddam death squads" there would be a "proper discussion" in Cabinet before they went.[62]

134. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that, following press reports of troops being "brought out of Afghanistan in preparation for military action on Iraq", two Cabinet Ministers had asked Mr Blair: "We were not finding ourselves getting involved in some strange military action by the United States, were we? There is not something happening here?" Mr Blair had been "absolutely taken aback … He gave them reassurance. They had a discussion about handling the press … which I put in the minutes."[63]

135. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that the discussion was not a major item. It was "a tiny clue as to the mood and indication this was not a period when everyone was gung-ho. It was a period when people were worried, concerned."

136. Lord Wilson subsequently stated:

> "… the … incident is important to me because it kind of calibrates where they were and the degree to which they knew what was going on, that they were asking questions on the basis … of a press report".[64]

Development of UK policy, July 2002

137. Sir David Manning asked Mr Hoon for further advice on the steps which would be necessary to keep open the option of a deploying a large scale force by the end of the year.

138. Sir David also asked that military planners should make the conditions for UK involvement in military operations clear to their US counterparts.

139. Sir David Manning wrote to Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, on 25 June stating that, in response to Mr Hoon's minute of 31 May, Mr Blair had:

> "… asked for further advice on precisely what steps would have to be taken now, including financial commitments … to keep open the possibility of deploying a large scale force by the end of this year – bearing in mind that we might not get six months' warning."[65]

140. Sir David wrote that it was "encouraging that following the Rumsfeld visit, our military planners have now been invited to discussions with the US" (see Section 6.1). He added:

> "It will be important, as the Defence Secretary acknowledged in his minute, to make clear the conditions for UK involvement in military action set out by the Prime Minister. Public opinion needs to be prepared, the UN inspectors' route needs to be given every chance of success and there must be progress in tackling the Arab/Israel crisis."

141. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 26 June reporting that the US was understood to be seeking:

- the removal of the Hussein regime;
- the neutralisation of WMD within Iraq;
- the elimination of a safe haven for terrorists;
- an acceptable new government."[66]

142. Mr Watkins stated that the US goals:

> "… broadly align with the objective previously agreed by the Foreign and Defence Secretaries … although Mr Hoon understands that Mr Straw, rightly, sees removal of Saddam as a way point – if necessary and justified – to the final outcome rather than an objective in its own right."

[65] Letter Manning to Watkins, 25 June 2002, 'Iraq'.
[66] Letter Watkins to Manning, 26 June 2002, 'Iraq'.

143. A small MOD team would be going to Washington and the CENTCOM HQ in Tampa, Florida "immediately".

144. The letter concluded that Mr Hoon believed Ministers would need clarity on:

- whether the Prime Minister's conditions are likely to be met;
- the viability of the proposed military action;
- the policy and legal framework in which military action is justified;
- overall, whether the prospective outcome looked worth the risks, costs and losses."

Mr Hoon asks for a collective discussion on Iraq

145. The MOD advised that military planning in the US was taking place in a policy void and President Bush would be briefed on an updated plan in August. CENTCOM would be in a position to activate that plan.

146. Mr Hoon was concerned about the US approach. He suggested Mr Blair should call an early meeting of Ministers to consider how best to get the US to address the strategic, as opposed to the narrowly military, dimension.

147. On 2 July, Mr Watkins reported to Sir David Manning that "US military thinking is quite well advanced", but US planners were assuming offensive operations to overthrow Saddam Hussein "in a policy void".[67] The US "end state to be achieved after conflict" had not been identified, and there seemed to be no "overarching campaign strategy for dealing with Iraq".

148. An updated plan would be briefed to President Bush in August, and the US planning was designed "to put CENTCOM in a position to be able to activate their plan from August 2002 onwards". A "de facto invitation to the UK and Australia to participate" was "now on the table". The plan would require availability of bases and support from Kuwait, Jordan and Turkey.

149. Mr Watkins reported that Mr Hoon intended to respond positively to the invitation for a small number of British planners to join US planning teams; that was "essential in helping to inform the MOD's own thinking" so that Mr Hoon could make recommendations. But Mr Hoon was:

> "… very conscious that decisions about a military contribution cannot be made in the absence of a coherent and integrated strategic framework. An agreed strategy will be key to taking matters forward, not simply to provide justification for military action, but to clarify timelines; to incorporate the Prime Minister's conditions for UK participation; and to establish the framework for an information campaign. The draft public document, which you are currently considering, would ultimately form an important part of that campaign. He suggests that the Prime Minister may like to call an early meeting of a small group of colleagues to consider how best to get the US to address the strategic, as opposed to the narrowly military, dimension. The freestanding military option is not a viable political proposition.

"Meanwhile, officials from the MOD, FCO and Cabinet Office should do some more homework urgently to put the Prime Minister and you in a better position to influence the President's and Condi Rice's thinking … before the updated CENTCOM plan is briefed to the President in the course of August. Mr Hoon will also review the possibilities for contact with the US Defense Secretary."

150. Mr Watkins' letter was paraphrased in a briefing note for Mr Blair from Sir David Manning, which drew attention to:

- the comment on the policy void in which military planning had taken place;
- the scale and cost of the US plans;
- the fragility of the logistic concept;
- US ignorance of Iraqi WMD locations;
- the lack of clarity about what the US might ask the UK to do;
- the need for basing in the region; and
- the use of British bases in Diego Garcia and Cyprus.[68]

151. Sir David also reported Mr Hoon's suggestion for an early meeting and advised that funding and legal issues would need to be considered "before we go much further". He proposed Mr Brown, Mr Straw, Sir Richard Wilson, Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the JIC, and Lord Goldsmith should attend.

152. Manuscript notes on the minute by Mr Powell suggested to Mr Blair that Mr Brown and Sir Richard Wilson should be removed and Adm Boyce and Lt Gen Pigott added; and that those changes had been agreed by Mr Blair.[69]

153. Asked why Mr Brown and Ms Short had not been invited to the meeting, which took place on 23 July, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

"We were discussing then what was likely to happen in relation to the politics and the diplomacy, particularly in relation to the military …

"We were also discussing this at Cabinet level too, and obviously we were in close touch with the Treasury and so on … at that moment, the single most important areas were diplomacy and … military planning …

Sir Kevin Tebbit's advice, 3 July 2002

154. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Mr Hoon on 3 July setting out his concerns about the absence of a strategic framework for the military plan and the dilemma for the UK that being drawn into US planning potentially posed.

155. Sir Kevin concluded that the UK could not count on a military campaign being unlikely or, if the US went ahead, that the UK could avoid being linked to the campaign.

156. Sir Kevin advised that a "credible political plan", which addressed the conditions for UK participation and moved American planning into acceptable channels and slowed it down, was needed.

157. Having seen a draft of Mr Watkins' letter to No.10, Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Mr Hoon on 3 July setting out a number of concerns.[71]

158. Sir Kevin advised:

> "While I have no objection to … the course of action proposed I think we should be under no illusions about the extent of the stakes as presented, or the need to raise our Whitehall game, politically, diplomatically, financially as well as militarily if we are to proceed further. This is not to say that I do not support the idea of engaging in planning … nor even that we should not agree to participate in an operation against Iraq if the conditions are acceptable, but the task ahead is formidable.
> "… The picture … is of a military plan being worked up in a policy vacuum, with no strategic framework which paves the way; in terms of rationale, preparation of public opinion through threat assessments, WMD risks and the like, or creation of the legal base; and no clearly defined end state, in terms of successor government and relations with the Arab world. There will, I suspect, be a natural tendency for Ministerial colleagues … to run a mile from what may appear at first (and second) sight to be a harebrained scheme with all sorts of costs and risks attached.
> "Ministers will need to be helped over that hump. It may be that an Iraq campaign is unlikely to happen, given the problems … But we certainly cannot count on that or that we could avoid being linked to a US military campaign if it did happen … I do not think it is a responsible option for us to let matters run without greater active engagement designed seriously to influence US conceptual as well as operational thinking, albeit at the risk that we could end up converting an unviable plan into a credible one.

---

[70] Public hearing, 29 January 2010, pages 224-226.
[71] Minute Tebbit to Secretary of State [MOD], 3 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

> "Secondly there is the difficulty of confronting the US Administration itself about the need to produce a credible political plan … (and without which the Prime Minister's conditions for UK participation could not be met) … we need to move with considerably more urgency to seek to move American planning into acceptable channels and basically I would judge, to slow it down. This is particularly the case when a major element in the strategic preparation we would want to see is concerted diplomatic effort to secure agreement to resumed WMD inspections by the UN both for its own sake and to ease the problems of public opinion and legal base. This [is] in addition to the need for prior progress on Arab/Israel and, perhaps, getting further on the road to success in Afghanistan …"

159. Sir Kevin concluded that the UK needed "some early careful engagement with the US policy machine, rather than just with the Pentagon". He would be "visiting Washington on 17-19 July and could carry messages but that would, of course, depend on prior Ministerial guidance".

160. Sir Kevin Tebbit's minute was sent after Mr Watkins' letter to Sir David Manning of 2 July.

161. Mr Watkins marked the letter to Mr Hoon observing that the MOD did not know the views of Secretary Powell or Dr Rice; and there was a risk "that the PM's conditions will be simply sidelined".[72]

162. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that getting involved in US planning had posed a dilemma because:

> "… it was clear … even at that stage, if one begins discussions with the United States on the military track, albeit without commitment, it becomes increasingly difficult to keep options open absolutely completely … [W]e made it clear to them that our participation … was purely to inform British Government thinking …
> "On the one hand, if one is drawn into discussion of timescales and details, we might give misleading signals of support for military action that was not present at that stage.
> "On the other hand, if we continued to stand aside, it might be too late for us to influence events or meet the political requirement which might be placed on us."[73]

JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002

163. Although it had only fragmentary intelligence about how the regime would deal with an attack including ground forces, the JIC assessed on 4 July that only massive military force would be guaranteed to topple Saddam Hussein.

---

[72] Manuscript comment Watkins to Hoon, 3 July 2002, on Minute Tebbit to Secretary of State [MOD], 3 July 2002, 'Iraq'.
[73] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, pages 20-21.

164. The JIC judged that disintegration of the regime would be most likely if Iraqi ground forces were being comprehensively defeated; if top military officers could be persuaded that their fate was not irrevocably tied to that of Saddam Hussein; or if Saddam Hussein were to be killed.

165. The JIC assessed on 27 February 2002 (see Section 3.2) that the Iraqi opposition would be unable to overthrow Saddam Hussein's regime without direct intervention on the ground.

166. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment of "how cohesion of the Iraqi regime is maintained and how the regime would fare under pressure or attack" on 4 July.[74]

167. The minutes of the JIC discussion of the draft paper described it as:

> "… an important paper with a specific focus. It would be of interest to Ministers more because of its context, with decisions yet to be taken about what to do with Iraq, than because of its analysis, which was familiar rather than novel.
> "Its key message was that although Saddam Hussein's regime was remarkably resilient to pressure … the demonstration of a real and overwhelming international determination and ability to remove the regime through military force was the likeliest way to bring it down …
> "Experience in Afghanistan had shown that generating expectations and influencing people's perceptions of what might happen had considerable capacity to effect real and rapid change …
> "… the paper needed to analyse … in more detail the nature of Saddam's support … The motives for each set of supporters were different … These mattered because under pressure the different groups would behave differently.
> "UK policy makers, and military planners, would be keen before too long to identify the point at which self-interested loyalty for Saddam might turn into disillusionment, fragility and fragmentation."[75]

168. The Key Judgements from the Assessment are set out in the Box below.[76]

JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002: 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion'

Key Judgements

"• Only massive military force would be guaranteed to topple Saddam. The regime expects a US attack […]

[74] JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion'.
[75] Minutes, 3 July 2002, JIC meeting.
[76] JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion'.

- The clear prospect of a major attack would put the regime under unprecedented pressure. But regime cohesion is unlikely to collapse in the absence of a large scale invasion.
- Saddam relies on a mixture of patronage and extreme fear to retain power and contain opposition. Real loyalty and support for his regime is confined to the top of the hierarchy.
- The Special Republican Guard (SRG) and the Republican Guard Forces Command (RGFC) are more reliable than the Regular Army (RA). All would initially fight a US-led attack. Once the regime was perceived as doomed the military's will to fight on would be sorely tested.
- Regime disintegration would be most likely if Iraqi ground forces were being comprehensively defeated; if top military officers could be persuaded that their fate was not irrevocably tied to that of Saddam; or if Saddam himself were to be killed. Military units are more likely to suffer mass desertions than revolt as coherent units."

169. The Assessment also stated:

"Saddam and his regime have proved durable …

"The Iraqi military are aware of their vulnerability to air power, probably their greatest weakness; their main way of mitigating this is through dispersal, including into urban areas […] We have only fragmentary intelligence indicating how the regime might deal with an all-out attack including ground forces. But we assess that only massive military force could be guaranteed to topple Saddam."

170. Addressing the policy implications of the Assessment, the JIC stated: "Saddam and his regime must be convinced that any move to topple him is serious and likely to succeed before they begin to feel the pressure."

The Treasury's concerns

171. Mr Hoon's proposal prompted Mr William Nye, Head of the Treasury Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, to advise Mr Brown that he should write to the MOD proposing that all options for UK participation in military operations (including smaller and more specialised options) should be costed.[77] This would enable the Government to assess how much it wished to devote to securing a degree of influence over US policy and operations, in terms of risk to UK troops, the opportunity cost of withdrawing from other operations, and the financial cost.

172. Treasury officials estimated the total military costs of the operation as US$70bn; and that UK participation on a large scale could cost £2bn or more in the financial year 2002/03.

[77] Minute Nye to Bowman, 5 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

173. The Treasury told the Inquiry that Mr Brown decided not to write to the MOD.[78]

174. Mr Nye's advice and Mr Brown's involvement in discussions on the costs of operations in Iraq are addressed in Section 13.

Mr Straw's advice, 8 July 2002

175. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair, supporting the proposal for an early Ministerial meeting and emphasising the need for a coherent strategy which assessed the political and economic as well as military implications before action was taken.

176. Mr Straw also referred to the need for the US to understand that the UK was serious about its "conditions for UK involvement".

177. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 8 July supporting Mr Hoon's suggestion for an early Ministerial meeting.[79]

178. Mr Straw wrote:

> "We are all agreed that we must act to remove the threat posed by Iraqi WMD. If the US decide that to do so requires military action then the UK will want to support them. But this will be harder for us to do without serious US action to address some of the lacunae in their plan, notably:
> - … no strategic concept for the military plan and, in particular, no thought apparently given to 'day after' scenarios … US military planning so far has taken place in a vacuum;
> - weak intelligence analysis and a quite unrealistic assumption that Iraqi WMD would be easy to identify and destroy;
> - an assumption that Kuwait would host a large scale US military effort for the 1-2 years probably necessary, that other Gulf states would provide necessary support, and that Syria and Iran would sit quietly on the sidelines;
> - no mention of your three conditions for UK involvement, nor of the legal base."

179. Mr Straw commented:

> "Much of what is required is covered by your three conditions for UK involvement (preparation of public opinion, UN route exhausted, and some MEPP improvement). Regional states in particular will want assurance that the US has thought through the 'day after' questions before giving even tacit support. The support even of key allies such as Kuwait cannot be counted on in the absence of some serious ground-work by the US.

[79] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 8 July 2002, 'Iraq: Contingency Planning'.

"The fact that the US plan apparently ignores these conditions causes me particular concern. Are they determined to go ahead regardless? Does the omission signal a weakening of US commitment to work for progress in these areas before deciding to launch military action? None of them is getting any easier:

- in the Middle East (and elsewhere) public opinion remains deeply hostile to military action. An aggressive public opinion campaign, demonstrating – truthfully – that we had exhausted all other options and making the most of what limited new WMD evidence we have would be needed to reduce this.
- on the UN route, the UN Secretary-General's dialogue with Iraq has so far made no concrete progress …
- President Bush's speech has not improved the prospects of moving the Israel/Palestinian conflict into calmer waters.
- the prospects for constructing a legal basis for military action are uncertain at best."

180. Mr Straw concluded:

"The key point is how to get through to the Americans that the success of any military operation against Iraq – and protection of our fundamental interests in the region – depends on devising in advance a coherent strategy which assesses the political and economic as well as military implications. They must also understand that we are serious about our conditions for UK involvement."

181. The letter was also sent to Mr Brown, Mr Hoon and Sir Richard Wilson.

Sir Christopher Meyer's advice, 9 July 2002

182. Sir Christopher Meyer reported speculation in the US media and a number of recent discussions in Washington on 9 July.[80]

183. In a press conference on 8 July, President Bush had not attempted to challenge the veracity of a story about leaked military plans. Sir Christopher's contacts suggested that the aim was to have a reworked military plan on President Bush's desk before he went on holiday in August.

184. Sir Christopher reported that, following a meeting between the UN and Iraq the previous week, Mr Annan was perceived to have little interest in further meetings. The US view was that there was little point in further "technical contacts" although they would wait to see what was proposed at the next meeting of the Security Council. Iraq "hoped to pin the blame for the failure of the process on the US, UK and UN by co-operating on the marginal issues but doing little on the core questions". There was concern about the lack of knowledge about Iraq amongst the non-P5 members of the Security Council.

Lord Goldsmith's request for information

185. Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, wrote to the FCO and the Cabinet Office on 11 July seeking clarification of the precise position regarding plans for any future action by the US or the UK in relation to Iraq.[81]

186. Mr McKane replied on 12 July that there were no plans for military action by the UK. As for the US, he understood that "military contingency planning" was under way, but that "no decisions have yet been taken on whether to embark on a military operation". He repeated that, as had been agreed in earlier exchanges, it would be important to ensure that Lord Goldsmith was engaged as the Government's thinking developed on the subject.[82]

187. Mr Brummell replied that Lord Goldsmith had "noted the contents" of Mr McKane's letter and was "grateful" for his confirmation of the position.[83]

188. Lord Goldsmith was invited to the meeting held by Mr Blair on 23 July.

189. Asked about his awareness of discussions about the use of force against Iraq in the first half of 2002, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he was not really aware beyond what he had read in the press about what was being said by President Bush:

> "I'm not aware of the detail of discussions. I would presume there were discussions taking place. I wasn't a part of them. I didn't attend Cabinet. This was a practice which had grown up over quite a long period of time that the Attorney General didn't attend Cabinet unless apparently legal advice was called for."[84]

190. As early as March 2002, Lord Goldsmith had "wanted to be in a position to engage constructively" so that his "advice could be factored into the development of different options" in relation to the use of force in Iraq.[85] His Office had explicitly told the Cabinet Office that "It would not be helpful" if Lord Goldsmith was "presented at the last moment with a request for a 'yes or no' answer". Lord Goldsmith was "always available to discuss these matters with Ministerial colleagues".

191. Lord Goldsmith had warned Mr Straw and Mr Hoon on 28 March that he had not been asked for an opinion on the legality of possible military action, but that he would be "happy to discuss the matter" with them "at any time".[86]

192. Asked why Lord Goldsmith was not involved until later, Mr McKane told the Inquiry that he could not recall why Lord Goldsmith was not brought into discussions after the

Crawford meeting, but he had remained in contact with the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers over the following months.[87]

193. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that the main consideration in deciding when to engage Lord Goldsmith was the difficulty in seeking formal advice when there wasn't a specific proposition to put before him.[88]

194. Asked about Lord Goldsmith's request to be involved in Ministerial thinking about Iraq policy as it developed rather than at the last minute, Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that there had been no need to involve the Attorney General as no decisions needed to be taken. He offered the view that Lord Goldsmith might have written to the Cabinet Office because previous incidents had taught him the importance and difficulty of the issues involved in military action, and the importance of being involved early.[89]

Liaison Committee, 16 July 2002

195. Mr Blair told the Liaison Committee on 16 July that he believed weapons of mass destruction posed an enormous threat to the world.

196. There was no doubt that Iraq posed a threat in respect of weapons of mass destruction which should be dealt with. No decisions had been taken on military action.

197. Mr Blair was not seeking to influence the US but to work in partnership.

198. The question of military action in Iraq was raised during Oral Questions to the Defence Secretary on 15 July. Mr Hoon assured Mrs Alice Mahon (Labour) that:

> "Absolutely no decisions have been taken by the British Government in relation to operations in Iraq or anywhere near Iraq … I can assure the House that any such decision would be properly reported to the House."[90]

199. In response to a subsequent question from Mr Bernard Jenkin (Conservative) about links between Al Qaida and the Iraqi regime, Mr Hoon replied that there was no evidence of any direct links and any new information would be investigated.[91] He added:

> "Let us not be in any doubt about Iraq. We cannot ignore the threat it poses to the international community. We have always made it clear that the world would be a much better and safer place without Saddam Hussein."

200. President Bush telephoned Mr Blair on 15 July.[92] In relation to issues like Iraq, Mr Blair told President Bush that it was "absolutely right that the US and UK should stand together".

201. Mr Campbell recorded that President Bush had telephoned to say that he understood Mr Blair "was taking a fair bit of stick for being supportive, and he was grateful".[93] That is confirmed by the record of the telephone call.

202. At the hearing of the Liaison Committee on 16 July, Mr Blair was questioned about Iraq by Mr Donald Anderson, Chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC).[94]

203. Asked if the UK's policy on Iraq had evolved in the same way as the "sea change" in US policy under President Bush, Mr Blair observed that President Clinton "had also had a policy of regime change but how you pursue the policy is another matter". It was "true … that the issue of Iraq and weapons of mass destruction is on the agenda in a different way".

204. Referring to his statement to Parliament on 14 September 2001 (see Section 3.1), Mr Blair said that he believed weapons of mass destruction:

> "… posed an enormous threat to the world. How we deal with that however, is an open question. That is why I say constantly … there are no decisions which have been made in relation to Iraq at all, but there is no doubt that Iraq poses a threat in respect of weapons of mass destruction and there is no doubt that this is an issue which should be dealt with. The one thing we have learnt post-11 September is that to take action in respect of a threat that is coming may be more sensible than to wait for the threat to materialise and then take action."

205. Asked if the UK was "preparing for possible military action against Iraq", Mr Blair replied:

> "No, there are no decisions which have been taken about military action."[95]

206. Asked if the recent "deployment" of troops from Kosovo and Afghanistan should be interpreted as preparation, Mr Blair replied:

> "No … That is not to say it is not important that we look at all the various options that we may have … and if the situation changes in any serious or dramatic way we will tell them."[96]

207. Asked whether the UK should only take action in accordance with international law, Mr Blair replied:

> "Yes, certainly I agree we should act, as I hope this country always does, in accordance with international law."[97]

208. Asked whether there was any evidence linking Saddam Hussein with Al Qaida, Mr Blair replied that "as far as he was aware there was no evidence linking Saddam Hussein to the actual attack on 11 September"; there were "various rough linkages" to Al Qaida. The issue (on Iraq) was "weapons of mass destruction. It is not what happened on 11 September or the Al Qaida terrorist network."[98]

209. Asked what had changed since President Bush took office, Mr Blair replied:

> "… First … it is clear that Saddam Hussein is still trying to develop weapons of mass destruction. Secondly … weapons inspectors where he is still refusing to abide by the UN resolutions … as more negotiations go on and he fails to comply and you know that he is developing these weapons of mass destruction, then over a period of time you are entitled to draw the conclusion that this threat is growing not diminishing. In addition … our pilots are in action virtually every day over Iraq … fourth on 11 September you can say either 'this is a one off event …' or you can say, as I would, 'there are lessons which should be learned from it' … What we should learn … is that if there is a gathering threat or danger let us deal with it before it materialises rather than afterwards … people can get the idea that all the decisions have been taken … They have not been but there is a threat … The options are open but we do have to deal with it …"[99]

210. Mr Blair also told Mr Anderson that there would be documentation setting out the nature of the WMD threat and that:

> "The only reason we have not published some of this documentation before is that you have got to choose your time … otherwise you send something rocketing up the agenda when it is not necessarily there. Certainly if we do move into a new phase, yes, of course, we will publish."[100]

211. Asked whether Parliament would be consulted before British troops were deployed, Mr Blair replied: "… we will keep up detailed consultations with Parliament … We will keep the House very, very closely involved indeed."

212. Mr Anderson stated that "the special relationship with the US is clearly the key part of our security policy and the closeness, the unwillingness to criticise is justified by the fact that we have special influence on the US Administration". Asked if he could give examples of where that influence had changed or modified US policy, Mr Blair replied:

> "I never like to approach it that way because it suggests almost as if you go along as a supplicant … you make a case and if you are lucky you win a verdict on points. It is just not like that. The truth is that we are very interlocked in our strategic relationship and we discuss and deal with issues the whole time together … I do not put it like 'an influence on them' … post-11 September … the strategic details of the Afghan campaign … the new NATO-Russia relationship … we worked terribly closely with the United States … I prefer to look at it as a partnership."[101]

213. Commenting on the impact of Mr Blair's evidence, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "… got back for a meeting with Tom McKane, David Manning and Jonathan re Iraq and when to do the documents. TB had raised the temperature another gear by making clear publicly we intended to do something and also saying that Saddam had to be dealt with. We agreed not to go for it yet, because it would look like we were going to go to war if we did, TB having made it clear that it would be the start of another phase."[102]

214. Asked whether it would have been reasonable or expedient to have explained publicly much earlier that, while the UK hoped for a peaceful outcome, it was also preparing for all eventualities including military action, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "We had not decided we would take military action at that point. On the other hand you couldn't say it wasn't a possibility … I chose the words quite carefully … the trouble was people kept writing, 'They have decided. They are off on a military campaign and nothing is going to stop them.'
> "… had I said – and maybe, in retrospect, it is better just to say it … 'Yes, we are doing military planning, our fear was people would push you into a position where you appeared to be on a kind of irreversible path to military action, and this wasn't our position …"[103]

Cabinet Office paper, 19 July 2002: 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action'

215. From October 2001 onwards, Mr Blair and others had made statements on several occasions about issues that would need to be addressed before the UK and the international community would support military action in Iraq. These included:

- The UN inspectors needed to be given every chance of success.

[103] Public hearing, 29 January 2010, page 93.

- The US should take action within a multilateral framework with international support, not unilateral action.
- The need for a public information campaign explaining the nature of Saddam Hussein's regime and the threat he posed.
- Any military action would need to be within the framework of international law.
- The military strategy would need to ensure Saddam Hussein could be removed quickly and successfully.
- A convincing "blueprint" for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq was needed which would be acceptable to both Iraq's population and its neighbours.
- Persuading the US to take the Middle East Peace Process seriously to give justice to Palestine, to ensure support for military action in the region, and to avoid accusations of double standards.
- Action should enhance rather than diminish regional stability.
- Success in Afghanistan would reinforce the benefits of regime change.

216. In his discussions with President Bush at Crawford in April 2002, Mr Blair set out a number of key elements for a successful strategy towards Iraq which would secure international support for any military action.

217. In numerous references in documents written between April and July 2002 to "conditions", these were described in different ways by different people at different times.

218. As is clear from his response to Mr Hoon's minute of 31 May, Mr Blair considered that he was seeking to influence US policy by describing key elements for a successful strategy to secure international support for any military action against Iraq.[104]

219. FCO officials identified high risks which might arise from military action and three conditions which it regarded as essential for UK participation in such action.

220. Following a meeting on 9 July, Mr McKane circulated an outline framework for a Cabinet Office paper for Ministers, and invited contributions from the MOD, the FCO and the Assessments Staff.[105]

221. Mr Chaplin advised Mr Straw's Private Office on 12 July that the Cabinet Office paper would "focus on the need to persuade the US Administration to put their military planning in a broader political context".[106]

222. Mr Chaplin wrote that, as Mr Straw's minute to Mr Blair of 8 July had noted, "fundamental UK interests in the region" were at stake. Mr Chaplin stated that he was "less gloomy than some of our Ambassadors about the consequences of military action", but the risks were "high".

[105] Minute McKane to Chaplin, 10 July 2002, 'Iraq'.
[106] Minute Chaplin to Private Secretary [FCO], 12 July 2002, 'Iraq: Military Action'.

223. The key risks identified by Mr Chaplin were:

- "immediate risks of retaliation against UK interests (ranging from political and economic retaliation against UK interests to … terrorist attack)";
- "chronic instability in Iraq" in the medium term;
- "a repeat of the Suez debacle" in the longer term, "which apart from its short-term effects (eg sweeping away the Hashemite regime in Iraq) changed Arab popular opinion towards Britain for a generation"; and
- "serious implications for the success of the global counter-terrorism campaign".

224. Mr Chaplin advised:

> "These risks can be reduced significantly by careful preparation. The three conditions spelled out to the Americans by the Prime Minister are interrelated. To build a coalition for military action and get domestic and international opinion on side we need:
> - clear and publicly usable evidence that the Iraq WMD threat is real …;
> - a clear effort to exhaust all other avenues, principally the UN route. This is likely to be necessary for us to establish a legal base for military action;
> - visible improvement in the Israel/Palestine situation to give us some protection against the arguments of double standards.
> "These … will … increase the chances of Saddam Hussein finally backing down on inspections, which I believe is possible once he sees no alternative."

225. Mr Chaplin concluded:

> "The Prime Minister has promised President Bush UK support for military action if these conditions are met. There is no commitment yet to UK participation in military action, nor any collective Ministerial discussion of this yet. As well as urging the US to do their political homework … we need to re-emphasise at the highest levels that the three conditions we have set are not just desirable in themselves for any action, but [are] essential for UK participation, on whatever scale."

226. The Cabinet Office paper 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action' was issued on 19 July, to inform Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith and key officials to discuss Iraq.

227. The Cabinet Office paper invited Ministers to agree:

- the objective for any military action;
- to engage the US on the need to set military plans within a realistic political strategy, including "creating the conditions necessary to justify government military action", before military plans were presented to President Bush on 4 August; and

- the establishment of an ad hoc group of officials to consider the development of an information campaign agreed with the US.

228. The purpose of the Cabinet Office paper was to identify the conditions which would be necessary before military action would be justified and the UK could participate in such action; and to provide the basis for a discussion with the US about creating those conditions.

229. The Cabinet Office paper stated that Mr Blair had said at Crawford that the UK would support military action to bring about regime change, provided certain conditions were met.

230. The Cabinet Office paper 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action' was issued on 19 July to those who would attend the meeting chaired by Mr Blair on 23 July.[107]

231. Ministers were invited to note the latest position on US military planning, the timescales for possible action, and to agree:

- The objective for any military action should be, as set out in Mr Hoon's minute to Mr Blair of 31 May, "a stable and law-abiding Iraq within the present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security, and abiding by its international obligations on WMD".
- To "engage the US on the need to set military plans within a realistic political strategy", which included "identifying the succession to Saddam Hussein and creating the conditions necessary to justify government military action, which might include an ultimatum for the return of UN weapons inspectors to Iraq. This should include a call from the Prime Minister to President Bush ahead of the briefing of US military plans to the President on 4 August."
- The establishment of a Cabinet Office-led ad hoc group of officials to consider the development of an information campaign to be agreed with the US.

232. The paper stated that US military planning for action against Iraq was "proceeding apace" but it lacked a political framework: "In particular, little thought has been given to creating the political conditions for military action, or the aftermath and how to shape it."

233. It seemed "unlikely" that the UK's objective could be achieved while Saddam Hussein's regime remained in power. The US objective was "unambiguously" the "removal of Saddam Hussein's regime, followed by elimination of Iraqi WMD". The view of UK officials was that it was by "no means certain" that one would follow from the other: even if regime change was "a necessary condition for controlling Iraq's WMD", it was "certainly not a sufficient one".

[107] Paper Cabinet Office, 19 July 2002, 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action'.

234. The Cabinet Office stated that Mr Blair had discussed Iraq with President Bush at Crawford in April, and Mr Blair had:

> "… said that the UK would support military action to bring about regime change, provided that certain conditions were met:
> - efforts had been made to construct a coalition/shape public opinion,
> - the Israel-Palestine Crisis was quiescent, and
> - the options for action to eliminate Iraq's WMD through the UN weapons inspectors had been exhausted."

235. The UK now needed to reinforce Mr Blair's message and encourage the US to put its planning into a political framework. This was "particularly important for the UK" because of the need "to create the conditions" in which it could: "legally support military action". Otherwise, there was the "real danger" that the US would commit themselves to a course of action which the UK "would find very difficult to support".

236. The paper also stated that "certain preparations would need to be made, and other considerations taken into account" to "fulfil the conditions" set out by Mr Blair "for UK support for military action". The paper set them out in a form which could be adapted for use with the US Government.

237. The paper contained a series of sections addressing the conditions which would be "necessary for military action and UK participation":

- "a viable military plan";
- "justification/legal base";
- "an international coalition";
- "a quiescent Israel/Palestine";
- "a positive risk/benefit assessment"; and
- "the preparation of domestic opinion".

238. The Chiefs of Staff were not yet able to assess whether the military plans were "sound"; although a "decision in principle" might be needed "soon".

239. Ministers were invited to "note" the potentially long lead times for equipping UK forces to undertake operations in Iraq, and asked to agree that the MOD could bring forward proposals for procurement of equipment.

240. The Chiefs of Staff advised that there were a number of questions which would need to be answered before US military plans could be assessed as "sound". Those included the realism of a "Running Start"; the willingness of Iraqi forces to fight; and the potential impact of Iraqi attacks using chemical or biological weapons.

241. Without an overt military build-up, a "Running Start" military action could begin as early as November, with air strikes and support for opposition groups and small scale land operations while further ground forces built up to overwhelm Iraqi forces; "leading to the collapse of the Iraqi regime". A "Generated Start" following a military build-up could begin as early as January 2003. This was also judged to be the latest date for the start of military operations unless action was "deferred until the following autumn".

242. The "UK's ability to contribute forces depended on the details of US military planning and the time available to prepare and deploy them". The MOD was "examining how the UK might contribute to US-led action". Options ranging from deployment of a division to making bases available had been identified. US plans assumed the use of British bases in Cyprus and Diego Garcia. Unless "publicly visible" decisions were taken "very soon" the UK would not be able to send a division in time for an operation in Iraq in January 2003.

243. A "decision in principle" might be "needed soon on whether and in what form the UK takes part in military action".

244. Ministers were invited to "note the potentially long lead times involved in equipping UK Armed Forces to undertake operations in the Iraqi theatre"; and to "agree that MOD should bring forward proposals for the procurement of Urgent Operational Requirements [UORs] under cover of the lessons learned from Afghanistan" and the "outcome" of the 2002 Spending Review.

245. The planning and preparations for equipping UK forces are addressed in Section 6.3.

246. Mr McKane advised Sir David Manning separately that the Cabinet Office paper covered US military plans "only in headline form" on the grounds that Mr Blair would "wish to receive a short oral brief from CDS".[108]

247. Regime change was "not a proper basis for international action" but it could "result from action which is otherwise lawful".

248. The UN and the international community needed to be persuaded to "set a deadline, leading to an ultimatum".

249. Reflecting the JIC Assessment of 27 February, the paper stated that Saddam Hussein was "likely to admit weapons inspectors as a means of forestalling" military action.

250. It would take "at least six months" after entering Iraq for the inspectors to establish a monitoring and verification system.

251. Addressing the basis on which military action might be justified, the Cabinet Office paper explained that the US and UK views of international law varied. While "regime change per se" was "not a proper basis for international action", it could "result from action which is otherwise lawful".[109]

252. The UK would regard the use of force as lawful if it was:

- exercised in the right of individual or collective self-defence; or
- carried out to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe; or
- authorised by the Security Council.

253. The legal position on the use of force in Iraq would "depend on the precise circumstances at the time". A legal base for an invasion of Iraq was "in principle conceivable" in relation both to self-defence or a humanitarian catastrophe, but it would be "difficult to establish because of, for example, the tests of immediacy and proportionality". Further legal advice would be needed on that point.

254. That left "the route under the UNSC resolutions on weapons inspections". There had been "no substantive progress" in the three rounds of talks held by the UN Secretary-General with Iraq to persuade them to admit the inspectors. The Iraqis were "deliberately obfuscating". The Cabinet Office paper stated that Mr Annan had "downgraded the dialogue" but more "pointless talks" were possible.

255. The UN and the international community needed to be persuaded that the situation could not be "allowed to continue ad infinitum"; and "to set a deadline, leading to an ultimatum". It would be "preferable" to obtain the "backing" of a Security Council resolution for the ultimatum. Early work would be necessary to explore the scope for achieving that.

256. The paper stated that "in practice", Saddam Hussein was "likely to admit weapons inspectors as a means of forestalling" military action, but "once admitted he would not allow them to operate freely".

257. The Cabinet Office paper stated that, under the provisions of resolution 1284 (1999) it would take UNMOVIC:

> "… at least six months after entering Iraq to establish the monitoring and verification system … necessary to assess whether Iraq is meeting its obligations. Hence, even if UN inspectors gained access today, by January 2003 they would at best only just be completing setting up. It is possible that they will encounter Iraqi obstruction during this period, but this [is] more likely when they are fully operational."

258. An earlier draft of the paper had been more explicit about the timetable for inspections set out in resolution 1284 and more cautious about the consequences, concluding that there would be difficulties in using that route as the means to establish a legal base for action in spring 2003. It had concluded:

> "So either we need to conclude that military action will be deferred until winter 2003/4 or we need to establish a justification/legal base which does not rely on the return of the weapons inspectors."[110]

259. The Cabinet Office paper stated:

> "It was just possible that an ultimatum could be cast in terms which Saddam would reject (because he is unwilling to accept unfettered access) and which would not be regarded as unreasonable by the international community … failing that (or an Iraqi attack) we would be most unlikely to achieve a legal base for military action by January 2003."[111]

260. The detailed consideration of legal issues prepared by FCO Legal Advisers and issued with the Cabinet Office paper of 8 March was circulated again as an Annex to the 19 July paper.[112]

261. Mr McKane advised that the legal basis for military action had deliberately been left open.

262. In a separate minute on the same day, Mr McKane advised Sir David Manning:

> "The paper is rather thin in its treatment of the legal base. This is because a fuller treatment would have resulted in options being closed off – in particular the justification based on self defence – by legal advisers."[113]

263. An international coalition would be necessary to provide a military platform and would be desirable for political purposes.

264. The Cabinet Office paper stated that an international coalition would be necessary to provide a military platform and would be desirable for political purposes.[114] The "greater the international support, the greater the prospects of success".

265. Military forces would need agreement to use bases in the region. Without UN authorisation, there would be problems securing the support of NATO and EU partners, although Australia "would be likely to participate on the same basis as the UK". France "might be prepared to take part if she saw military action as inevitable". Russia and China might "set aside their misgivings if sufficient attention were paid to their legal and economic concerns". Neutrality was "probably the best we could expect from the region" and the US was likely to "restrain Israel from taking part in military action".

266. Real progress towards a Palestinian state would reduce Arab antipathy to military action.

267. Real progress towards a Palestinian state would reduce Arab antipathy to military action. Both the UK and the US were pursuing some initiatives aimed at progress towards a viable Palestinian state, but "another upsurge of Palestinian/Israeli violence" was "highly likely" and Saddam Hussein "would use continuing violence to bolster popular Arab support for his regime".

268. There would be a need to address whether the benefits of military action would outweigh the risks.

269. The Cabinet Office paper stated that the UK would need to ensure that the benefits of military action outweighed the risks. It stated that a "post-war occupation of Iraq could lead to a protracted and costly nation building exercise" and that US military plans were "virtually silent" on that point. Washington could look to the UK to "share a disproportionate share of the burden". Further work was required on what form of government might replace Saddam Hussein's regime and the timescale which would be required to identify a successor.

270. The UK would also need to consider "in greater detail" the impact of military action on the UK's other interests in the region.

271. The planning and preparation for a post-conflict Iraq are addressed in Section 6.4.

272. An information campaign would be required to persuade opinion in the UK and overseas that it was necessary to take military action.

273. The Cabinet Office paper identified the need for:

- time "to prepare public opinion in the UK that it was necessary to take military action"; and
- a "substantial effort to secure support of Parliament".

274. Closely related domestic and overseas information campaigns would be needed giving "full coverage to the threat posed by Saddam Hussein, including his WMD and the legal justification for action". The overseas information campaign would be "designed to influence Saddam Hussein, the Islamic World and the wider international community".

275. The Cabinet Office paper was written in order to support a Ministerial discussion about the approach the UK should take to the US on Iraq. It identified the issues the UK should be trying to get the US to address before embarking on military action to secure regime change in Iraq in a way the UK would find difficult to support.

276. It was not written to provide a broader and more fundamental analysis of the policy choices which the UK Government might at that time have considered, and their consequences, including:

- the actual threat posed by Iraq's WMD at that stage as opposed to future risks;
- the implications of issuing an ultimatum to Iraq demanding the return of inspectors in the absence of any agreement within the P5 on either a process for clarifying the provisions of resolution 1284 (1999) or what that should be seeking to achieve, including the timescale which would be needed for inspections if Iraq agreed to the demand;
- the potential conflict between the timetable for inspections envisaged in resolution 1284 and what the UK understood about US thinking on a timetable for military action;
- whether military action would be the best way to secure the UK's objective;
- the longer-term consequences and obligations which were likely to arise from military action; and
- the potential wider risks to UK interests.

277. Some of those issues, but by no means all, were addressed in the advice sent to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon in preparation for the meeting with Mr Blair on 23 July.

NO.10 ADVICE, 19 JULY 2002

278. Sir David Manning gave the Cabinet Office paper to the Prime Minister on 19 July to read over the weekend, writing: "It covers much of the ground we discussed yesterday."[115]

279. Mr Blair commented on the Cabinet Office paper that: "The legal advice is, as ever, far too narrow."[116]

280. Mr Blair's position on the legal advice is addressed in Section 5.

281. Mr McKane reminded Sir David Manning on 19 July that:

> "Existing government policy – as established by DOP [the Defence and Overseas Policy Sub Committee of Cabinet] in May 1999 – is based on containment of Iraq. If the policy is changing, we ought to reflect this in a new DOP paper. Timing will obviously be critical but you might alert the PM to this point."[117]

282. There is no mention of this point in the written advice sent to Mr Blair.

283. Mr Blair agreed separate advice from Mr Powell, building on the proposals for a strategy leading to regime change set out in three earlier notes (two in November 2001 and one in March 2002).

284. The elements of Mr Powell's "road map" were similar to the proposals in the Cabinet Office paper.

285. Mr Powell advised that the UK and the US "must do it right" and not rush into action.

286. Mr Powell submitted separate advice on 19 July, suggesting that Mr Blair should send a Note providing a context for Iraq to President Bush before the expected briefing on US military plans on 4 August, and recommending a telephone call.[118]

287. Mr Powell advised:

> "I think we need a road map to getting rid of Saddam, drawing parallels as far as possible with his [President Bush's] success in Afghanistan, including the following elements:
> a. We will be there when the US takes the decision to act, but …
> b. We need to set an ultimatum as we did to the Taliban in Afghanistan. At a certain point we need to make it clear that unless Saddam agrees to inspectors on our terms – anyone, any time, anywhere – by a certain date we will act.
> c. We need to establish a legal basis. More difficult for us than for them. It needs to be based on WMD rather than terrorism or regime change. > d. We need at least neutrality in the region before we can act … If we want to base our troops in the region this will mean a real effort on the MEPP …
> e. We need to make the case. We need a plan and a timetable for releasing the papers we have prepared on human rights abuses, WMD etc. We need to have the sort of Rolls Royce information campaign we had at the end of Afghanistan before we start in Iraq.
> f. We need a convincing military plan. What we know about so far is not convincing …
> g. And we need a plan for the day after … We need to be working on this now …
> "Lastly, we should not rush this. We must do it right. If we are not ready in January 2003 then we may need to wait for autumn 2003. Of course Saddam may give us a break before then that we can exploit, but slow deliberate planning like your father in the Gulf war is the best bet."

[118] Minute Powell to Prime Minister, 19 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

288. Mr Blair responded to Mr Powell: "I agree with this entirely".[119]

Sir Jeremy Greenstock's advice to Mr Straw

289. Sir Jeremy Greenstock warned of likely difficulties with the US and others in the Security Council.

290. Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that Mr Ricketts had asked for advice on prospects for Iraq at the UN, including:

- At what point do you think that the Americans will begin to say publicly that the effort to get UN inspectors back into Iraq is dead?
- Will we/other members of the Council be able to prolong the efforts beyond that with any credibility?
- Are there any prospects for getting the Council to declare some sort of ultimatum that unless Saddam lets the Inspectors in by X, the Council will conclude Iraq has no intention of complying with its obligations (or some other formula well short of an authorisation)?[120]

291. In his response of 19 July, Sir Jeremy Greenstock set out the "broad dynamics" in New York to provide context:

- There was a lack of "vocal support … even on the lighter issues such as sanctions machinery" for the UK policy of maintaining rigorous sanctions and the return of weapons inspectors.
- Russia and China were opposed to unilateral military action and insisted on the UN route but questioned the claims about Iraq's holdings of WMD and pushed for "more carrots" to be offered to Iraq.
- There had been some movement in the French position over the previous year but it was still some distance from the UK's.
- Non-permanent members of the Security Council would "go along with the emerging majority"; most favoured continued political dialogue through the UN, opposed military action, and were sceptical of the UK's WMD claims.

292. Addressing Mr Ricketts' questions, Sir Jeremy advised:

- The US already planned to say that it saw "no value in talks at any level", and that scepticism would increasingly become public.
- Mr Annan was "likely to conclude" that he "should keep the way open for further technical contacts" with Iraq, but there "should be no further talks at his level until Iraq showed some flexibility". The UK "could not credibly argue for further political talks ourselves" as that would "pitch us directly against the Americans".

[120] Letter Greenstock to Ricketts, 19 July 2002, 'Iraq at the UN'.

- "If and when" there was Iraqi movement, which would "presumably only be under the pressure of US military preparations, the dynamics of the Council would mean that efforts to restart political talks would quickly resume".
- It was not "clear that the US would allow … an ultimatum to be put forward". They had rejected such an approach over Iraq in 1998 and Kosovo in 1999.
- Russia and China would "definitely" reject an ultimatum; they knew "full well that it could be used to justify military action which they do not support".
- Sir Jeremy did not "entirely discount bringing the Council round if we played our cards cleverly".
- The prospects for getting Russia, China and others on board "would be dramatically strengthened if we could catch the Iraqis with their pants down in some dramatic way". The "main obstacle … might actually be the Americans, who will not wish to be caught even asking the question".

293. Sir Jeremy advised that there was "a lot to be said for considering additional UN routes to put pressure on Iraq". These could include revisiting the idea of a travel ban for senior Iraqis or proposing new measures to screen Iraq's borders. Such proposals were "likely to fail" but would "help us demonstrate that we have tried to use the UN route. And in the event that such proposals do succeed, we benefit from increased pressure on the Iraqi regime. We would also buy time."

294. The UK would also need:

> "… to do more to convince Security Council colleagues and others that Saddam represents a clear and present danger. More WMD briefings at capitals is one way forward. I know we have been through this countless times, but we never seem to be able to hit the point of real conviction."

295. Finally, Sir Jeremy emphasised that the legality of military action was "one of the most difficult questions we are asked". The UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York could "avoid such questions" when military action was "theoretical":

> "But taking military action against Iraq when our claims to legality are rejected by a large percentage of UN members is going to damage our multilateral image, our CT [counter terrorism] credentials and our own electability in the UN system quite severely".

296. Sir Jeremy's letter was intended to inform the discussion on 23 July, and copies were sent by Mr Ricketts to the Cabinet Office and the MOD.

297. The letter was also seen by Lord Goldsmith.[121]

The mood in Washington

298. Following his minute of 3 July and a visit to Washington on 18 and 19 July, Sir Kevin Tebbit advised that the US Administration as a whole was increasingly united in the view that military action would be taken against Iraq to bring about regime change and remove WMD risks.

299. Sir Kevin reported that he had been left with an air of unreality given the enormity of what was envisaged and the absence of a policy framework and detailed planning.

300. Sir Kevin also commented that the UK's conditions were "listened to politely, but without enthusiasm or full agreement". The US preparations for a potential invasion did not yet meet the UK's conditions for success.

301. Sir Kevin Tebbit visited Washington on 18 to 19 July. The telegram from Washington reporting the visit described:

> "A harder-edged, more deliberative US view on regime change – though they acknowledge the scale of the challenge. They appear intent on building a strategic rationale for removing Saddam, and show scant interest in pursuing further the UN [inspections] track. Tebbit explains the need to build a solid case first, to ensure that the UN route has been exhausted, and to think through the implications for 'the day after' …"[122]

302. No one had disputed the need to make a strong international case first. Some senior Americans had argued that the case needed to be presented in "strategic non-Iraq specific terms – the US (and … others) having concluded that the existential threat of WMD necessitated – and justified – military action to remove it. Once set in this framework, the need for pre-emptive action against Iraq ought to be understood and accepted."

303. Sir Kevin Tebbit also wrote to Sir David Manning before the Ministerial discussion on 23 July.

304. Sir Kevin reported: "The principal conclusion to be drawn is that the Administration as a whole is increasingly united in the view that military action will be taken against Iraq to bring about regime change and remove WMD risks." That included the State Department "notwithstanding its views on the difficulties". The UK's "points about shaping public opinion, constructing coalitions, easing the Israel/Palestine crisis and exhausting the UN inspectorate route were listened to politely, but without enthusiasm or full agreement". There was "no clear indication about timing" but one American had said that the betting was for an operation in early 2003.

[122] Telegram 970 Washington to FCO London, 20 July 2002, 'Iraq: Sir K Tebbit's Visit to Washington, 18-19 July'.

305. Sir Kevin concluded:

> "One is still left with an air of unreality, given the enormity of what is envisaged and the absence of planning detail or policy framework to credibly make it happen. Part of the difficulty may be in the dysfunctional nature of the Washington bureaucracy under which nothing is brought together except and until it reaches the ultimate level (and Rumsfeld otherwise operates autonomously with his Commanders-in-Chief). But on the basis of the visit we still have a job on our hands to persuade the Administration to prepare for this in a way which would meet the Prime Minister's conditions for participation and, indeed for overall success."[123]

306. The letter was sent to Mr Straw's Private Office and to the Cabinet Office, Sir Richard Dearlove, and Mr Brummell.

307. The letter was seen by Mr Blair[124] and Lord Goldsmith.[125]

308. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that, at that stage, he and "a lot of other officials" were concerned to ensure that the UK's conditions "were … seriously being pursued", rather than (the UK) simply being invited to participate in detailed military planning albeit as a contingency.[126]

309. Sir Kevin stated that the first reason for the visit "was to be absolutely clear whether they [the US] were determined to proceed on a military track. It was not clear at that point."[127] The second was to understand the thinking of the different groups in Washington.

310. Sir Richard Dearlove reported that the US had already taken a decision on action, the question was how and when; and that he had been told it intended to set the threshold on weapons inspections so high Iraq would not be able to hold up US policy.

311. Sir Richard Dearlove discussed policy towards Iraq in a meeting with Dr Rice in Washington on 19 July.[128]

312. The report of the discussion stated that the US view was:

- There was "growing evidence of the construction of CBW production and links to terrorists [in Iraq] stoking fears of a repeat 9/11 with WMD".
- There was a strong strategic case for removing Saddam Hussein. Continued development of WMD was not in doubt.
- A "casus belli" already existed.

313. Sir Richard reported that he was told a US "decision had already been taken – the question was only how and when".

314. Sir Richard also reported that, in a separate discussion with a senior US official, he had been told that the US Administration's intention was to set the threshold on UN weapons inspections so high that Iraq would not be able to hold up US policy.

315. Sir David Manning drew Mr Blair's attention to a report of Sir Richard Dearlove's meetings in Washington, commenting:

> "Not much doubt here that the Administration is bent on action soon, and convincing itself that it has strong strategic, as well as a historical duty to act.
> "Our views on links between Iraq, terrorism and development of WMD are different from Condi's: not proven at best …
> "C [Sir Richard Dearlove] will be able to give the full picture tomorrow."[129]

316. Mr Powell commented: "Strengthens the need for and urgency of your note to Bush."[130]

MOD advice to Mr Hoon

317. MOD officials privately expressed strong reservations about military action to Mr Hoon, stating that there was no objective justification for a pre-emptive attack either now or in the immediate future.

318. Mr Hoon was advised that the legal framework could constrain the UK's ability to support US action.

319. In preparation for the meeting on 23 July, Mr Desmond Bowen, MOD Director General Operational Policy, advised Mr Hoon that the meeting would discuss the Cabinet Office paper of 19 July, and the agenda was expected to cover:

- US planning and timescales;
- the objectives of any military action;
- the strategic policy framework;
- the potential UK contribution; and
- an information campaign.[131]

320. Mr Bowen advised that it was "still too early to be definitive" about whether the US had a winning military concept; but that it was "likely" that the answer to that question would be "'yes' with certain conditions". The key point for Mr Blair to note was that US action could take place "very quickly, as early as November".

321. Agreeing the objective for military action would be "useful", but it begged the question of the "strategic policy framework in which to take military action in pursuit of that objective". "In particular a framework" was "required to set the conditions for military action including the necessary justification in international law". That was "important because it may well constrain our ability to support US action".

322. Adm Boyce had directed that UK planning should concentrate on two "packages": a supporting/enabling package, including basing, maritime and air assets, in which "the only land contribution would be SF [Special Forces]"; and a discrete land contribution of a division (minus) for operations in northern Iraq. They had been chosen because they effectively represented "the maximum practical UK contribution to US-led operations for either early or later action".

323. Mr Bowen advised that the "indications from the US" were that it did "not expect a ground force contribution from the UK for operations out of Kuwait"; and that "providing land forces to integrate with the US main effort in the South" had "been discounted because of the severe difficulties we would face due to interoperability; deployment time and geographic constraints affecting logistics in particular".

324. The "Line to Take" offered to Mr Hoon included:

- It was "too early to judge" if the US military plan was a winning concept and the Chiefs of Staff were "not yet convinced". The question of whether the US had a winning concept could be answered as planning developed. The UK view was that pressure should be "applied from south, west and north".
- The US would like to establish the scale of UK involvement. Subject to the legal framework, the US expected Diego Garcia, Cyprus, air enablers, maritime force and Special Forces as a minimum. There was a "Developing expectation" of a "division size force in the North with Turkey and other allies".
- Decisions were "needed urgently" if UK forces were to be involved "this winter". A large land force contribution needed "preparatory action immediately" and would not be complete until "March/April".

325. A small number of additional details from this advice are set out in Section 6.1.

326. Mr Watkins also offered Mr Hoon a "Private Office distillation of where we think most of your key advisers – Chiefs, PUS etc (with possible exception of Simon Webb) – are coming from".[132]

---

[132] Note (handwritten) Watkins to SofS [MOD], 22 July 2002, attaching 'Iraq: Summary'.

327. In relation to the "threat" posed by Iraq, Mr Hoon was advised:

- "Saddam has previously attacked his neighbours; he is developing weapons of mass destruction (WMD)."
- "But he is not currently threatening his neighbours and his WMD programme is less advanced than, say, Iran's or Libya's. There is no proven link between Saddam and AQ [Al Qaida]."
- "Saddam is being contained. There is no objective justification for a pre-emptive attack on Iraq now or in the immediate future."

328. In relation to the "geo-political implications" of military action, the points included:

"International community […] poor at handling more than one crisis simultaneously. Attack on Iraq would provoke an additional crisis – increasing the risk that other flashpoints … would be allowed to ignite/spin out of control."

329. On US "War Plans" and "UK involvement" the points included:

- "US plans are bold and imaginative. Superior capabilities should ensure rapid defeat of Iraqi formations."
- "But success is not assured … Iraqis could use CBW."
- The "Possibility of significant numbers of casualties" could not be excluded.
- "Significant UK engagement (ie ground forces) could conceivably allow us to influence US plans and would earn us huge kudos in Washington with potential paybacks elsewhere. Refusal to provide any support would … severely damage relationship."
- "In practice, US plans are more likely to be driven by internal US factors – especially if things start to go wrong."
- "UK's standing with key Gulf states that are negative … or agnostic … about the attack would suffer: they will see that there is no longer any discernable difference between US and UK policy."

330. In relation to "UK opinion", Mr Hoon was advised:

- "There is widespread unease about WMD. UK involvement in a successful campaign could be immensely popular …"
- "But there is widespread scepticism about the justification for a pre-emptive attack (Saddam is not seen as posing an imminent threat) and cynicism about US motives."
- "Public support … would be lukewarm and brittle."

331. The advice concluded:

- "The case for attacking Iraq now or in the immediate future is deeply flawed. The absence of a legal justification is not in itself a reason for doing nothing.

But an attack could have unforeseen geo-political reverberations and is not assured of rapid, complete success. If Saddam forced the US to undertake a lengthy and destructive 'siege' of Baghdad … the chief beneficiaries would be AQ and other terrorist groups."

- "We must try to persuade the US that they need to do a lot more work to clear the way for an attack on Iraq … We might also try to persuade them that other aspects of the campaign against terrorism/WMD should have higher priority …"
- "If the US persist with planning for an early attack on Iraq, the UK should offer that level of support which the US might reasonably expect of a good Ally (i.e. basing in DG [Diego Garcia] and Cyprus; niche capabilities). There is no objective case for offering more."

Mr Blair's meeting, 23 July 2002

332. Sir David Manning gave Mr Blair an annotated agenda for the meeting on 23 July, which was clearly intended to prepare Mr Blair for a telephone call to President Bush and, possibly, the preparation of a Note as suggested by Mr Powell.

333. Sir David identified questions Mr Blair might ask and advised Mr Blair that there was "a lot of ground to cover in a short time".

334. Sir David Manning provided an annotated agenda for Mr Blair, which indicated that there would be "a lot of ground to cover in a short time".[133] He suggested Mr Blair should invite:

- Mr Scarlett to set the scene with a "very brief summary" of the intelligence on the position inside Iraq;
- Sir Richard Dearlove to provide a "brief account of his recent talks with [Mr George] Tenet [Director Central Intelligence] and Condi [Rice]". Sir Richard had returned from Washington "convinced that the Administration have moved up a gear"; and
- Adm Boyce to describe current US military planning for a campaign against Iraq.

335. Sir David suggested that those presentations would "throw up a number of key questions", including:

- the "legal base" for action against Iraq;
- whether US military plans were viable;
- whether the US could find the necessary bases;
- whether there was a particular role for UK forces, the lead time necessary to prepare them and when we would have to make funding available and on what scale;

[133] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 22 July 2002, 'Iraq Meeting: 23 July: Annotated Agenda'.

- what sort of battlefield environment was anticipated, and the response to any use of biological or chemical weapons;
- how much progress would be needed on Arab/Israel before the US launched an attack;
- the impact of military action on the oil price; and
- the mood in Parliament, the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP) and the country and when we should time a public information campaign.

336. Sir David Manning concluded:

> "In the light of this discussion, you might call Bush and prepare a note for him before the summer break – along the lines proposed in Jonathan's minute … Timing is for discussion. It might be best to wait until the middle of next week, after I have been to Washington for further talks with Condi and Tenet."

337. Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July did not take firm decisions.

338. The record of the meeting stated that the UK should work on the assumption that it would take part in any military action and Admiral Boyce could tell the US that the UK was considering a range of options.

339. Mr Blair commissioned further advice and background material on all the issues, including a possible ultimatum to Iraq and the legal basis for action.

340. No conclusion is recorded on who would approach the US Administration, when, or what the objectives and tactics of that approach would be.

341. Mr Blair discussed Iraq with Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith, Sir Richard Wilson, Adm Boyce, Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards (Director of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)), Mr Scarlett, Mr Jonathan Powell, Baroness Morgan (Director of Political and Government Communications), Mr Campbell and Sir David Manning, on 23 July.[134]

342. Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting noted that:

- Mr Scarlett summarised the intelligence and latest (4 July) JIC Assessment: "Saddam's regime was tough and based on extreme fear. The only way to overthrow it was likely to be by massive military action." Saddam Hussein was "worried and expected an attack", but he was "not convinced" that an attack would be "immediate or overwhelming". Real support for Saddam Hussein was "probably narrowly based".
- Sir Richard Dearlove reported that there was "a perceptible shift in attitude" in Washington: "Military action was now seen as inevitable." President Bush "wanted to remove Saddam, through military action, justified by the conjunction of terrorism and WMD. But the intelligence and facts were being fixed around the policy. The NSC had no patience with the UN route and no enthusiasm for publishing material on the Iraqi regime's record."

- Adm Boyce reported that Secretary Rumsfeld and President Bush would be briefed by CENTCOM planners in early August. The US was examining two military options, and saw the "UK (and Kuwait) as essential". The three main options for UK involvement were:
  "(i) Basing in Diego Garcia and Cyprus plus […] SF squadrons.
  (ii) As above, with maritime and air assets in addition.
  (iii) As above, plus a land contribution of up to 40,000 perhaps with a discrete role in northern Iraq entering from Turkey, tying down two Iraqi divisions."
- Mr Hoon said that the US had already begun "spikes of activity" to put pressure on the regime. In his view, January was the most likely timing for military action.
- Mr Straw stated that it "seemed clear" that President Bush had "made up his mind to take military action, even if the timing was not yet decided. But the case was thin. Saddam was not threatening his neighbours, and his WMD capability was less than that of Libya, North Korea or Iran." The UK "should work up a plan for an ultimatum to Saddam" to allow the UN weapons inspectors back in to Iraq. That would "help with the legal justification for the use of force".
- Lord Goldsmith warned that the desire for regime change was not a legal basis for military action. Self-defence and humanitarian intervention could not be the basis for military action in this case. Relying on resolution 1205 (1998) for UN authorisation "would be difficult". The situation "might of course change".
- Mr Blair stated: "it would make a big difference politically and legally if Saddam refused to allow in the UN inspectors. Regime change and WMD were linked in the sense that it was the regime that was producing the WMD. There were different strategies for dealing with Libya and Iran. If the political context were right, people would support regime change."
- Mr Blair added: "The two key issues were whether the military plan worked and whether we had the political strategy to give the military plan the space to work."
- Adm Boyce did not yet know if the US battleplan was "workable". There were "lots of questions", for example "the consequences if Saddam Hussein used WMD on day one, or if Baghdad did not collapse and urban warfighting began".
- Mr Straw "thought the US would not go ahead with a military plan unless convinced it was the winning strategy", but there "could be US/UK differences" on the political strategy. The ultimatum should be "discreetly" explored, despite US resistance. Saddam Hussein would "continue to play hard-ball with the UN".
- Mr Scarlett assessed that "Saddam would allow the inspectors back in only when he thought the threat of military action was real".
- Mr Hoon stated that, if Mr Blair wanted UK military involvement, an early decision would be required. Mr Hoon cautioned that "many in the US did not think it was worth going down the ultimatum route". It would be important for Mr Blair "to set out the political context" to President Bush.

343. Mr Rycroft wrote that the meeting concluded:

- We should work on the assumption that the UK would take part in any military action. But we needed a fuller picture of US planning before we could take any firm decisions. CDS [Adm Boyce] should tell the US military that we were considering a range of options.
- The Prime Minister would revert on the question of whether funds could be spent in preparation for this operation.
- CDS would send the Prime Minister full details of the proposed military campaign and possible UK contributions by the end of the week.
- The Foreign Secretary would send the Prime Minister the background on the UN inspections and discreetly work up the ultimatum to Saddam …
- John Scarlett would send the Prime Minister a full intelligence update.
- We must not ignore the legal issues: the Attorney General would consider legal advice with FCO/MOD legal advisers."

344. Mr Rycroft's detailed record of the meeting was sent to the participants only.

345. Mr Rycroft sent a separate letter to Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 23 July, which very briefly summarised the action points for the FCO, MOD and Cabinet Office.[135] They were:

- Mr Straw to provide advice on the positions of countries in the region, the background on UN inspectors, and – discreet – work on an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein. These were requested by 30 July.
- Adm Boyce to tell the US military that the UK was considering a range of options for any UK involvement in any military operation. He was also to send Mr Blair full details of the proposed military campaign, and options for a UK contribution, by 30 July or earlier if they were available.
- Mr Scarlett to provide updated intelligence on a weekly basis for Mr Blair's weekend box.

346. In his account of the meeting, Mr Campbell wrote that:

"C [Sir Richard Dearlove] reported his strong feeling that the US had pretty much made up their minds.

"TB was asking whether the Iraqis would welcome an invasion or not. Jack [Straw] felt the regime would appear to be popular until it tips, but when it tips, it will happen quickly. All the signs out of Washington were that their thinking had moved forward, as per Bush's remarks about taking the battle to the enemy, taking him on before he takes us on …

"Jack set out the political difficulties. He said it was all being driven by DOD and the NSC, and [Secretary] Powell and the State Department was not fully involved …

"TB said he did not want any discussions with any other departments at this stage and did not want any of this 'swimming round the system'. He meant the Treasury …

"Jack said of the four powers posing a potential threat with WMD … Iraq would be fourth. He does not have nukes, he has some offensive WMD capability. The tough question is whether this is just regime change or is the issue WMD.

"TB was pretty clear that we had to be with the Americans. He said at one point, 'It's worse than you think, I actually believe in doing this.' He was acutely conscious how difficult it would be both with the PLP and the public, but when Jack raised the prospect of not going in with the US, TB said that would be the biggest shift in foreign policy for fifty years and I'm not sure it's very wise.

"On the tactical level, he felt maximum closeness publicly was the way to maximise influence privately …

"TB said he needed to be convinced first of the workability of the military plan, and second of an equally workable political strategy. Jack said we could probably get the votes for a UN ultimatum, but the Americans may not want to go down that route. TB saw regime change as the route to dealing with WMD."[136]

347. In his memoir, Mr Blair recorded that Adm Boyce had made it pretty clear at the meeting that "he thought the US had decided on it [military action], bar a real change of heart by Saddam".[137]

348. In his memoir published in 2007, Mr Tenet wrote that Sir Richard Dearlove had told him that he had been misquoted.[138] Sir Richard had objected in particular to the word "fixed" and offered a correction. Mr Tenet wrote that he had been told Sir Richard had:

"… expressed the view … that the war in Iraq was going to happen. He believed the momentum driving it was not really about WMD but rather about bigger issues such as changing the politics of the Middle East."

349. Mr Tenet added that Sir Richard:

"… recalled that he had a polite, but significant, disagreement with Scooter Libby [Chief of Staff to Vice President Cheney], who was trying to convince him that > there was a relationship between Iraq and al-Qa'ida. Dearlove's strongly held view based on his own Service's reporting, which had been shared with the CIA, was that any contacts that had taken place had come to nothing and that there was no formal relationship … He believed that the crowd around the Vice President was playing fast and loose with the evidence. In his view, it was never about 'fixing' the intelligence itself but rather about the undisciplined manner in which the intelligence was being used."

350. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that, during his visit to Washington in July 2002, he had had "quite contentious and difficult conversations" with Mr Libby as well as discussions with Mr Tenet, Dr Rice and Mr Stephen Hadley, US Deputy National Security Advisor.[139] He had returned from Washington "deeply concerned that there was momentum in parts of the [US] Administration", and he had warned Mr Blair about that momentum.

351. In relation to his "alleged comment" about the intelligence being fixed around the policy, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that this was really a reference to the attempts "to join up terrorism and Iraq" with which he "radically disagreed".

352. Asked if Mr Blair had taken the conjunction between terrorism and WMD seriously, Sir Richard replied:

> "… I don't think the Prime Minister ever accepted the link between Iraq and terrorism. I think it would be fair to say that the Prime Minister was very worried about the possible conjunction of terrorism and WMD, but not specifically in relation to Iraq … [I] think, one could say this is one of his primary national security concerns given the nature of Al Qaida."[140]

353. Sir Richard added that he sought an amendment to Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting on 23 July to clarify the meaning of his remarks.[141]

354. The Inquiry has seen that document.

355. In response to subsequent questioning, referring to a manuscript note made by Lord Goldsmith during the meeting, Sir Richard accepted that he might well have used the word "fitted".[142]

356. Mr Rycroft confirmed that Sir Richard had challenged his record of the meeting but, after checking his notes and discussing it with others present, he had taken no further action.[143] Mr Rycroft told the Inquiry that he had understood Sir Richard to be making the point that intelligence was going to become part of the public justification for the known US policy of regime change.

357. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he did not have a specific recollection of the meeting but he did not recall it as a key meeting, rather it was part of an "iterative process".[144]

358. Mr Hoon subsequently wrote that there was "a very full discussion of the relevant issues" at the meeting, and that:

> "Arguments both for and against UK involvement as well as relevant legal opinions were set out and recorded in the minutes of the meeting. All of the reservations set out in the summary prepared by my Private Office were fully debated in the meeting. At such a meeting I would not have thought it necessary to repeat arguments already made by others … unless there was some specific benefit in doing so."[145]

359. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that he didn't think the meeting on 23 July had "decided on much". It had been a "taking stock" meeting, but what had struck him "was that some of the language used implied that we were closer to military action than I had imagined that we were".[146]

360. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that two elements of the meeting stood out in his memory: First, there was "an underlying tension … between the Prime Minister and his Foreign Secretary". Mr Straw was "very much in the business of saying: 'The crucial thing is to get all this to the United Nations. That's the way we are going to play it. We are nowhere near military action at the minute. All the military things the military are saying need to be seen in the political context.'" Mr Straw had been "pleading quite strongly for the political nuances"; and that he was "working very hard to keep the Prime Minister … focused on the United Nations and away from getting too … gung ho about military action".

361. Second, Lord Wilson remembered "quite vividly" that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… gave his legal advice … which was you would need the authorisation of a United Nations Security Council resolution if you were going to specifically undertake military action and if you didn't do that, his strong advice was that it was illegal to take military action. The Prime Minister simply said 'Well…' and that's it. I remember thinking 'There is an unresolved issue there'."[147]

362. Lord Wilson, who remained the Cabinet Secretary until the beginning of September 2002, told the Inquiry that he had still been on duty during August 2002 and had taken papers, but he could recall none on Iraq.[148]

363. In response to a specific question about whether, following the meeting on 23 July, he thought that the Government's strategy on Iraq had coalesced by the beginning of September, Lord Wilson replied:

> "I thought they were in the thick of it … 'If you asked whether as a matter of proper Cabinet government the Cabinet had endorsed a course that was likely to lead to military action, I would tell you emphatically not' … If you had said to me 'Is the Prime Minister … serious about military action?' I would have said 'There is a gleam in his eye which worries me.' I think I used that phrase at the time."[149]

364. Lord Wilson stated:

> "I think the Prime Minister was torn over Iraq … Torn between all his instincts which were to be alongside the Americans, whatever that means, on the one hand and his knowledge that a lot of people in his Cabinet and in public opinion and people in Parliament would be unhappy with that. I would guess … that in the summer holidays in August he resolved it."[150]

365. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that he:

> "… ran through the four countries that posed a potential threat to world peace because of their unauthorised and highly dangerous weapons systems – North Korea, Iran, Libya, and Iraq. I thought it important to raise the issue as to whether we should contemplate not joining the US in any American military effort against Iraq. I was concerned that the case against Iraq (why did it merit the most severe action? what differentiated it from the other three?) had not at that stage been made: and also about the potential consequences for Tony's leadership, and the survival of his government."[151]

REQUEST FOR ADVICE ON SADDAM HUSSEIN'S MILITARY CAPABILITIES AND INTENTIONS

366. Following Mr Blair's meeting, Sir David Manning asked Mr Scarlett for advice on a number of issues.

367. It is not clear what was said about Iraq's WMD in Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July, but the following day Sir David Manning explained to Mr Blair his concern that:

> "… we (and I suspect the Americans) have only a hazy idea of Saddam's retaliatory capabilities if and when we attack Iraq. CDS was unable to say whether we would expect to fight in a CBW environment. The answer has a crucial bearing on the plausibility and viability of US military plans."[152]

[152] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 24 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

368. Sir David wrote that he had "therefore, asked John Scarlett to review all the intelligence on Saddam's military capabilities and intentions, including:

- What military equipment do we think Saddam possesses, and in what state of effectiveness?
- In particular, does he [Saddam] have chemical and biological agents; and if so, can he weaponise them?
- If he can weaponise them, do we believe he can deliver them by missile or aircraft?"

369. Sir David pointed out that Iraq had not used chemical or biological agents during the 1991 Gulf Conflict, but he was unsure whether that was because Iraq did not have the capability or for other reasons. He was:

> "… anyway left very uneasy by Mike Boyce's suggestion that the Americans believe that Saddam would only use CBW as a last resort. If this is the American assessment, it strikes me as alarmingly complacent. Saddam will know that once the US launches an attack, the game is up. From his point of view, it will be last resort time from the moment the first Marines hit the beach. And with all the wisdom of the armchair strategist, it seems to me that the temptation to let fly at the Kuwait bottleneck, with everything in his armoury, could be very strong indeed."

370. These questions were addressed in the JIC Assessment of 9 September (see Section 4.2).

371. Mr Scarlett was also asked to "do more work on regime cohesion" in the light of what Sir David described as "a risk of American wishful thinking". Sir David commented:

> "Perhaps the Saddam tyranny will collapse like a pack of cards as they hope. But we should not count on it. We need as much intelligence as we can get on the popular mood, and the attitude of Saddam's entourage, before making assumptions that determine military planning."

372. Sir David added that he would try to explore the answers to his questions during his visit to Washington the following week.

Sir Christopher Meyer's view

373. Sir Christopher Meyer told a US official that, if the US decided to move against Saddam Hussein, the UK would be "with them".

374. Sir Christopher also reported his continuing concerns that the UK's "conditions" were being discounted and his perception that the US Administration had concluded that the efforts to get UN inspectors back into Iraq had "run their course".

375. In Sir David Manning's view, President Bush was "impatient to move".

376. Sir Christopher Meyer reported on 24 July that he had told a US official that the US could "rest assured that if and when the US decided to move against Saddam Hussein, the UK would be with them. This would not be easy for the Prime Minister politically."[153]

377. Sir Christopher had been asked about a speech that Dr Henry Kissinger, the former US Secretary of State, had made the previous week, emphasising the need for pre-emption in the post-9/11 world. Dr Kissinger had argued three conditions had to be met if there were to be military action in Iraq:

- … a rapid and successful conclusion – a prolonged war would be very dangerous …;
- that the US 'got the diplomacy right' …; and
- that the US arrived in Baghdad with a clear plan for who and what should replace Saddam …"

378. Sir Christopher had said that those views "were not a million miles" from the UK's; and that it was "very important to be able to build a public case for attacking Saddam; exhausting UN processes on inspections; and unwinding violence between the Israelis and Palestinians were part of this strategy".

379. Sir Christopher warned again that, as Sir Kevin Tebbit had picked up during his visit earlier in July 2002, the "buts" in the UK's "yes, but …" approach had "less traction in Washington than a couple of months ago". It seemed a given "across the [US] Administration that efforts to get UNMOVIC into Iraq have run their course … and that, with Israel/Palestine, the process … is enough to keep the lid on during an Iraqi campaign".

380. Sir Christopher reported that General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief CENTCOM, would give President Bush his plans in early August. If the President was happy, visible preparations would probably begin in the autumn or early winter. The US expected to secure sufficient co-operation from neighbouring countries for military action.

381. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair that these were: "Further signs that Bush is impatient to move. Little reassurance on the political context."[154]

Mr Blair's press conference, 25 July 2002

382. In his press conference on 25 July, Mr Blair stated that he thought it unlikely that Iraq intended to comply with its obligations.

383. Mr Blair also stated that the evidence on Iraq's WMD would be published when he judged the moment was right.

[154] Manuscript comment Manning to Prime Minister, 25 July 2002, on Letter Meyer to Manning, 24 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

384. Mr Blair continued to reserve his position about whether a new Security Council resolution would be required to authorise military action.

385. During Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) on 24 July, Mr Blair was asked by Mr Peter Kilfoyle (Labour) whether, in the event of the US commencing military action during the Recess, Mr Blair would recall Parliament before any British forces were committed. Mr Blair replied that "we have not yet got to the stage of military action"; if that stage was reached "at any point", Parliament would be "properly consulted".[155]

386. In his press conference on 25 July, Mr Blair repeated the line that he had taken at the Liaison Committee on 16 July that Iraq's position on WMD was an issue.[156] He emphasised that no decision had been taken about how to deal with it and the need to avoid "getting ahead of ourselves". He was not prepared to speculate about an area of such "tremendous sensitivity".

387. Asked why he had refused to pledge a vote in the House of Commons before any military activity, Mr Blair said that the House of Commons would be consulted but it was important to follow the precedents and there was no point in speculating at that point about the right way to consult the House. He was not going to pin himself down to any specific form of consultation.

388. Asked why the promised dossier laying out the evidence against Saddam Hussein had not appeared, Mr Blair stated that it would be published when he judged it to be the right moment.

389. Asked whether the UK would actively be encouraging the US Administration to seek a new UN Security Council resolution as a pre-requisite for military action, Mr Blair replied:

> "What is important is that whatever action we take, should we take action, it is done in accordance with international law. I don't think we can judge the issue of UN resolutions at this present moment … the most important thing is to go back to … the UN resolutions that we have … I haven't fully caught up on the exact state of the negotiations between the UN Secretary-General and the Iraqis, but the omens don't look very good frankly for Iraq.
> "… the issue is, is there any point in reviving those negotiations … because it seems somewhat unlikely that the Iraqis intend to comply."

FCO advice, 26 July 2002

390. In response to the request following the discussion on 23 July discreetly to work up the ultimatum to Saddam Hussein, No.10 was advised on 26 July that there would be "formidable obstacles to overcome" to secure agreement to a new resolution incorporating an ultimatum without convincing evidence of a greatly increased threat from Iraq.

391. It would not be easy to persuade the US to support an ultimatum given the US concerns to avoid a resolution which would constrain its freedom.

392. An ultimatum issued by the US/UK might have presentational utility but it would have no legal force.

393. Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, responded to Mr Rycroft on 26 July with advice on "how to get the Security Council to issue some sort of ultimatum ahead of any military action".[157]

394. The letter reflected advice from the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York and the British Embassy Washington and a list of elements which might be incorporated in a new resolution was enclosed with the letter. It was envisaged that:

- Iraq's failure to co-operate would be condemned as a "flagrant violation" of its obligations;
- the ultimatum would take the form of a demand for UNMOVIC and the IAEA to be allowed "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access"; and
- the resolution would declare that, if Iraq did not comply, it would be clear that it had "no intention of complying with its obligations".

395. The letter stated:

- To carry conviction an ultimatum would have to be "couched as a Chapter VII Security Council resolution" deciding that Iraq is in "flagrant violation of SCR 687 and other relevant resolutions" and calling on Iraq to allow "immediate, unconditional, and unrestricted access to any and all areas", as specified in resolution 1284 (1999), by a given date.
- There were "likely to be formidable obstacles to overcome" to secure a resolution "unless there was convincing evidence of a greatly increased threat from the Iraqis".
- The US "vigorously asserted the right of individual Member States to determine whether Iraq has breached the cease-fire" set out in resolution 687 (1991), "irrespective of whether the Council" had "made such an assessment". The US would "argue against establishing an ultimatum which they would see as interfering with that right". The US would "also argue that faced with a credible ultimatum Iraq would make a show of co-operation to secure a delay, muddy the waters and split the Council"; and that Iraq would restrict the inspectors' access to facilities.

[157] Letter McDonald to Rycroft, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq: Ultimatum' attaching Paper 'Elements which might be incorporated in an SCR embodying an ultimatum to Iraq'.

- If the US accepted the idea, Russia and China would reject it: "They would see it as a precursor to military action. The US might be able to win over the Russians … The Chinese might then follow."
- France would still need "to be brought on board". It would be "highly suspicious if they thought the purpose of an ultimatum was to legitimise military action rather than get the inspectors in".
- If the US "refused outright to countenance" a resolution with an ultimatum, or the US and UK "failed to persuade" other Permanent Members, "there might be merit … in a bilateral US/UK ultimatum on the model used before the start of hostilities in Afghanistan". That "might be a useful manifesto of our aims … with sceptical governments and public opinion. But it would have no legal force."
- There were risks. Opponents might table a resolution condemning an ultimatum, arguing that as the US and UK would not be "claiming to be acting in self-defence under Article 51 of the UN Charter (as we were in Afghanistan)", an ultimatum "would amount to a threat of a use of force, breaching Article 2(4), which prohibits this". The UK might find itself "having to veto [such a resolution], leaving us worse off than if we had not tried this route at all".
- An "essential first step would be to sound out the Americans" on which the FCO was "now putting action in hand".

396. The letter stated that the FCO was reconsidering additional UN routes to put pressure on Iraq – travel bans, new measures to screen Iraq's borders. While such proposals were "likely to fail", they would "help us demonstrate that we have tried to use the UN route … if they succeeded, we would benefit from increased pressure on the Iraqi regime. We would also buy time."

397. The FCO was "giving further thought to what more we might be able to do to convince the Security Council, European Union and other governments that Saddam represents a clear and present danger. The Cabinet Office paper [the draft 'dossier' on Iraq] when the right time comes for its release, will clearly be an important element of this."

398. A copy of the FCO letter was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon and the Cabinet Secretary, and to Mr Scarlett.

399. It was not sent to Lord Goldsmith.

400. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed developments on 26 July and agreed to meet in August.

401. Mr Straw sent Mr Blair a personal, handwritten letter setting out his concerns which he framed in terms of doubts about the strength of the case that had been made for military action against Iraq.

402. Mr Blair recognised the difficulties but commented that it was hard to see a way through unless "we just don't do it"; and he thought it was right to take action.

403. Mr Straw spoke to Secretary Powell on 26 July to seek a one-to one discussion on Iraq in late August.[158]

404. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that meetings in the US "the week after next" would "become 'much more serious' but would not necessarily accelerate the timing of any action".

405. Mr Straw stated that Iraq was "an increasingly big issue in the UK". As well as planning military action, there was a need "to make the case in public for such action". There was also a need for a process, as had happened in relation to Afghanistan, for "getting as many people on board internationally as possible".

406. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the papers prepared for publication on Iraq and whether they set out the case against Iraq in strong enough terms. Secretary Powell said that Mr Tenet was looking at a paper for possible publication. Mr Straw "rehearsed the history" of the UK paper (see Section 4.1) and said: "Objectively, the case against Iraq was third or fourth strongest; Iraq was not in a top priority category of its own."

407. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that serious people were writing to Mr Blair questioning "how was Iraq different from North Korea Libya or Iran" and "why was action necessary now". Sir Michael Quinlan, a former Permanent Under Secretary of the MOD, had asked what had changed in the last year, and whether there was really any evidence that Saddam Hussein was about to use WMD. Sir Michael had concluded that not much had changed.

408. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he "knew that some issues were difficult in Washington – weapons inspectors and issuing an ultimatum – but they still had to be faced".

409. Mr Straw's view was that Saddam Hussein was "evil but not insane". Secretary Powell referred to the warning about the use of WMD the US had issued to Saddam Hussein in 1991.

410. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell also discussed the consequences of military action; and that the only way to ensure a strong central government would be for the US and UK to stay on. That might require "an army of occupation for years to come".

411. As well as the formal record of the discussion, Mr Straw sent Mr Blair a handwritten letter rehearsing doubts about the strength of the case for military action against Iraq.[159]

[159] Letter (handwritten) Straw to Blair, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

412. Mr Straw wrote that it could be argued that "deterrence and containment had worked up to now: what was the case that argued they would not work in future?" He also pointed out that the regional reactions were "All too clear, I fear, unless a stronger case is better made." Mr Straw added his own concern about "the survival of your government" because of unease in both the Cabinet and the PLP; and the desire for "a case which has yet to be made". Without that, Mr Straw advised "the most serious divisions would open up".

413. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that the letter had "set out the hazards ahead if our handling of Iraq went wrong" and that it had ended: "And you know where some (not so loyal) are on all this. Licking their lips at the possibility of regime change nearer home."[160]

414. Mr Blair commented to officials in No.10:

> "I entirely agree with all this. But it is hard to see the way through, unless we just don't do it. But I think it's right to do it."[161]

Mr Blair's Note to President Bush, 28 July 2002

415. Mr Blair sent President Bush a "Note on Iraq" on 28 July.[162]

416. The Note began:

> "I will be with you, whatever. But this is the moment to assess bluntly the difficulties. The planning on this and the strategy are the toughest yet. This is not Kosovo. This is not Afghanistan. It is not even the Gulf War.
> "The military part of this is hazardous but I will concentrate mainly on the political context for success."

417. Mr Blair stated that getting rid of Saddam Hussein was:

> "… the right thing to do. He is a potential threat. He could be contained. But containment … is always risky. His departure would free up the region. And his regime is … brutal and inhumane …"

418. Mr Blair wrote that the first question was whether the US wanted or needed a coalition. He stated that the US "could do it alone, with UK support", but drew attention to the dangers of "unintended consequences", writing:

> "Suppose it got militarily tricky. Suppose Iraq suffered unexpected civilian casualties. Suppose the Arab street finally erupted eg in […] Suppose Saddam felt sufficiently politically strong, if militarily weak in conventional terms, to let off WMD. Suppose that, without any coalition, the Iraqis feel ambivalent about being invaded and real Iraqis … decide to offer resistance. Suppose … that any difficulties, without a coalition, are magnified and seized on by a hostile international opinion. If we win quickly, everyone will be our friend. If we don't … recriminations will start fast.

"None of these things might happen. But they might … And there is one other point. We will need to commit to Iraq for the long term. Bedding down a new regime will take time. So, without support, the possibility of unintended consequences will persist through and beyond the military phase."

419. Mr Blair stated that he was "keen on a coalition, not necessarily military but politically".

420. Addressing the nature of a coalition, Mr Blair wrote that he was "a little alarmed" about the reports he had been given of US optimism about support from Arab nations and Europe. That was not his reading, and:

"The trouble is, everyone says: they will support action, but they add a rider … [which] is not always sufficiently heard or spoken."

421. Mr Blair identified three key areas where, in his view, changes would be needed before there would be support for action on Iraq:

- the Middle East Peace Process would need to be in a different place;
- specific UN authority; and
- public opinion in the UK, Europe and the Arab world was "quite simply on a different planet" from opinion in the US.

422. Mr Blair added that "right now", he "couldn't be sure of support from Parliament, Party, public or even some of the Cabinet"; and that, "oddly", Russia might be their "best ally".

423. Mr Blair set out six elements for "A Strategy for Achieving a Coalition".

424. Addressing "The UN", Mr Blair wrote:

"We don't want to be mucked around by Saddam … and the danger is he drags us into negotiation. But we need, as with Afghanistan and the ultimatum to the Taliban, to encapsulate our casus belli in some defining way. This is certainly the simplest. We could, in October as the build up starts, state that he must let the inspectors back in unconditionally and do so now, ie set a 7-day deadline. It might be backed by a UNSCR or not, depending on what support there was (and I am not sure anyone, at present, would veto it if Russia was on board). There would be no negotiation. There would be no new talks with Annan. It would be: take it or leave it."

425. Mr Blair added that he knew there would be "reluctance" to that approach:

"But it would neutralise opposition … If he did say yes, we continue the build-up and we send teams over and the moment he obstructs, we say: he's back to his games.

That's it. In any event, he probably would screw it up and not meet the deadline, and if he came forward after the deadline, we could just refuse to deal."

426. "The Evidence": Mr Blair wrote that he had been told that the US thought evidence was unnecessary but his view was "we still need to make the case". He suggested:

"If we recapitulate all the WMD evidence; add his attempts to secure nuclear capability; and, as seems possible, add on the Al Qaida link, it will be hugely persuasive over here. Plus … the abhorrent nature of the regime. It could be done simultaneously with the deadline."

427. "MEPP": Mr Blair wrote that it would be "essential" for Arab support for negotiation to have started "in earnest". It was "worth a real effort to get a proper negotiation going", and that wouldn't start unless someone took charge of the detail.

428. Addressing Iraq "Post Saddam", Mr Blair wrote:

"Suppose we were able to say … Regime change is vital and, in the first instance, it must be one that protects Iraq's territorial integrity and provides stability; and hence might involve another key military figure. But it should lead in time to a democratic Iraq governed by the people. This would be very powerful. I need advice on whether it's feasible. But just swapping one dictator for another seems inconsistent with our values."

429. Mr Blair suggested that some in the "Arab/Moslem World" would "fall into line", but others would not; and Syria and Iran "might be actively hostile or use it as a means to support terrorism in Israel". A "dedicated effort" was needed "to woo the Arab world", and "to offer hardliners a very hard-headed partnership or put them on the 'axis of evil' list".

430. Mr Blair wrote that "Afghanistan" had to be "going right, not wrong". It was "our one act of regime change so far, so it had better be a good advertisement", and his "hunch" was that it needed "renewed focus and effort".

431. Mr Blair wrote that both Turkey and the Kurds would "need to be OK". They might be the "easiest" [members of a coalition]: "They both want our help badly and will play ball if offered enough."

432. Mr Blair told President Bush that he would be "happy to try to pull this [the strategy] together; ie to dedicate myself to getting all these [six] elements … sorted, including involving myself in the MEPP". But it would need "a huge commitment in time and energy", and was "only really worth doing if we are all on the same page".

433. In a final section on "The Military Plan", Mr Blair wrote:

"Finally, obviously, we must have a workable military plan. I don't know the details yet, so this is first blush.

"The two options are running start and generated start.

"The first has the advantage of surprise; the second of overwhelming force. My military tell me the risks of heavy losses on the running start make it very risky. Apparently it involves around 15-20,000 troops striking inside Iraq, with heavy air support. The idea would be to catch the regime off balance, strike hard and quickly and get it to collapse. The obvious danger is [that] it doesn't collapse. And there is the risk of CW being used.

"For that reason, a generated start seems better. It could always be translated into a more immediate option, should Saddam do something stupid. Also, the build-up of forces in such numbers will be a big signal of serious intent to the region and help to pull people towards us and demoralise the Iraqis. This option allows us to hammer his air defences and infrastructure; to invade from the South and take the oilfields; to secure the North and protect/stabilise the Kurds. Then effectively with huge force we go on to Baghdad."

434. Mr Blair concluded:

"We would support in any way we can.

"On timing, we could start building up after the break. A strike date could be Jan/Feb next year. But the crucial issue is not when, but how."

435. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that Mr Blair was seeking a partnership with President Bush and seeking to persuade him to move in a particular direction by providing a framework for action.

436. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the Note was "a very important one … trying to make it clear the basis on which we thought it would be sensible to go ahead", and the basis on which the US should go to the UN. Mr Blair was "talking about … the danger of unintended consequences".[163]

437. Addressing what was meant by the reference to unintended consequences, Mr Powell stated that the Iraqis would "feel ambivalent about being invaded. If we win quickly everyone will be our friend. If we don't, and they haven't been bound in beforehand, the recriminations will start fast." Mr Blair was "arguing to put this [action against Iraq] in a political context and to do it in a way that would win support of a wide coalition as with Afghanistan".

438. Asked if Mr Blair was trying to offer Britain's support in return for influence over the means for taking action, Mr Powell replied:

"Obviously, there is a trade-off between convincing someone that you are with them, that you believe what they are trying to do and you are going to try to help them and getting some influence. If you just go to someone and say, 'You're completely wrong. Forget it', the amount of influence you are likely to have … is less.

"So … there is a trade-off between indicating you are with someone and then persuading them to move down a particular route."[164]

439. Asked whether the elements that would be essential for success were red lines for the UK and absolutely essential or whether they were things that would be nice to have but the UK would go along with the policy whatever happened, Mr Powell said that Mr Blair was not setting conditions for UK participation in military action:

"The point of these Notes is to try and set out the right way to do it … [T]hinking of them in terms of conditions is the wrong way to look at it. We weren't trying to say 'If you tick off all these boxes, then we will be with you'. We were saying 'We are with you in terms of what you are trying to do, but this is the sensible way to do it. We are offering you a partnership to try to get to a wide coalition'.

"But being with the Americans didn't necessarily mean going to war. The Prime Minister said repeatedly to President Bush that if Saddam complied with the UN Resolutions, then there would not be any invasion and President Bush agreed with him on that.

"… So the Prime Minister was saying, 'We are with you. We need to go down the UN route, but that does not necessarily mean war. It may well be that Saddam could comply well short of war.'"[165]

440. Mr Powell emphasised that telling the US there were "pre-conditions" would have been a mistake; the UK was "setting out a framework" and "trying to persuade them to move in a particular direction".[166]

441. Sir David Manning confirmed that Mr Blair himself had written the Note he sent to President Bush on 28 July.

442. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had drafted the Note to President Bush himself. Sir David had tried to take the first sentence out because it was "too sweeping", it seemed to him "to close off options", and he did not think that that was "a sensible place to be".[167]

443. Asked who else had seen the Note in draft, Sir David Manning stated:

"The only other person I'm aware of who saw the Note in draft was Jonathan Powell … I went to Jonathan and said, 'The Prime Minister should not say this', and we went up to the flat. We talked through with him [Mr Blair], and I said that the first sentence should come out and Jonathan agreed, but the Prime Minister decided to leave it.

"I have always assumed, incidentally, because he saw it as a rhetorical flourish, not because at that stage he was thinking anything in terms of what the scale of commitments might be. But it was a sort of emotional statement, I think. But it seemed to me that it went further than we should have gone."[168]

444. Asked if he thought it "was heard" in the sense Mr Blair intended, Sir David replied:

"… I just don't know. I thought there was a risk it would be taken at face value. I can't tell you whether it actually was …"

445. Asked how often his advice was declined on a matter like this, Sir David replied that there were:

"… not many such moments … he [Mr Blair] was willing to listen to advice, but he was absolutely happy to pursue his own course … he was elected and it was [for] him to decide.

"But the Prime Minister had strong views about things. He was absolutely open to debate, but on a lot of things, if he'd made up his mind, he'd made up his mind."[169]

446. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Mr Blair offered further insights into his thinking.

447. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote:

"So it's impossible not to read the accounts of the meetings during that time without an assumption of a decision already taken.

"But here is the difference between everyone else and the final decision taker. Everyone can debate and assume; only one person decides. I knew at that moment that George had not decided. He had … a conceptual framework in which the pivotal concept was that Saddam had to come fully into compliance and disarm but he had taken no final decision on the way to make him.

"In late July, I sent George another personal, private note …"[170]

448. Mr Blair described the Note to President Bush as "setting the case for going the UN route; and stressing again the Middle East Peace Process". Following the Note he had:

"… reflected with the closest team on the different strands of the challenge. If it came to war, how did we do it with [the] least bloodshed? That was the military question. On the basis that we did it, how did we maximise the coalition? That was the UN question. And how did we do it without provoking uproar across the Middle East? That was the Arab question."

449. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair to address in a written statement how the US Administration would have interpreted the opening sentence of his Note and whether that corresponded with the degree of the commitment he wanted to give.[171]

450. Mr Blair did not respond directly. In the context of a section of his statement addressing the fact that the US had no need of a further UN resolution before acting, Mr Blair wrote that the Note had:

"… set out … the strong reason why, politically, I thought a UN resolution was necessary, primarily to build a broad coalition against Saddam and to show we were prepared to disarm him peacefully."[172]

451. Mr Blair also wrote:

"I could not and did not offer some kind of 'blank cheque' in how we accomplished our shared objectives."[173]

452. Asked subsequently to tell the Inquiry what was in the Note, Mr Blair said that he thought he had amended the opening sentence and commented: "Frankly I think he [Sir David Manning] would have preferred me not to have given any undertaking at all."[174]

453. Mr Blair stated:

"What I was saying to President Bush was very clear and simple. It is: You can count on us. We are going to be with you in tackling this, but here are the difficulties."

454. The Note had been "about all the issues and difficulties". In Mr Blair's view, there was "a very clear and simple decision to take". America was "going to tackle this issue". His first question for President Bush was "do we want it to be a coalition?" His "belief was it was extremely important for the international community to hold together at this point". He did not see 11 September "as an attack on America". It was "an attack on us … the West".[175]

455. Mr Blair added:

"America could do it unilaterally. Of course they could, but I would prefer them to do it multilaterally. So in a sense what I was saying to America was … 'Whatever the political heat, if I think this is the right thing to do I am going to be with you. I am not going to back out because the going gets tough. On the other hand, here are the difficulties and this is why I think the UN route is the right way to go'."

456. Mr Blair was "absolutely sure" that was how President Bush had interpreted the Note.[176]

457. Asked whether the language he had used in his Note was wholly consistent with his statement for the Inquiry, in which he had written that he had not offered the US a blank cheque, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he "did not think the Americans were in any doubt at all about what was being said".[177] He could not recall all the precise conversations, but "this [the Note] was entirely consistent also" with what he was saying publicly.

458. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he was:

> "… trying to get them very substantially to change their position. Their position had been 'we are going to do it'. Then their position had been because I had asked them 'Okay with an ultimatum.' Now their position with huge opposition within his system was going to be 'We are going to put this back in the lap of the United Nations'.
> "Some of the people in his Administration were saying 'You are crazy. You are going to put it back into the bureaucracy of the UN they will swallow it up. You will be back to all this playing around. In the meantime you have this guy doing what he is doing, sitting there and nothing happening.'
> "So I was having to persuade him to take a view radically different from any of the people in his Administration so what I was saying to him is 'I am going to be with you in handling it this way. I am not going to push you down this path and then back out when it gets too hot politically, because it is going to get hot for me politically, very, very much so.'
> "I did this because I believed in it. I thought it was the right thing to do … frankly, whatever phrasing I used, I accept entirely I was saying 'I am going to be with America in handling this. However, we should handle it this way'. That was in the end what they agreed to do. The single thing that is most important over anything else in this whole business … is that [resolution] 1441 [agreed in November 2002] represented a huge compromise on his part and a huge opportunity for the international community to get its act together."[178]

SIR DAVID MANNING'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON

459. Before his visit to Washington, Mr Scarlett provided Sir David with a list of points where more information was needed about Iraq and its intentions, for his "back pocket", including:

- Iraq's CBW and ballistic missile capability …
- Saddam's 'red lines' which would provoke him to use CBW against coalition forces or his neighbours.
- What Saddam plans to do if there is a credible military force being prepared … Does he [Saddam] consider pre-emption a possibility?
- Will he fully accept inspectors if the US threat seems imminent? If he does accept (likely …), how open is he willing to be?
- The cohesion of key military and security organisations … At what point will they desert/stop doing their duty?
- Who might act against Saddam and would they act before Baghdad is occupied by coalition forces?
- The prospects for an uprising of the civil populace in Shia cities and what the [Iraqi] security forces' response would be.
- The likely popular attitude to a US invasion and the arrival of US or allied troops on their territory.
- What would be the Israeli response to an Iraqi CBW attack?"[179]

460. Sir David Manning had a "pre-meeting" with Mr Armitage.[180]

461. Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting stated that Sir David and Mr Armitage discussed the US and UK positions.[181]

462. The US focus was on the disarmament of Iraq, not the re-admittance of inspectors. Sir David had raised questions about Saddam Hussein's capabilities and intentions and the importance of the UN route with an ultimatum for political and "optical" reasons, not just legal reasons, to change the international context. It would have to be a tough ultimatum with a short timeframe and no wriggle-room which shifted the onus onto Saddam Hussein.

463. Sir David told the Inquiry that he had raised a number of detailed points with Mr Armitage:

> "… Why now? What if Saddam Hussein were to use weapons of mass destruction during a military campaign? What would follow military action? What role … would the United States see the United Nations playing, and what was the United States planning to do about the Middle East Peace Process?"[182]

464. Sir David said he had told Mr Armitage that he "didn't think we had answers to those questions". Mr Armitage had replied that he thought they needed a lot more work and that: "It was better to be right than to hurry."[183]

465. During his visit to Washington, Sir David Manning told President Bush that Mr Blair agreed Saddam Hussein had to go, but it would be impossible for the UK to take part in any action against Iraq unless it went through the UN.

466. Sir David reported that President Bush had been "very struck" by Mr Blair's emphasis on an ultimatum; and that he had not yet made up his mind. Mr Blair should push the need for action through the UN and an ultimatum "very hard" in his telephone call with President Bush on 31 July.

467. Sir David Manning delivered the Note from Mr Blair to President Bush to Dr Rice on 29 July.[184] Sir David told the Inquiry that he and Dr Rice had discussed the Note during dinner. He had told her that, as the Note made clear:

- "Britain could only take part in any policy if it was part of a coalition which went through the United Nations."
- The "Middle East Peace Process was absolutely critical".
- "[S]o was the effort … to explain why Iraq was an issue and why we felt we had to tackle it."

468. Sir David told the Inquiry that he had also set out the questions he had raised with Mr Armitage.

469. Sir David Manning's record of his discussion with Dr Rice for Mr Blair advised that he had indicated that the Note was sent personally to the President and not intended for wider circulation.[185] Sir David had concluded President Bush wanted the UK to be involved. There was some reluctance in the US Administration (to involve the UN), but Mr Blair "just might persuade" President Bush. If he did, that would "transform the public relations campaign and make action much easier to manage".

470. A meeting in early September had also been discussed which would allow President Bush to hear "directly" what Mr Blair had to say.

471. Sir David cautioned that, until then, Mr Blair should "not … commit" himself "formally and finally to anything, except moral support … Leaving things open may increase the chance that he [President Bush] will take heed of the arguments in your Note and adjust his policy."

472. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he had expected a further meeting with Dr Rice and others in the NSC the following morning.[186] To his surprise, he was instead invited to meet President Bush, and he and Dr Rice had a discussion with President Bush which lasted 30 or 40 minutes. President Bush had been briefed on the discussion the previous evening and had "clearly read and studied the Prime Minister's Note". Sir David had been asked to "go over [it] again"; and he had "repeated that it was impossible for the United Kingdom to take part in any action against Iraq unless it were through the United Nations. This was our preference but it was also the political reality."

473. In his record of the discussion with President Bush, Sir David Manning wrote that he had said that Mr Blair agreed Saddam Hussein had to go:

> "There was no difference about ends [regime change], but means was an issue. Iraq was politically very difficult … We were not bidding for a role. We knew that the US could do the job alone. That would be fine by you if that was the President's preference, in which case we would lend moral support. But if he wanted more … from us, he had to understand the politics from your perspective."[187]

474. Sir David Manning reported that President Bush had been "struck by your [Mr Blair's] emphasis on the need for an ultimatum" which the Administration would need to think through.

475. Sir David told President Bush that if he:

> "… preferred to work with a coalition, the UN route was the way to construct it. A tough, time-bound, ultimatum to Saddam at the end of the process would put him at a serious disadvantage while rallying the International community for action … I thought you had no difficulty with the idea of pre-emption … It was entirely understandable that we should try to pre-empt him. But it was vital to make the public case … Awkward and time-consuming though it might be, this was the route calculated to help European leaders bring their publics and parliaments in support … [President] Bush should be trying to catch all our fingers in the UN mangle."

476. Sir David reported that President Bush had understood the point and the "issue he had to reflect on now was 'how to set the stage' so that we could pursue the goal together of getting rid of Saddam".

477. Sir David's report concluded that President Bush was keen to discuss the Note with Mr Blair on the telephone on 31 July; and that Mr Blair should go to Washington in September. Sir David advised: "I do not think this [the UN and an ultimatum] is yet a lost cause. My advice is that you should push it very hard." President Bush "might decide to go this route if he thinks it is the key to your active support. If he does, it will transform the domestic and wider international context."

478. Sir David recorded the conversations with both Dr Rice and President Bush in full.

479. Sir David discussed the record of his conversation with President Bush with Mr Blair at Chequers on 31 July. He told the Inquiry:

> "… I saw the Prime Minister … at Chequers, and I said to him that I did not think a return to the UN route was a lost cause and it was worth his while to continue to press the President to go down the UN route. Provisionally an agreement was reached … for the Prime Minister to go and see the President as soon as the summer holidays were over, and this is what indeed he did."[188]

480. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he felt his meetings with Dr Rice and President Bush in Washington at the end of July, when he delivered Mr Blair's Note, had reopened a debate in the US that might have been closed.

481. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry:

> "… I was quite clear, when I was sent to Washington at the end of July to talk about the state of the debate in America, that … the United States could take military action if it wished to, but we could not do so unless the United States decided to go back to the United Nations."[189]

482. Subsequently, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he had thought "at the end of July" that "[President] Bush had probably made up his mind he was just going to go and attack Iraq at some point over the next few months … and that he had probably subscribed … to the view that the UN was a distraction".[190] President Bush had asked to see him because of the point he had made to Dr Rice that the UK could not participate without going back to the UN. While he was "wary about making this claim", he had returned from Washington "feeling that it had reopened a debate that might have been pretty much closed".

483. Sir David drew attention to the emphasis he had put on the need for a new UN resolution in his discussions.

484. Sir David stated:

> "It was quite clear to me in the summer of 2002 that the only way we could accompany the Americans in a shift in policy that might conceivably lead to regime change was if they opted to go through the United Nations and if there were a new Security Council resolution …

> "… it would not have been possible to have softened those conditions, and so it was absolutely essential, as far as the British Government was concerned."[191]

Lord Goldsmith's minute, 30 July 2002

485. Lord Goldsmith advised Mr Blair on 30 July that military action would be unlawful without a new determination by the Security Council of a material and flagrant breach by Iraq of its obligations. A new Security Council resolution explicitly authorising the use of force would be the most secure and preferred legal basis for the use of force.

486. A report that Mr Blair had been told "by the Government's lawyers that British participation in an invasion of Iraq would be illegal" appeared in The Independent on 29 July.[192] The article also stated that senior government sources had said that Mr Blair had "also received conflicting legal opinion from law officers that current UN resolutions could offer sufficient cover for any military action".

487. Lord Goldsmith sent Mr Blair a 16-paragraph minute on 30 July.[193] He wrote that, as the record of the 23 July meeting set out his views "only in summary form", and "given the importance of this matter", he had thought he should set out his advice "more fully".

488. Lord Goldsmith recapitulated the advice he had given at the 23 July meeting and stated:

> "A new Security Council resolution explicitly authorising the use of force under Chapter VII would plainly be the most secure, and preferred, legal basis for military action in the current situation. The question is whether anything less than this would make military action lawful."

489. Addressing that question, Lord Goldsmith quoted the advice provided by Mr John Morris (Attorney General 1997 to 1999), supported by Lord Falconer (as Solicitor General), to Mr Blair in November 1997:

> "Charles [Lord Falconer] and I remain of the view that, in the circumstances presently prevailing, an essential precondition of the renewed use of force to compel compliance with the cease-fire conditions is that the Security Council has, in whatever language – whether expressly or impliedly – stated that there has been a breach of the cease-fire conditions and that the Council considers the breach sufficiently grave to undermine the basis or effective operation of the cease-fire."

490. Lord Goldsmith advised that reliance on the "revival" of the authorisation for the use of force in resolution 678 (1990) had been controversial when it was invoked by the UK in 1998 (Operation Desert Fox), because resolution 1205 (1998) did not itself contain any explicit authority to use force.

491. Lord Goldsmith wrote: "I believe that it is essential to show at least some determination by the Security Council itself that there has been a sufficiently significant violation of the cease-fire conditions." Given the time that had elapsed and the impact of events, he did not "consider it legally possible to rely today on resolution 1205".

492. Lord Goldsmith concluded:

> "My view therefore is that in the absence of a fresh resolution by the Security Council which would at least involve a new determination of a material and flagrant breach [by Iraq of its obligations], military action would be unlawful. Even if there were such a resolution, but one which did not explicitly authorise the use of force, it would remain highly debatable whether it legitimised military action – but without it the position is, in my view, clear.
>
> "The issuing of an ultimatum to Iraq may be helpful in delivering a clear political message to Iraq and ensuring that all possible steps have been taken to ensure Iraqi compliance before force is used. However an ultimatum, whether issued unilaterally or by the Security Council, would not in itself provide a separate legal base for the use of force."

493. Copies of Lord Goldsmith's minute were sent to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon.

494. Mr Powell recorded that Mr Blair and Lord Goldsmith would "discuss further" in September.

495. A note for the No.10 file written by Mr Powell on 31 July recorded that the:

> "PM has seen [Lord Goldsmith's minute], as has David Manning.
> "I phoned Private Offices in FCO and MOD on 30/7, at the request of the AG [Attorney General] (and in his presence) to ask them to destroy their copies to avoid further leaks. PM to discuss further with AG in September."[194]

496. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that Lord Goldsmith's advice of 30 July had convinced him that a new resolution was necessary, and that it needed to be the right resolution.

497. Addressing the reference in his minute to reliance on previous resolutions, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "… the revival argument depends on two things. It depends … on the fact that resolution 678 authorised the use of force and that resolution 687 suspended it on conditions, but didn't, in fact, cancel it …

[194] Note (handwritten) Powell, 31 July 2002, 'File'.

"… the second requirement that someone has to make a determination of material breach. In 1998 a determination had been made by the Security Council in resolution 1205, actually not that there was a material breach, but that there was a flagrant violation. It sounds worse, actually it is not a legal term at all, and so it creates confusion … in any event, there was a question whether … in 2002 [you could], rely upon the fact that, in 1998, the Security Council had said that Iraq was in flagrant violation?

"My view was … no, you couldn't, because a lot had happened since then and the Security Council might take a different view today.

"… you couldn't rely on 1205 in my judgement in 2002, and you would therefore need to have at least a new determination by the Security Council … that there was a material breach."[195]

498. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he had sent his minute of 30 July because he did not want Mr Blair to be in any doubt that he could not agree with President Bush to use force without going back to the United Nations:

"I wasn't asked for it. I don't, frankly, think it was terribly welcome. I do believe that it may well have been one of the contributing factors to the Prime Minister, to his great credit, persuading President Bush that he must go down the United Nations route."[196]

499. Mr Blair acknowledged that Lord Goldsmith's advice had had an effect:

"… one of the things that was most important in us going down the UN route was precisely the legal advice we got."[197]

500. Mr Blair stated:

"… what I took from the advice … was that we needed a fresh resolution. I do point out that – because this was why at a later stage, I became concerned as to what the legal problem was, because, of course, we got a further resolution."[198]

501. Asked whether Lord Goldsmith's advice had been unwelcome, Mr Blair replied:

"It wasn't that it was not particularly welcome … I was dealing with what was already a difficult situation, and now I became aware we had to take a whole new dimension into account."[199]

502. Mr Blair added:

> "… it actually then was very helpful for him to do this, because he focused our minds, quite rightly, on the need to get the right resolution in 1441 … He wanted to make it absolutely clear that it wasn't merely … going down the UN route, it is getting the right resolution that will be important."[200]

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 31 July 2002

503. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 31 July, the "central issue of a casus belli" and the need for further work on the optimal route to achieve that, was discussed.

504. Mr Blair said that he wanted to explore whether the UN was the right route to set an ultimatum or whether it would be an obstacle.

505. Mr Blair did not tell President Bush that he had been advised that the UK would need a new UN resolution to provide legal authority for military action.

506. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 31 July.[201] Mr Rycroft's letter recording the conversation stated that it had become clear during Sir David Manning's visit to Washington that the US was not about to take imminent action in Iraq and was focusing on the political context.

507. In his conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair had made clear that there was "no doubt that the UK would be with the US on Iraq". He wanted to explore whether the UN route was the right way of setting an ultimatum or whether it would be an obstacle and further work on whether we should go for a UNSCR to address "how we could ensure that Saddam did not play us around". There were many parts of Iraq into which Saddam Hussein could not allow the inspectors. It could be possible to construct a quick and neat ultimatum but, "If this route were not to produce the right result, we should not go down it."

508. Mr Blair added that he had an "open mind":

> "If the ultimatum were too difficult or if it complicated the task, we should not do it. But, if we could, it would be the simplest way of building the coalition and weakening the opposition to military action. Focusing on the end-state of a democratic Iraq would give us the moral high ground."

509. Mr Blair had also discussed the importance of moving forward the MEPP, including to secure the support of Arab leaders, and the possibility of a visit to the US in the autumn.

[201] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 31 July 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with President Bush, 31 July'.

510. Copies of Mr Rycroft's letter were sent to Mr Hoon's Private Secretary, and to Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Scarlett, Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir Christopher Meyer.

511. A separate, fuller record of the discussion was prepared for Sir David Manning and Mr Powell.[202] It focused on the "central issue of a casus belli" and the need for further work on the optimal route to achieving that. Sir David should work with the White House on the possibility of a Security Council resolution and how an ultimatum might be fashioned.

512. Mr Blair told President Bush that he was not yet fully abreast of all the military options.

513. Mr Rycroft commented that the UK now had "an opening to explore … precisely how the ultimatum would be framed, and how we would pursue it".

514. In preparation for a meeting with President Bush in early September, No.10 commissioned further advice for Mr Blair. But Mr Blair was adamant that knowledge of the substance of his proposals to President Bush should be limited.

515. Mr Rycroft commissioned more detailed advice from the FCO on a UN ultimatum, "both on what it would look like and on how we would achieve it", for Mr Blair's return to work in late August.[203]

516. Sir David Manning sent the records of his conversations with Dr Rice and President Bush and No.10's internal note of Mr Blair's telephone call with President Bush to the FCO on 1 August, for Mr Straw "to pick up on 19 August" before the possible meeting with Secretary Powell.[204]

517. In his minute to Mr Straw, Sir David wrote:

> "The Prime Minister is adamant that they [the papers] must be seen by no-one but you. They are not being copied anywhere else in Whitehall. Only you and he are therefore fully aware of what was said and what has now been decided on follow up."

518. In a separate letter to Mr Brenton at the British Embassy Washington on 2 August, Sir David Manning sent a copy of the records of the discussions with Dr Rice and President Bush, with an instruction that they were to be seen by Mr Brenton and Sir Christopher Meyer only. They were not to be mentioned to anyone else in Whitehall "including the FCO".[205]

519. Sir David wrote:

> "The Prime Minister is adamant that they [the records] should not be circulated to anyone except the Foreign Secretary.
> "Nevertheless I am clear that you and Christopher must have sight of them. I therefore enclose a set, together with the Note for No.10's internal consumption of the Prime Minister's call to the President on Wednesday. Please hold all very tightly."

520. In a discussion with Mr Straw on 5 August, Secretary Powell informed him that he had seen Mr Blair's Note to President Bush.[206]

521. Sir David Manning sent copies of Mr Blair's Note to President Bush and the records of his own conversations in Washington to Sir Michael Jay on 7 August.[207] Sir David informed Sir Michael that copies had already been sent on a personal basis to Mr Straw, Sir Christopher Meyer and Sir Richard Dearlove. Mr Blair was "adamant that these papers should not be circulated" although he had agreed that Mr Straw and Sir Michael should have a set. Copies should be held "very tightly". Mr Ricketts had seen the documents but did not have a copy: "Absolutely no reference should be made to them to anyone else in Whitehall."

522. Sir David informed Sir Michael Jay that Mr Blair and Mr Bush had agreed to set up small working groups "to examine the feasibility of the UN/ultimatum route" and report by the end of August. Mr Ricketts had agreed that Mr Chaplin would take that forward. Sir David wrote that he had "explained, in general terms" what was happening to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, but Sir Jeremy had "not seen the records". A meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush was being planned for early September.

523. There is no evidence that Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith or the Cabinet Secretary were informed of the Note from Mr Blair to President Bush or the subsequent discussions.

Conclusions

524. Although Mr Blair had proposed a strategy based on an ultimatum calling on Iraq to permit the return of inspectors or face the consequences to President Bush at Crawford, by mid-July 2002 little progress had been made.

525. By July, the UK Government had concluded that President Bush was impatient to move on Iraq. It was concerned that the US Administration was contemplating military action in circumstances where it would be very difficult for the UK to participate in or, conceivably, to support that action.

[206] Letter Davies to Manning, 5 August 2002, 'Iraq'.
[207] Letter Manning to Jay, 7 August 2002, 'Iraq'.

526. Mr Blair continued to offer the US support for its goal of regime change in Iraq but was concerned about the impact of unilateral US military action on the UK's strategic interests across a wide range of issues.

527. Mr Blair's meeting with Ministerial colleagues on 23 July was not seen by those involved as having taken decisions.

528. Further advice and background material was commissioned, including on the possibility of a UN ultimatum to Iraq and the legal basis for action, on the assumption that the UK would take part in any military action.

529. Mr Blair was advised that there would be "formidable obstacles" to securing a new UN resolution incorporating an ultimatum without convincing evidence of a greatly increased threat from Iraq. A great deal more work would be needed to clarify what the UK was seeking and how that objective might best be achieved.

530. Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July sought to persuade President Bush to use the UN to build a coalition for action by seeking a partnership with the US and setting out a framework for action.

531. Mr Blair told President Bush that the UN was the simplest way to encapsulate a "casus belli" in some defining way, with an ultimatum to Iraq once military forces started to build up in October. That might be backed by a UN resolution.

532. Mr Blair thought it unlikely that Saddam Hussein intended to allow inspectors to return. If he did, the JIC had advised that Iraq would obstruct the work of the inspectors. That could result in a material breach of the obligations imposed by the UN.

533. The Note reflected Mr Blair's own views. The proposals had not been discussed or agreed with his colleagues.

534. Sir David Manning told President Bush that Mr Blair agreed Saddam Hussein had to go, but it would be impossible for the UK to take part in any action against Iraq unless it went through the UN.

535. Mr Blair's initiative had the effect of setting the UK on a path leading to diplomatic activity in the UN and the possibility of participation in military action in a way that would make it very difficult for the UK subsequently to withdraw its support for the US.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the development of UK policy on Iraq and the UK's discussions with the US between the end of July and President Bush's speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September 2002, in which he challenged the UN to act to address Iraq's failure to meet the obligations imposed by the Security Council since Saddam Hussein's invasion of Iraq in August 1990.

2. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons and potential scenarios for their use, of 9 September 2002, is addressed in Section 4.2. That Section also addresses the FCO briefing on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the production of the Iraq dossier, which was published on 24 September 2002 and debated in both Houses of Parliament.

3. The development of options for a possible UK contribution to a US-led military invasion of Iraq is addressed in Section 6.1.

4. By late July 2002, the arrangements for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq had been identified as a crucial element for success in the event of regime change in Iraq, however that occurred. UK planning for that is addressed in Section 6.4.

Key findings

- In discussions with the US over the summer of 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Straw sought to persuade the US Administration to secure multilateral support before taking action on Iraq; and to do so through the UN. They proposed a strategy in which the first objective was to offer Iraq the opportunity and "last chance" to comply with its obligations to disarm.
- If Iraq did not take that opportunity and military action was required, the UK was seeking to establish conditions whereby such action would command multilateral support and be taken with the authority of the Security Council.
- Mr Blair also decided to publish an explanation of why action was needed to deal with Iraq; and to recall Parliament to debate the issue.
- The UK made a significant contribution to President Bush's decision, announced on 12 September, to take the issue of Iraq back to the UN.
- Statements made by China, France and Russia after President Bush's speech highlighted the different positions of the five Permanent Members of the Security Council, in particular about the role of the Council in deciding whether military action was justified. As a result, the negotiation of resolution 1441 was complex and difficult.

Advice for Mr Blair following his meeting of 23 July 2002

MOD advice on the military options, 26 July 2002

5. In response to the request following the meeting on 23 July for full details of the proposed military campaign and possible UK contributions, the MOD advised No.10 on 26 July:

- US military planning was still evolving and the Chiefs of Staff were not yet able to judge whether the US had a winning concept.
- Three possible options for a UK contribution were identified but no recommendation was made about which option should be selected.

The advice was sent to Mr Blair on 31 July, as one of several background papers he had commissioned at his meeting on 23 July for summer reading.

6. Mr Blair was advised that no decision was needed at that stage.

7. The three options identified by the MOD remained the broad framework for discussions until the end of 2002.

8. The record of Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July stated that the UK should work on the assumption that it would take part in any military action against Iraq and that Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), could tell the US that the UK was considering a range of options.[1]

9. Adm Boyce was asked to send Mr Blair full details of the proposed military campaign, and options for a UK contribution, by 30 July or earlier if they were available.[2]

10. The MOD advice on options for a UK contribution to US-led military operations in Iraq was provided in a letter to Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on 26 July.[3]

11. The MOD advised that US military planning was "in full swing but it was still evolving". The concept was for an attack launched by forces deployed in Kuwait and from other Gulf States and from ships in the Gulf and elsewhere. The plan was "neither fully developed nor finalised". The Chiefs of Staff were "not yet able to judge whether this is a winning concept". Greater clarity would be needed "before any UK option could be recommended".

[3] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

12. The MOD stated that it was "clear that the US plan of attack from the South" did not "need British land forces":

> "… in the time available there is very little scope for the preparation and integration of British land forces into the US order of battle; moreover the logistic space available in Kuwait, with five divisions worth of equipment and logistics support entering through only one airhead and a single port would already be confined …"

13. Adm Boyce recommended three options:

- Package 1: an "in-place support package" using forces already in the region and US use of UK bases.
- Package 2: an "enhanced support package" comprising Package 1 and additional air and maritime forces. That package could include forces that would be "of particular interest to the US because of their own deficiencies, e.g. mine clearance vessels and air-to-air refuellers for their carrier-based aircraft". While no conventional land forces could meet the timescales for the deployment of maritime and air forces: "Special Forces could be deployed very rapidly to match US timescales and priorities. This is likely to be very attractive to US planners, and their contribution to success would be significant."
- Package 3: a "discrete UK package" based on deployment of an armoured division which the MOD envisaged would be used in northern Iraq, in addition to the forces in Packages 1 and 2. The MOD stated that a force that was "credible" would be required: "Even to create uncertainty in the mind of Saddam", and the contribution of a division "would probably require command and control at Corps level. The UK might consider providing an armoured division either as part of a US-led Corps or as part of a larger coalition force possibly led by the UK using the framework of the NATO Allied Rapid Reaction Corps [ARRC]."

14. The MOD highlighted problems with:

- the concept of a "Running Start";
- the fragility of the logistic chains; and
- vulnerability to chemical or biological weapons.

15. The MOD stated that "thinking about dealing with the aftermath of a successful attack remains sketchy".

16. Finally, the MOD drew attention to the funding which would be required once a decision in principle was made to participate in military activity.

17. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, attached "two large caveats" to all three options.

- First, the timescales were "best planning estimates" and made "sweeping assumptions" about basing, transit routes, and overflights. They also assumed that funding would be available to improve sustainability and implement Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs).

- Secondly, if the Armed Forces were required to provide 18,000-20,000 people for an emergency fire service in the event of a nationwide firefighters' strike (Operation FRESCO), and the US started military action in winter 2002/3, only the in-place support package and Special Forces would be available.

18. Mr Hoon had commissioned further work with a view to expediting what would need to be done once a decision in principle had been taken. UK representatives at a US Central Command (CENTCOM) planning meeting the following week would be instructed "to set our options positively but without committing us to any specific ones". The MOD would write again as soon as there was "greater clarity about the US plan, such that the Chiefs can update their assessment of it (and the risks involved) and the Defence Secretary can make recommendations about the best option to pursue".

19. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, and the Cabinet Secretary, and to Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the JIC.

20. The MOD advice and subsequent developments in its contingency planning during August are addressed in Section 6.1.

21. Mr Rycroft submitted the letter to Mr Blair on 31 July, as one of several "background papers you commissioned at the Iraq meeting last week" for "summer reading".[4]

22. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair:

> "The military are not yet ready to make a recommendation on which if any of the three options to go for. They are continuing to work with the US military. Nor can they yet judge whether the US have a winning concept. You do not need to take decisions yet."

23. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had said:

> "… he didn't want to take any decision or accept any of these options. I think in retrospect … this was because … this was the time … when we were pressing for the Americans to consider the UN route. I think he didn't want to give any signal that he was keen to think about a military alternative …"[5]

24. The other background papers sent to Mr Blair included advice from the FCO on the attitudes of allies, the history of weapons inspection, and from Mr Scarlett on the cohesion of the Iraqi regime.[6] Those are addressed later in this Section.

The attitudes of allies

26. The FCO advised that achieving an EU consensus on Iraq would be difficult.

27. Sir John Holmes advised that it would be difficult to persuade France to support military action but "not totally impossible".

28. There was a striking congruence between the conditions Mr Blair had raised in his discussions with President Bush and the conditions identified by France and other allies to help secure support – UN legitimacy; public presentation of credible evidence on WMD; consultation, including on "day after" questions; and a visible attempt to revive the MEPP.

29. Following the meeting on 23 July, Mr Straw was asked to provide advice on the positions of countries in the region and the background on UN inspections.[8]

30. The FCO provided advice on the attitudes of EU partners to military action against on 30 July.[9] It stated that the JIC would be producing an Assessment of the attitudes of regional governments.

31. In relation to EU partners, a short paper was provided based on the advice of FCO posts. The UK had deliberately tried to keep Iraq off the EU agenda because "debate would be futile and would merely expose differences". That restraint was "increasingly hard to sustain" because of speculation about military action. Achieving an EU consensus on military action would be "difficult", but a number of factors might help. These included:

- "achieving some sort of UN legitimacy, preferably … a new resolution; a real effort to get the inspectors in and public presentation of credible WMD evidence";
- "genuine consultation" by the US "before … action starts". That would "need to cover the day-after questions"; and
- "a visible effort by the US to revive the MEPP".

32. As part of the preparation of that advice, Sir John Holmes, British Ambassador to France, addressed the attitude of the new French Government led by President Jacques Chirac.

33. In a telegram about France-US relations on 24 July, Sir John advised that the French Government wanted a better dialogue with the US and that "for EU and transatlantic reasons we have a strong interest in encouraging the French down this road".[10] France was worried that the US wished to "free itself of external constraints and its readiness to consider short-term and military solutions do not add up to a coherent and sustainable approach to international problems". It particularly feared "the consequences of an attack on Iraq".

34. Subsequently on 26 July, Sir John advised that France would be "difficult to bring on board for action against Iraq" for the reasons he had set out in his telegram of 19 February (see Section 3.2).[11] But "despite opposition in the French media and public", there was:

> "… a better chance with [President] Chirac and his new team in place – particularly if certain conditions can be met (credible plan; answers to the day after questions; prospect of international support and legal cover; consultation with France in advance). Neutrality in the event of action is certainly possible. Participation unlikely but not totally impossible – the French want to have a say in what happens afterwards."

35. Sir John added that the new French Government would be "more inclined to keep their doubts private and to engage with the Americans". The UK needed to "encourage" and "to talk to the French ourselves".

36. The key elements of Sir John's analysis were:

- The new French Government had said nothing in public, in the lead up to the election and subsequently, about possible US military action against Iraq. They had "stuck rigidly to the need for Iraq to accept the unconditional return of inspectors". That was "partly driven" by their desire "to avoid public disagreement with the US" but also reflected "their belief that the UN track represents the best hope of averting a military solution, and that P5 [the five Permanent Members of the Security Council] consensus is essential to getting the inspectors back in".
- "Privately" the Quai d'Orsay (the French Foreign Ministry) accepted that the chances of avoiding military action were "more or less gone", and it was "deeply concerned about the implications of an attack on Iraq", which one senior official had described as "highly unwise".
- President Chirac had more freedom of movement after the election "should he choose to use it"; but he would have his "work seriously cut out in shifting press and public opinion in favour of military action" if that was what he wanted to do.
- France was not encouraged by the absence of progress since February.
- UN backing was "particularly important … not just because of the Quai's approach to international law, but because they also see it as critical to winning the support of enough of the Arab world. The French would be prepared to go a long way to secure UN support for a military operation, which they believe might just be obtainable if (a very big if) the Americans want it enough … [O]n past precedent, formal UN authorisation is not an absolute requirement … But what would be indispensable would be a Security Council statement (not necessarily in the form of a SCR [Security Council resolution]) that Iraq was in breach of its obligations and a warning making clear to Iraq the consequences of continued violation."

- The new Government had been "careful not to rule out the possibility of French participation in an operation with UN backing … They know that … French interests in the region will be tied to the success or failure of US action. The French will certainly not want to be excluded from what happens afterwards. This will increase the pressure on them to acquiesce in any action …"

37. Sir John's view was that France shared the UK's desire to avoid "a great European split". He advocated engagement "seriously and early … at every level, including Chirac". That:

> "… should not just be, or seem to be, as a catspaw for the Americans, when our minds are already made up and decisions taken, but as a genuine open-ended and open-minded consultation. They will respond well if they think we are serious."

38. Information on Iraq's WMD was "a particularly urgent priority". France accepted "in principle that after 11 September we cannot watch while WMD threats develop", but was "not yet convinced that Iraq presents an imminent, severe danger, and certainly not one that justifies the wider risks of a military operation".

39. Mr Rycroft sent Sir John Holmes' telegram of 26 July with the FCO advice of 30 July to Mr Blair on 31 July.[12]

UN inspections

40. The FCO response to Mr Blair's request for a background paper on UN inspections was to provide a copy of the relevant section from the draft dossier prepared for publication.

41. In response to Mr Blair's request for background on UN inspections, Mr Straw's Private Secretary advised that the "best available assessment" was in the "Cabinet Office document now awaiting a decision on publication".[13] He provided the section on the 'History of UN Inspections in Iraq' dated 20 June (see Section 4.1), which described the activities of the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Iraq before their withdrawal in December 1998, stating:

- "The history of UN weapons inspections in Iraq has been characterised by persistent Iraqi efforts to frustrate, deceive and intimidate inspectors."
- Despite that, UNSCOM and the IAEA had "a valuable record of achievement in discovering and destroying biological and chemical weapons stocks, missiles and the infrastructure for Iraq's nuclear weapons programme".
- By the end of 1998, "significant uncertainties about the disposition of Iraq's prohibited programmes" remained when "A series of confrontations and the systematic refusal of Iraq to co-operate, left UNSCOM unable to perform its disarmament mandate and the inspectors withdrew on 13 December 1998."
- Since December 1998, Iraq had "refused absolutely to comply with its UN disarmament and monitoring obligations and allow access to weapons inspectors".
- The UK judged that Iraq had "used the intervening 40-month period to rebuild significant aspects of its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes".
- Those actions "not only" presented "a direct challenge to the authority of the United Nations", they also breached "Iraq's commitments under two key international arms control agreements", the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention[14] and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.[15]

42. The document described the UN's inspections mandate in Iraq, recorded "some instances of Iraqi obstruction" and focused on "one of the most egregious examples on non-compliance", its denial of a biological weapons programme.

43. The document concluded with a "summary of developments" since December 1998 and the steps Iraq needed to take "if the international community was ever to have any assurance that Saddam Hussein's ambitions to develop … WMD have finally been thwarted". That summary referred to the report to the Security Council by the UNSCOM Chairman in 1999 as a "damning account of Iraqi deceit"; and to the establishment of a UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC). It described "full co-operation with UN inspectors, including unconditional, immediate and unrestricted access to any and all sites" as a "key measure" of Iraqi compliance. It ended with a statement that:

> "In the interests of regional and global security, the international community cannot allow this stand off to continue indefinitely."

44. Resolution 1284, adopted by the UN Security Council in December 1999 after considerable debate and disagreement, is addressed in Section 1.1.

[15] "which prohibits Iraq from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring nuclear weapons".

Iraqi regime cohesion

45. Mr Scarlett advised on 31 July that Iraq considered a US attack to be likely.

46. There was no intelligence of serious rifts within the regime and the perception that senior members would be targeted by the US gave them no incentive to work directly against Saddam Hussein.

47. Some key members of Saddam Hussein's regime were reported to favour allowing inspectors to return.

48. Popular uprisings would only be possible if there was a credible coalition attack "with the clear intention of finishing off the regime".

49. On 31 July, Mr Scarlett provided a note "examining the weaknesses and sources of friction within the regime", in response to a request from Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), for more work on the cohesion of the Iraqi regime.[16] As well as internal regime tensions, which had been examined in the JIC Assessment of 4 July, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion', and discussed in Mr Blair's meeting of 23 July (see Section 3.3), Mr Scarlett addressed military preparations and the attitudes of the Iraqi populace.

50. Mr Scarlett wrote that the Iraqi regime considered a US attack to be "likely"; and it saw the "greatest threat in the short term as coming from an 'Afghanistan' scenario of air strikes and Special Forces supporting an internal uprising". But Saddam Hussein was "beginning to realise that a much larger US military operation" was "now possible".

51. The UK had no "intelligence suggesting any serious rifts within the senior members of the regime". There were differences within the Iraqi regime over permitting the return of UN inspectors. Mr Tariq Aziz, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr al-Hadithi, the Foreign Minister, Mr Izzat Ibrahim al-Duri, the Vice Chairman of the Revolutionary Council, and Mr Uday Hussein, Saddam Hussein's son, were "reportedly … more in favour". Mr Scarlett judged that policy differences were "unlikely to be a serious concern" for Saddam Hussein: he totally dominated the regime and "despite any damage to his prestige from allowing the return of inspectors" there was "little risk to him personally from making sharp changes in policy". He had "done so in the past" and his deputies disagreed "at their peril". It was "likely that senior members of the regime" judged that "the US threat to topple the regime" would "include them". There was "little or no incentive for them to work directly against Saddam".

52. Conditions inside Iraq were better than they were "immediately before the start of the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme in late 1996"; but the "greatest losers under sanctions" had been the middle classes. There was "no reliable information on public opinion inside Iraq", but a belief that the Iraqi population was "cowed by Saddam's security apparatus".

[16] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 31 July 2002, 'The Iraqi Regime: Risks and Threats'.

53. The Kurds were "content with the status quo". They had "a significant degree of independence and, as the Kurds did not contribute to compensation payments from OFF revenue to Kuwait, they had done "disproportionately well from OFF". Their goal was "significant autonomy in a federal Iraq". They remained "wary of backing US military action too openly".

54. The Iraqi regime was "relatively sanguine about the risk of opposition" in the South, and deemed the "main threat" to be "from SCIRI [Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq] and its military wing, the Badr Corps". The UK lacked "reliable intelligence on the size and attitudes of particular tribes in southern Iraq".

55. Mr Scarlett concluded:

> "… until the regime's military and security forces have been significantly weakened by external attack, neither SCIRI nor these tribal insurgents can present a significant threat to regime control. Once the regime's security and military apparatus begins to crack, however, a more general uprising is quite possible, as in 1991. Only a credible coalition attack with the clear intention of finishing off the regime will overcome the local population's natural sense of caution. After all, the precedent of 1991 showed that the regime was allowed brutally to re-establish its control without significant interference from coalition forces."

56. In response to a request from Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, Mr Scarlett also sent Mr Blair "classified reading material on Iraq" produced by the US, and the following documents produced by the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS):

- 'Removing Saddam', an evaluation of options for removing Saddam produced in March 2002 (see Section 6.1);
- 'The Iraqi Defence Profile', an overview of Iraq focusing particularly on Iraq's military and security organisations, produced in 1999;
- 'Proliferation Study of Iraq', an in-depth study of each of Iraq's programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction, produced in August 2002;
- an 'aide memoire on WMD and Proliferation', including Iraq, produced in June 2002;
- 'Profile: Saddam Hussein', produced in April 2001;
- 'The Iraqi Tribes: Their Identity and Role in Internal Security', produced in June 2002;
- 'The Iraqi Ba'ath Party', produced in February 2002;
- 'The Iraqi Opposition', produced in June 2002; and
- 'Infrastructure Briefing Memorandum', produced in January 2002.[17]

[17] Minute Scarlett to Powell, 1 August 2002, 'Iraq: Classified Reading Material'.

57. It is clear from the documents on the No.10 files that Mr Blair had read them.

58. When No.10 asked for reading material for Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Scarlett provided the same documents.[18]

59. Further information from the DIS 'Proliferation Study of Iraq' and its 'aide memoire on WMD and Proliferation' can be found in Section 4.2.

JIC Assessment, 5 August 2002: 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes and Impact of Military Action'

60. On 5 August, the JIC provided further advice on the attitudes of regional states to military action against Iraq, which it described as a "key issue" facing Ministers.

61. The judgements in the Assessment reflected the conditions which had already been identified in policy papers and discussions.

62. The Assessment identified that the US must continue to convince regional governments of its determination and ability to remove Saddam Hussein quickly and offer credible plans for the aftermath.

63. At the request of the MOD, the JIC reconsidered the judgements in its Assessment of 19 April (see Section 3.3), 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes', on regional attitudes to military action and how much support or opposition they might offer.[19] It also assessed the impact of military action on the internal stability of regional states.

64. In its discussion of the draft Assessment on 31 July the JIC identified Iraq as:

> "… an immensely important issue for Ministers and the paper would therefore be read widely and with great interest. It looked specifically at the implications of military options but needed to spell out more, the huge ambiguities and doubts in the region about the timing of any US attack, as well as the likely aftermath … The success of any US action would also depend partly on whether the objective was for the West to have control over Iraq in the longer term … The overview … was rather negative but in fact governments in the region would rather like to be rid of Saddam;
> "the key issue facing Ministers now was gauging what Iraq's neighbours would say … the draft Assessment was a little too conventional on this point and did not really get beneath the surface … Iran's reactions were the most difficult to gauge but would be crucial and would merit fuller treatment in a separate paper."[20]

[20] Minutes, 31 July 2002, JIC meeting.

65. In its Key Judgements, which were very similar to those of 19 April, the JIC concluded:

- "No regional state, including Iran and Syria, would give Iraq significant practical support against a US-led attack."
- "Turkey would be willing to provide basing for a US-led attack on Iraq. Provided there were no worsening of the security situation in Palestine, Kuwait […] would provide basing or staging support […]."
- "Saudi Arabia would be very unlikely to provide basing. It might approve some over-flights, but possibly only for non-offensive operations. It would distance itself from US-led military action, […]."
- "Arab governments' support would be badly damaged if Israel used a US-led attack on Iraq […]. Their support might also be reduced if any military campaign is prolonged or causes many civilian casualties."
- "A US-led attack on Iraq would spark large-scale protests across the Arab world. Security forces would probably be able to maintain control, at least initially, […] Anti-Western sentiment in the region would not dissipate quickly and could boost popular sympathy for extremist causes, including Al Qaida."[21]

66. In the Assessment itself, the JIC stated that Iraq had "no real allies" but regional States were influenced by a long list of factors which made "winning any support [for military action] an uphill struggle". Those factors were:

- There was a "deep Arab concern" that they were "being called on to support an attack on a fellow Muslim country.
- Events in Israel/Palestine remained "a primary focus" for Arab States: "No Arab State is persuaded that Saddam should be dealt with before there is a substantial movement towards resolution of the Palestinian problem."
- For Arab States, "concerns about military action" owed "more to fears about potential internal instability than to any affection for Saddam".
- There was "uncertainty over US resolve". Regional support might "firm up when a credible plan" was "on the table" and preparations had begun: "A quick build up and a rapid and decisive victory, with low civilian casualties, would minimise popular discontent, especially if the Iraqi people welcomed Saddam's overthrow".
- "A UN Security Council resolution justifying force would make it easier for regional governments to justify publicly their acquiescence to US military action. Otherwise, regional States would want stronger evidence of Iraq's continued pursuit of WMD and that the return of weapons inspectors had been visibly pursued and exhausted."

[21] JIC Assessment, 5 August 2002, 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes and Impact of Military Action'.

- "Most regional governments would be happy to see Saddam's demise. But they would be likely to have profound misgivings about a campaign without a well-constructed plan for a new Iraq. All agree that Iraq's territorial integrity must be maintained. But there are differing regional concerns about the place of the Kurds and Shia in any new regime, the type of government and its relationship with the West. Arab States want Iraq to remain a counter-balance to Iran."
- There were "economic concerns about the effect of lost trade".

67. In addition, the Assessment included the following points:

- The "volatility in Israel/Palestine" continued to "dominate the Arab World's attention. The pro-Western Arab States may accept a military build up in the region, even in the absence of more concrete progress on Palestine. But we assess that in the run up to an Iraq campaign, Arab governments' support could be withdrawn with any worsening of the Israel/Palestine security situation."
- "As the originator of the Arab peace initiative, Crown Prince Abdullah [of Saudi Arabia]" remained "focused on Palestine". If there was "little progress there" or the US was "perceived as resistant to Saudi pressure" that would be "damaging to his domestic credibility". Anti-US sentiment remained "strong" and the JIC judged that "for the next few months at least", there was "no prospect of Saudi Arabia agreeing to provide basing for US military action … even if the prospects for the return of inspectors" remained "slim".
- Iran feared "eventually being targeted by the US" and was "seriously alarmed at the prospect of greater encirclement by the US if a pro-Western regime were installed in Baghdad". Once a US attack began, the JIC assessed that Iran "would probably boost its support for Shia groups working against Saddam, with the aim of increasing its own influence in Iraq". The JIC judged that the Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) "would be likely to work directly to undermine US influence, e.g. by manipulating Iraqi groups through propaganda and the selective provision of money and arms, although it would not undertake anything that would provoke US military retaliation".
- "In the build up to an attack … Saddam would seek to speak direct to the 'Arab street to incite unrest … Saddam may also begin a campaign of terrorism and sabotage, possibly even before an attack began. Iraq has consistently failed in previous attempts to conduct successful attacks, either through its own agents or by proxy … But there is a risk that once Saddam was convinced a regime threatening attack was inevitable he could become more willing to adopt extreme, unpredictable and unorthodox courses of action."

68. The implication of the Assessment was that the US "must continue to convince regional governments of its determination and ability to remove Saddam quickly and offer credible plans for the aftermath".

Discussions with the US, August 2002

Developments in the US, early August 2002

69. Debate about the strategy towards Iraq continued in Washington during August.

70. The MOD reported on 12 August that President Bush had authorised preparatory military activities.

71. A meeting of the US National Security Council chaired by President Bush was held on 5 August to review what Vice President Dick Cheney described as "the latest iteration of the war plan".[22]

72. In his memoir, General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief CENTCOM, described his strategic objective as regime change and his operational objectives as securing the oil fields and water infrastructure, while preventing Iraq's use of long-range missiles and WMD.[23] He wrote that he had told the meeting that, "In a month", the US would have the lead elements for a "Running Start" force in place. In response to a question from Mr Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of Defense, Gen Franks confirmed that would not take the US beyond a point of no return.

73. Mr George Tenet, Director of Central Intelligence, was reported to have replied to a question from President Bush about the Iraqi people's reaction to the overthrow of Saddam Hussein: "Most Iraqis will rejoice when Saddam is gone."[24]

74. In his book published in 2012 Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, wrote that he and President Bush had met on the evening of 5 August "to discuss the pros and cons of the Iraq crisis. Momentum within the administration was building towards military action and the President was inclined in that direction."[25] In Secretary Powell's view "not enough attention had been given either to non-military options or to the aftermath of a military conquest". He was concerned about the unpredictable consequences and had told President Bush: "if you break it, you own it".

75. Secretary Powell wrote that, after listening carefully to the presentation, President Bush had asked for recommendations and that he [Powell] had replied:

> "We should take the problem to the United Nations … Iraq is in violation of multiple UN resolutions. The UN is the aggrieved party. Let's see if there might be a diplomatic solution to the WMD issue. If not, and war becomes necessary, you will be in a better position to solicit the help of other nations to form a coalition."

76. Secretary Powell wrote that President Bush had added:

> "… if the UN certifies to our satisfaction that there are no weapons of mass destruction … that problem would be solved, but Saddam would still be in power. Is his elimination worth a war?"

77. On 12 August, the MOD reported that President Bush had authorised preparatory military activities and that the inter-agency process in Washington had been launched.[26]

78. An article published on 15 August by General Brent Scowcroft, the former National Security Advisor to President George H Bush, argued that the US should not attack Saddam Hussein; it should be pressing the United Nations Security Council to insist on an effective no-notice inspection regime for Iraq.[27]

79. Mr John Howard, the Australian Prime Minister, had also told President Bush that "a UN resolution was essential to win public support".[28]

Iraq's position

On 1 August, Dr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister wrote to Mr Kofi Annan, UN Secretary-General proposing a further round of technical talks in Baghdad between Iraqi technical experts and UNMOVIC:

> "… to review what was accomplished in disarmament issues between May 1991 until December 1998, to look into the remaining issues … included in the report of Ambassador Amorim to the Security Council on 30 March 1999, and to study and assess their importance and decide upon measures to resolve them when the inspection team returns to Iraq."[29]

Dr Sabri wrote that the aim to reach "common ground on the scientific and practical criteria that will be adopted to treat and resolve what UNMOVIC might see as pending issues".

That would be part of the process "to progress towards a comprehensive solution and concurrent implementation of all the requirements of relevant Security Council resolutions".

On 12 August, Mr Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf, the Iraqi Information Minister was reported to have rejected calls for weapons inspectors to return to Iraq on the grounds that their work had been completed.[30] Mr Sahhaf was also reported to have said that it was "a 'lie' that Iraq still had weapons of mass destruction".

Mr Straw's meeting with Secretary Powell, 20 August 2002

80. The British Embassy Washington warned that many in the US Administration were talking about "when" military action would be taken, not "if"; and that the views of Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld were likely to prevail over those of Secretary Powell.

81. Following their discussion on 26 July (see Section 3.3), Mr Straw had agreed with Secretary Powell that he should make an unpublicised visit to the USA on 20 August.

82. Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Washington, wrote to Mr Straw's Private Office on 15 August to provide "a snapshot of the public mood and what we are hearing from contacts on Iraq".[32] He wrote:

> "Despite repeated affirmations that no decisions have yet been taken, there is a general assumption that the [US] Administration is moving towards military action to remove Saddam … The private language of the … majority of those to whom we speak is 'when rather than if'. There have been a string of … leaks from the Pentagon about the feasibility and means of doing this … the President held a carefully publicised meeting with Franks at the start of this month to look at military options. Over the past few days we have begun to hear a consistent line from the Administration … on why Saddam should be removed (BW [biological weapons/ warfare], links to terrorism, threat to neighbouring states, brutal oppressor). And [John] Bolton [US Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security] told me yesterday that the US is planning to run a roadshow in the Autumn about the threat of Iraq's WMD.
> "This does not mean the matter is yet settled. The debate on military tactics has died down and is now focusing on some other very big problems. These include widely publicised fears about possible use by Saddam of his WMD and the risk of Israel being drawn in to a war … and the need to build more international support for US actions."

83. Mr Brenton advised that the US felt a:

> "… strong diplomatic and presentational need for the support, and perhaps involvement, of a few key allies – with the UK close to the top of the list. They of course recognise that allied support would be much easier to achieve if they could get Security Council endorsement for military action. They are already playing the inspections issue in the Council with a view to putting Saddam clearly in the wrong. But they claim they … have sufficient legal justification for military action in Saddam's breach of earlier UNSC [UN Security Council] resolutions. It is highly unlikely that they would go to the Council for further endorsement unless they were 100 percent sure they would get it. A number of Administration hawks … have made it clear that in their view the case for regime change would not be affected if Saddam accepted inspectors, on whatever terms."

84. Mr Brenton wrote that President Bush had "recently tried to calm the press frenzy by talking about a 'patient and deliberate' approach". American domestic and political opinion would be more important to the US Administration than the UN. So far the public debate had run "rather against the Administration" with a number of Republican heavyweights, including General Scowcroft, "lining up to question the wisdom of military action". Opinion polls showed strong support for action. Congressional hearings would resume on 16 September and Mr Brenton reported that there were indications that Administration testimony would "start to make the case for military action".

85. Mr Brenton described what to do on the "day after" as the "most vexed" issue. A senior State Department official had said that they were "increasingly thinking in terms of some form of democracy, but recognised that it would need to be propped up by a long term international, (i.e. almost certainly US) security presence". In a recent conference the Iraqi opposition had made it clear there should not be a "foreign invasion"; they wanted to be in charge.

86. Mr Brenton concluded:

"Finally, as the key operational issues come to be addressed (including whether to go ahead at all), there is the balance of power within the Administration. The arch hawks are Rumsfeld and Cheney both of whom firmly support military action and are undeterred by the possible effect on the already inflammable Middle East (indeed they believe the successful US action in Iraq would have a salutary effect on other troublesome entities in the region). The instincts of the President himself (and therefore Rice [Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor]) are likely to be closer to their side than to that of Powell, who is plausibly reported to be more cautiously [sic]. There is also the political dimension. The Administration will not want to get into a vote losing quagmire – but will also be wary of failing to meet the strong expectations they have now created. The key point about this not unfamiliar pattern … is that (eg as on the MEPP) it is normally the Rumsfeld/Cheney faction that prevails."

87. Mr Brenton's letter was seen by Mr Blair before a telephone call with Mr Straw on 19 August in preparation for the latter's meeting with Secretary Powell.[33]

[33] Manuscript comment Wechsberg, 19 August 2002, on Letter Brenton to Private Secretary [FCO], 15 August 2002, 'Iraq'.

88. The meeting of the National Security Council on 16 August decided that the US strategy should be launched at the UN; but not what that strategy should be.

89. Dr Rice wrote in her memoir that, in the National Security Council on 16 August, "There was unanimous agreement that our new strategy should be launched at the United Nations, but we did not decide the question of what the President would say."[34]

90. When Mr Straw met Secretary Powell during an unpublicised visit to the US on 20 August, he was informed that Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July had been very timely; and that President Bush was keen to hear the outcome of their talks.

91. Mr Straw informed Secretary Powell that:

- Mr Blair had been irritated to find himself in the position, where the US and UK had been "outed" before they had been able to make the case with the public for action against Iraq.
- The UK's draft dossier on Iraq did not in his view lead inexorably to the conclusion that military action was the only way to deal with Saddam Hussein.
- A better case for action could be made.

92. Mr Straw argued that the case for an international coalition was overwhelming and UN "involvement" was essential. Military action would easier for the UK if there was a UN resolution.

93. Mr Blair wanted a "hard-edged ultimatum" issued by the UN with a clear link to military action. He would stand by the US, but he was worried. The "UN was the way through"; it was "an opportunity not an obstacle".

94. If Saddam Hussein accepted inspectors on US and UK terms, the UK view was that the case for military action would be ended "for the time being".

95. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell agreed that a key question was whether they could live with a Saddam Hussein who had fulfilled the UN mandate.

96. Lord Williams of Baglan, Special Adviser to Mr Straw from 2001 to 2005, told the Inquiry that:

> "As the summer months approached I felt increasingly that the war was becoming unavoidable and the Bush Administration had made up its mind on this course of action. The only question remaining was whether the UK would join in the military assault."[35]

[34] Rice C. No Higher Honour: A Memoir of My Years in Washington. Simon & Schuster, 2011.
[35] Statement, 9 January 2011, pages 6-7.

97. Lord Williams added that he had used the summer to write a long note for Mr Straw on US military actions since the Second World War, the position taken by the UK Government on those actions, and the relevance to an invasion of Iraq, concluding with the suggestion that, "if war in Iraq was to involve the UK it would be strategic and political folly without UN authorisation".

98. The FCO was unable to find a copy of the document for Lord Williams before he gave evidence.

99. Lord Williams had advised Mr Straw that "while containment had successfully boxed in would be aggressors, it has done nothing to stem the spread of weapons of mass destruction".[36] That had been addressed through arms control treaties: it had been in the mutual interest of both the US and the Soviet Union to reach such agreements. It had been "less successful in dealing with 'rogue states' and … WMD" where there were "no mutual interests between rogue states and the US". Containment was "by definition" an "acceptance of the status quo" and it was questionable whether that was "acceptable with regard to WMD". In his view, the "experience of North Korea" had taught the Bush Administration "a bitter lesson it does not want to repeat with Iraq".

100. The lessons for Iraq to be drawn from history which Lord Williams had offered Mr Straw were:

> "With the exception of Vietnam, the United States has always fought alongside substantial Allied Forces. On most occasions since 1945 … it has done so under a UN mandate. It is not unthinkable that the US could do so … against Iraq. A UN mandate may not be so unattainable …
> "The advantage for the US of a UN mandate would be twofold. Firstly, substantial Allied support would be likely … Secondly, most importantly, a UN mandate will be essential for post war Iraq. It will simply not be possible for the US to do this alone … Experience elsewhere … has underlined the necessity of UN involvement as the mechanism indispensable for the marshalling of global, political and economic support in the context of post war [re]construction.
> "… 'regime change' per se has seldom been a declared war aim. Nevertheless, it was the declared war aim of the Allies from 1942 …
> "In more recent cases involving the UK, the defeat of Argentina in … 1982 … led to the ousting of the junta … while the defeat of Serbia in … Kosovo … led to the overthrow of Milošević within twelve months. Despicable though both regimes were, neither were as brutal and totalitarian as … Saddam Hussein who survived military defeat in 1991 only through the exercise of extreme political coercion domestically. This … made it unlikely short of Saddam's death that his regime could change without external intervention. In this regard, Iraq is different from either North Korea or Iran and its involvement in weapons of mass destruction that much more deadly."

101. A copy of the minute, which was sent to Mr Straw on 19 August, was sent to Sir David Manning on 21 August.[37]

102. When Mr Straw and Secretary Powell met on 20 August, they discussed Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July and its impact on thinking in the US.[38]

103. Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, reported that Secretary Powell had "spoken frankly". He told Mr Straw that Mr Blair's "letter [the Note of 28 July]" to President Bush had been "very timely". The "case for doing something straight away was being pressed hard". Secretary Powell was "putting the case for a longer haul", including during a private dinner with President Bush at which Dr Rice was been the only other person present.

104. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that what happened next would depend on what US "Principals" heard in their meeting 10 days later, "in particular about the status of the military plan". President Bush was keen to hear the outcome of the discussion with Mr Straw. Dossiers on the "case for action" were being prepared: "True believers would see a smoking gun no matter what. But most of the stuff Iraq was importing was dual-use. It was not clear that the situation was any more serious this year than last."

105. Mr Straw handed over a copy of the UK's draft dossier on Iraq: "Although it made clear that Saddam was a very bad man, the contents did not lead inexorably to the conclusion that the only way to deal with him was by military action." Secretary Powell agreed that "containment had worked".

106. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he had discussed the position with Mr Blair the previous day. Mr Blair was concerned and had:

"… asked him to stress that the problem was that we had been 'outed' long before we had been able to make the case with the public for action … [Mr Blair] was also signed up to the importance of the relationship with the US, and had moved mountains to ensure that the EU stayed in line with the US. Nonetheless, he had been irritated to find himself in his present position because of US hawks … The key issue … was whether the US wanted an international coalition or not. The US could go it alone; if they wanted that, they had only to tell us."

107. Mr Straw's view was that:

"… the case for an international coalition was overwhelming: first for basing and access and then for what would happen after getting rid of Saddam. But also, > especially, if things went wrong. In such circumstances the US would need the international community at the scene of the crime … A solo US effort that ended in failure would give those who saw the EU as an alternative power to the US the chance they had been waiting for.

> "If the US answer to a coalition was 'yes', then UN involvement was essential. The Prime Minister's letter [the Note of 28 July] had been a little ambiguous on who should issue the ultimatum; yesterday he [Mr Blair] had been clear that the ultimatum should issue from the UN. He wanted a hard-edged ultimatum with a clear link to military action – but recognised that achieving such a text would be difficult. If Saddam … accepted inspectors on our terms, the Prime Minister thought that would end the case for military action for the time being. But he thought Saddam unlikely to give in."

108. Mr Straw said that he had a slightly different opinion: "Saddam was a busker and survivor". Mr Straw added that: "it would be harder to make the case for military action if he [Saddam Hussein] had been disarmed – and, eventually, Saddam would go".

109. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that Mr Blair's view was that building a coalition "meant working through the UN"; and that in the Middle East it meant doing something on the Middle East Peace Process (MEPP). Mr Blair would be "willing to spend time and political capital" on the latter "including holding a peace conference". Secretary Powell responded that although he had been the principal advocate of a conference, there were not "enough elements to get it together".

110. Addressing the "public case", Mr Straw said that the UK dossier:

> "… needed a compelling last chapter. We could make a better case than the one we had made so far. Traditional Cold War-style containment did not work for WMD. Rogue states did not have as much at stake as the Soviet bloc."

111. Mr Straw said that he had told Mr Blair about Secretary Powell's "more sceptical view of Russia's likely support" but Mr Blair "was convinced that securing Russia depended on the price".

112. Mr Straw asked whether military action would work. Secretary Powell explained that US thinking had developed since the end of July; the "standing start" needed an Iraqi trigger, so the US enthusiasm for it had waned. The focus was now on the "generated case".

113. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that "if there were action tomorrow the Prime Minister would be in difficulties". It was "not just the usual suspects causing trouble"; respected retired officials were "publicly raising doubts" and the "lawyers were saying in terms that there were not sufficient grounds … to support regime change". On "military action more generally" the lawyers "had not definitively opined but had said it would be easier if there were an SCR". Mr Straw drew Secretary Powell's attention to the passage in Mr Blair's Note of 28 July that "in Britain, right now, I couldn't be sure of support from Parliament, Party, public or even some of the Cabinet". In Mr Straw's view, if Cabinet held a secret ballot, it was unlikely that Mr Blair would win.

114. On the "day after", Mr Straw said that Iraq had been "the artificial creation of the UK in 1921. The country had no experience of democracy and democracy could pull it apart."

115. Secretary Powell had said he "took it" that Mr Blair:

> "… wanted some kind of UN resolution. Some of his colleagues did not want UN involvement in any shape: it might frustrate their purpose. But he did not think the evil/moral case worked: there were lots of evil people we did not go after.
> "At the (video) meeting last week, he had made the argument that the US was isolated and had slipped badly in the Arab world … and must make the case in the international community, otherwise the US would be accused of the biggest act of unilateralism … So the US should start making the case in the President's 12 September speech [to the UN General Assembly]. The Vice President had come on board but added the line that we could not allow the UN to stop us if we did not like the way things were going. Importantly, the President had repeated that the objective of regime change was getting rid of WMD. Others in the (virtual) meeting had not, he thought, appreciated the importance of what the President was saying; but, for Powell, the logic of the President's position meant that, if WMD were dealt with, regime change would no longer be required."

116. Secretary Powell said that "the hawks had not made the terrorism case against Iraq" and Iraq had not threatened the US; "Saddam was a 'regional bastard'. So the US might find itself taking action for the benefit of regional friends who were not keen on that action."

117. Secretary Powell was "still alone in the Administration, except for the President". In response to Mr Straw's question about what the UK could do to help, Secretary Powell said that "if his strategy was OK'd by the President, the US would need to share" with the UK "what they had planned at UNGA [UN General Assembly]" and would need the UK "to back them up in the Security Council".

118. Summarising their discussion, Secretary Powell said that he and Mr Straw:

> "… were agreed that we had to do something with our public and with the international community. We had to think about the 'ultimatum sentence' and recognise that if Saddam accepted inspectors, military action would be on hold. A key question then was whether we could live with a Saddam who had fulfilled the UN mandate."

119. Secretary Powell said that:

> "… war in Iraq would define the first term. He poured scorn on the hawks' beliefs: that a quick triumph was inevitable because Iraqis were waiting to be liberated; and that victory in Iraq would help the MEPP and spread democracy in the region. What would the Syrians and Iranians make of the US action – where next?"

120. Asked where Mr Blair stood, Mr Straw replied:

> "… if he had a free choice, the PM wanted to get rid of Saddam. But the more he thought about it the more difficult it looked to the PM. He would stand by the US but he was worried. The UN was the way through. An effort now could be a dry run for later if military action were required. As the PM had said to him, the UN should be seen as an opportunity, not an obstacle."

121. The record of the discussion was to be seen only by Sir David Manning and Mr Blair.

122. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote:

> "Not for the first time, and certainly not for the last, Colin opened up to me about his intense frustration with parts of the Administration; in particular Dick Cheney and Don Rumsfeld … I left the Hamptons pleased that Colin and I were in agreement and hopeful that although it was going to take a great effort, we might be able to get the Bush Administration to go to the UN."[39]

The position at the end of August 2002

The legal view

123. During August 2002, Mr Michael Wood, FCO Legal Adviser, continued to express concerns about assumptions that, in the absence of an identified legal basis, the UK would participate if military action was taken by the US.

124. Lord Goldsmith remained concerned to address the issues.

125. Mr Wood wrote to Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under Secretary Defence and Intelligence, and other senior colleagues on 15 August expressing concern that, while he appreciated that no decision had been taken, "there appears to be an assumption that if military action were taken by the US, we would not only support but participate".[40]

126. Mr Wood wrote that while it was "ultimately for the Attorney General to advise HMG on matters of this importance", he thought it would "be helpful" to colleagues to briefly restate the legal position. He was "not, at present, aware of facts which would provide a respectable legal basis for military action, though further action by the Security Council could provide such a basis." Unless there was "a proper legal basis for military action, individual members of the Armed Forces and civilian officials … would also be potentially liable to charges of murder."

127. Mr Wood warned that: "To advocate the use of force without a proper legal basis is to advocate the commission of the crime of aggression, one of the most serious offences under international law." He also referred to the importance that: "HMG act in accordance with international law, and not only because this is required by the Ministerial Code."[41]

128. Mr Wright responded:

> "… I work on the premise that if a question of military action arises, the Attorney General's opinion will be sought, in the light of the facts of the case … I can see no other basis for current policy."[42]

129. On 20 August Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, wrote to Mr Powell reminding him that they had talked about having a further conversation in September (see Section 3.3).[43] He would be away on an official visit until 8 September and it would be helpful if they could start now to identify what timing Mr Powell had in mind.

130. Lord Goldsmith also saw Mr Wood's minute and noted that his advice on whether force was justifiable or not would be an issue.[44]

131. On 23 August, Mr McDonald wrote to Mr Wood stating that the Foreign Secretary thought that this was "very serious" and would arrange to see the Attorney General.[45]

132. Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw discussed the legal issues on 23 September (see Section 3.5).

133. There is no indication that Lord Goldsmith and Mr Blair discussed Iraq before 22 October.

JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002

134. A JIC Assessment of 21 August re-affirmed that Saddam Hussein would permit the return of inspectors if he believed that the threat of large-scale military action was imminent, but he would seek to frustrate their activities.

---

[41] The Ministerial Code 2001 included the duty to comply with the law, including international law and treaty obligations, to uphold the administration of justice and to protect the integrity of public life.

135. The JIC also concluded that in a conflict Saddam Hussein would order missile strikes and the use of CBW against coalition forces, supporting regional states and Israel.

136. The JIC had little intelligence on Iraq's CBW and little insight into how it would fight. Its conclusions reflected the Committee's own judgements.

137. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment on 21 August considering "what diplomatic options Saddam has to deter, avert or limit the scope of a US-led attack".[46] It also considered his "military options for facing a US-led attack" and how his analysis about each course of action might "change as an attack becomes increasingly imminent".

138. During the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment, it was suggested that Saddam was "likely to exploit options on weapons inspectors as a stalling tactic. An offer of unconditional access for weapons inspectors would attract international approval, and allow Saddam breathing space."[47]

139. The JIC examined Iraq's options for the short term, whether Saddam Hussein might seize the initiative, how Iraq might respond to a US military build-up, Saddam's options in "war" – including the use of missiles and WMD and "alternative scenarios and at the death".[48]

140. WMD options were considered "only briefly" as the JIC would assess those in early September.

141. The JIC's Key Judgements and the relevant supporting text are set out in the Box below.

142. The basis for the Assessment, and that the Key Judgements conveyed a much greater sense of certainty that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological weapons and would act than the detailed text of the Assessment itself supported, are addressed in Section 4.2.

JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002: 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'

Saddam Hussein's aim would be "to remain in power. He will use all options to achieve this. He remains innovative and capable of surprising us."

- Saddam's choices would "depend on his perceptions of the likelihood, credibility and imminence of … a US-led attack".

---

[46] JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002, 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'.
[47] Minutes, 21 August 2002, JIC meeting.
[48] JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002, 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'.

Saddam Hussein was "likely to pursue continued talks with the UN on the return of weapons inspectors as a means to delay a US attack. He would permit their return if he believed that the threat of large-scale military action was imminent."

- Saddam would "play for time", avoiding "giving the US a pretext to attack".
- By mid-July 2002 Saddam had "started to believe that a US-led attack was inevitable and would threaten his regime".
- An Iraqi "statement that inspectors would be allowed to return unconditionally would attract considerable international approval" and "reinforce regional concerns about the military option, even before Iraqi willingness to implement the agreement had been put to the test".
- The JIC judged that "until US military action seemed imminent" Iraq would make "incremental improvements" to its "offer on inspectors that fell short of accepting the … requirements of the UN".
- If inspectors did return, the JIC repeated its judgement of 27 February that Iraq would "embark on a renewed policy of frustration, involving denial, deception, obstruction and delay".

Saddam Hussein would "try a mix of charm, bribery and threats with his neighbours". Iraq's influence was "limited, although Saddam" was "adept at manipulating popular Arab opinion".

- Saddam would seek to deter the US "and/or potential regional allies" and use diplomacy to persuade or coerce his neighbours not to provide bases.
- Iraq was "likely to pursue every opportunity to split the … Security Council and particularly the P5".
- It would also seek to "exert economic leverage".
- Iraq could "play on regional fears" that a military attack "would have unacceptable outcomes" such as threatening Iraq's integrity, encircling Iran or emboldening the US to attack other countries.
- Iraq's ability to influence neighbouring governments was "strictly limited".
- Saddam was "likely to try to do all he can to exploit the Israel/Palestinian crisis". The JIC pointed out that, "Practical support to Palestinian rejectionists groups" was "limited"; and there was "little scope for Iraq to improve its position" as the most effective groups were "closer to Iran".
- Saddam was "adept at manipulating popular Arab opinion".

"Much as Saddam would like to seize the initiative before a US attack, his options remain limited." He was "likely to be cautious about using force early. But the closer and more credible an attack seemed, the more risks he will be willing to take, perhaps including deniable terrorist attacks, most likely in the Gulf region – though we cannot exclude a threat to the UK."

- A "concerted attempt" to bring down an aircraft in one of the No-Fly Zones was "a possibility".
- A pre-emptive attack on the Kurds or Kuwait was judged "unlikely".
- An attempt to destabilise the two main Kurdish parties "to complicate coalition planning" was "more likely".

- Saddam "would probably … order preparations for a campaign of terrorism and sabotage in the region".
- "… we know that Iraqi Special Forces and other organisations, such as the 'Saddam Fedayeen', also possess the capability to conduct sabotage or terrorist attacks."
- Palestinian groups "could be reluctant to carry out attacks which did not further their own objectives".
- It was "possible that Iraqi terrorist attacks could be conducted against other [non-military] interests or the leadership and economic (e.g. oil industry) targets of regional States".
- The JIC did not "know enough about Iraqi capabilities to discount the threat outside the region, including within the UK, though previously Iraqi attempts to mount terrorist attacks, or engage proxies to do so on their behalf, have been largely ineffective".

"Early on in any conflict, Saddam would order missile attacks on Israel, coalition forces and regional states providing the US with bases."

- "Saddam would probably order missile attacks …"
- The JIC judged that attacks on Israel would be "an attempt to attract Israeli retaliation and thus widen the war, split the coalition and arouse popular opinion in the Arab States".
- Missiles "could be armed with chemical or biological warfare (CBW) agents".
- "Saddam might be deterred at least initially by the threat of Israeli nuclear retaliation."
- Iraq had a "limited number of long range missiles … available"; the JIC assessed "12-20 650km range Al Hussein missiles".
- Iraq had produced more than 50 Al Samoud missiles with a range of 150km.
- Attacks on coalition forces in Kuwait would require Iraq to deploy short-range missiles into the "No Drive Zone".[49]
- A pre-emptive missile attack on Israel was "less likely because it would show Iraq had been lying about its retention of long range missiles".

"Saddam would order the use of CBW against coalition forces at some point, probably after a coalition attack had begun. Once Saddam was convinced that his fate was sealed, he would order the unrestrained use of CBW against coalition forces, supporting regional states and Israel."

- Although it had "little intelligence on Iraq's CBW doctrine" and knew "little about Iraq's CBW work since late 1998", the JIC judged it "likely that Saddam would order the use of CBW against coalition forces at some point, probably after coalition attacks had begun".
- Iraqi CBW use "would become increasingly likely the closer coalition forces came to Baghdad. Military targets might include troop concentrations or important fixed targets in rear areas such as ports and airfields."

[49] Resolution 949 (1994) imposed a "No Drive Zone" in Iraq south of the 32nd parallel.

- Saddam Hussein "might pursue an extreme course of action at an earlier stage" if he judged it to be "worth the risk of providing the US with overt justification to attack".
- Unorthodox options might include "the early or pre-emptive use of CBW"; "CBW terrorism: although Saddam probably lacks the capability to deploy a sophisticated device, he could cause widespread panic".
- "Should he feel his fate is sealed, Saddam's judgement might change to 'bring the temple down' on his enemies no matter what the cost …" At that stage, "Saddam would order the unrestrained use of CBW against coalition forces, supporting regional states and Israel, although he would face practical problems of command and control, the loyalty of his commanders, logistics problems and the availability of chemical and biological agents in sufficient quantities to be effective and the means to deliver them."

"Iraq would probably try to ride out air strikes while conserving its ground forces. Iraq's likely strategy for a ground war would be to make any coalition advance as slow and costly as possible, trying to force the coalition to fight in urban areas."

- The JIC had "little insight into how the Iraqi military might plan to fight any ground war … At present we have little evidence to judge whether Iraq sees urban or guerrilla warfare as feasible options. Iraqi effectiveness would be mitigated by problems of command and control, inadequate training and poor morale. We doubt that guerrilla activity would be very effective; urban warfare is more plausible …"

"There is a significant potential for Saddam to miscalculate, either by escalating a crisis at an early stage, or by making concessions too late in the day to avert an attack."

Dr Blix's interview, 25 August 2002

143. In an interview on NBC's Meet the Press programme on 25 August, Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, stated that there had been "discussion and dialogue under the auspices of the [UN] Secretary-General" since the early part of 2002, in which Iraq had "shown a greater interest in inspections"; but he could not say that they had "moved closer to an invitation to the inspectors".[50]

144. Dr Blix added that Iraq did not see inspections as an isolated issue, it should be addressed in conjunction with and concurrently with other outstanding issues.

145. Asked whether Iraq possessed biological, chemical or nuclear weapons, Dr Blix responded that there were "many open questions" but the inspectors did not have proof that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

[50] NBC, 25 August 2002, Meet the Press.

146. Dr Blix stated that, to be effective, inspectors needed "immediate, unrestricted and unconditional" access to sites; they needed information; and they needed skill. Under the previous inspections regime there were relatively few problematic inspections where access was denied. The burden of proof did not lie with the inspectors to prove that Iraq was guilty. It was "for Iraq to restore confidence in the world that they do not have weapons of mass destruction".

147. Dr Blix pointed out that "an absence of evidence is not the evidence of absence".

FCO advice, 27 August 2002

148. The FCO's further advice on the possible text of a draft resolution judged that an ultimatum calling for the re-admission of inspectors would be "difficult to secure" but was "not out of reach".

149. If the talks between Iraq and the UN about the return of inspectors petered out or "better" broke down, that could provide a "trigger" for such a resolution.

150. The objective was for a resolution which would provide legal cover for military action, in the event of a refusal to comply with an ultimatum, without the need for further action in the Security Council.

151. Mr Straw suggested that the UK dossier might be published via the UN.

152. Mr Rycroft had commissioned further advice from the FCO on what a UN ultimatum would look like, and how it would be achieved, for Mr Blair's return to work in late August (see Section 3.3).[51]

153. The FCO advised No.10 on 27 August that it had "now done further work on the possibility of a Security Council ultimatum to Iraq", and that "President Bush's speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September could be an important curtain-raiser."[52] An ultimatum would be "difficult to secure" but it was "not out of reach". It would "need a carefully managed campaign during the early autumn" and "a great deal of work in P5 capitals".

154. Considering tactics in the Security Council, the FCO advised that the UN/Iraq "talks petering out, or, better, a definite breakdown due to Iraqi intransigence" could provide a "trigger" for a resolution. If inspectors were allowed back into Iraq, "the trigger could be a report by Blix on Iraqi non-co-operation".

155. The text of a resolution would be "conditioned to some extent by the wider context". There might be "some political attractions … in tabling hard language" but, "unless there is a serious Iraqi outrage, the harder the language, the more difficult it will be to get the resolution through".

156. The FCO had produced a "more developed reworking" of the draft elements for a resolution setting out an ultimatum it had offered on 26 July. The key options identified were:

- A choice between describing Iraq's refusal to accept the return of weapons inspectors as a "material breach" of resolution 687 (1991) (the cease-fire resolution) or a "flagrant violation". The former would be clearer and send a very direct message, but "might be difficult for some Council members to accept". The latter might be "a little easier to sell" and was an "obvious fact".
- Whether to include an explicit operative paragraph setting a date for Iraq to allow UNMOVIC and the IAEA "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access … so that they may discharge their mandates", after which it would be deemed that Iraq had no intention of complying with its obligations. Such a paragraph was seen to have "political and presentational" advantages although it might "not be indispensable" if a date were to be included in an earlier operative paragraph which demanded that Iraq immediately reverse its non-co-operation with UNMOVIC and the IAEA.

157. The FCO advised that, subject to Lord Goldsmith's views, a resolution "(particularly with 'material breach' language) would still give cover for military action, and that in legal terms no further Council decisions would be required".

158. The FCO warned that, in the absence of clear language on a demand that Iraq reverse its non-co-operation within a specified time, the opponents of military action would argue that Iraq "should be given still more time to comply". It would be "important" that the draft resolution provided "legal cover for military action without further Council action". The Attorney General's advice would be needed on that point.

159. Mr Straw considered that the UK should try to persuade President Bush to state that the aim of regime change was to ensure the disarmament of Iraq. The most appropriate occasion might be the President's speech to the UN General Assembly in September, as part of a wider challenge to the UN to demonstrate that it could tackle the problem of WMD in the hands of rogue states. That could open the way for a discussion in the Security Council on an "ultimatum resolution". Mr Straw also suggested that discussion might provide "a peg for publishing via the UN the long-awaited 'Iraq Dossier'".

160. The FCO advice was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon and Lord Goldsmith, and to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York.

The US perspective, late August 2002

161. The debate on Iraq in the US continued throughout August.

162. A speech by Vice President Cheney on 26 August fuelled that debate.

163. In a press conference with Secretary Rumsfeld at Crawford on 21 August, about security and defence issues, President Bush was asked whether the US had the capacity to "go to war with Saddam" alone; and whether, given remarks by General Franks that he was drawing up war plans to provide credible options, the American people should conclude that a decision was imminent.[53]

164. In response to the first question, Secretary Rumsfeld described the intense speculation about Iraq as "frenzy"; President Bush said that he would be consulting allies and Congress about how to secure peace. In response to the second question, President Bush said only that the US had to be prepared to use its military and other assets to "keep the peace" in the face of an unstable world and a global terrorist network that might strike anywhere; and that General Franks' job was to prepare for contingencies.

165. In an article in the New York Times on 25 August, Mr James Baker, former US Secretary of State, called for "a simple and straightforward resolution requiring that Iraq submit to intrusive inspections anytime, anywhere, with no exceptions, and authorizing all necessary means to enforce it".[54]

166. In his memoir, Vice President Cheney wrote that the White House had been talking about the idea of an "aggressive" inspection regime, advanced by Dr Rice, which was so intrusive it might result in toppling Saddam Hussein.[55] It had been discussed by the President and Mr Blair, but he (Vice President Cheney) "didn't buy it". He had therefore decided to press the issue in his speech on the threat from terrorism to a National Conference of the Veterans of Foreign Wars on 26 August.

167. In the speech, Vice President Cheney stated that Saddam Hussein had "made a science out of deceiving the international community". Vice President Cheney stated that there was no doubt that Saddam Hussein had WMD and Iraq was enhancing its capabilities. He concluded: "the risk of inaction is far greater than the risk of action". There was "no assurance whatsoever" that inspections would produce compliance with UN resolutions; on the contrary there was "a great danger that it would provide false comfort".[56]

168. In her memoir, Dr Rice wrote that President Bush asked her to call Vice President Cheney after his speech to say that the President hadn't yet made a decision. She had told the Vice President that President Bush was "concerned that your speech is being read as a decision to skip the UN and challenge Saddam unilaterally".[57]

169. Sir David Manning was contacted by Dr Rice on 28 August.[58] She stressed that, despite the statements and articles over the previous few days, the US position had not changed. President Bush was "determined to build international support for action on Iraq" and believed it was possible:

> "He was working on the 'UN route', and planned to use his UNGA speech to challenge the international community to deal with the Saddam threat. He was thinking of proposing that the UN should pass a further tough resolution demanding wide-ranging disarmament measures from Saddam. If he accepted them (which she thought unlikely) Saddam would be forced to run Iraq in a completely different way."

170. Sir David told Dr Rice that Mr Blair "too, remained in the same place", and that the UK "well understood the recent difficulties". They "pointed to the need for a core script we could all stick to". Dr Rice had agreed.

171. Sir David also said that a "clear line of action" was needed. Challenging and encouraging the international community to deal with Iraq through the UN "sounded exactly the right course". If the context was right, "action would become much easier". He added:

> "Action through the UN would do much to change the profile of the problem. If the UN route succeeded, well and good. If it did not, we would at least have tried to work with the international community. And anyone who blocked effective action in the UN would not only have to explain why, but … what they would do instead."

172. Dr Rice agreed; President Bush wanted to speak to Mr Blair the next day. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed a meeting, possibly on 11 September.

173. Sir David commented to Mr Blair that the discussion:

> "… was encouraging. The signs are that Bush is now thinking of opting for a coalition strategy that takes account of the UN (though probably on pretty tough terms). I was particularly struck by Condi's remark that Saddam would have to run Iraq in a different way if he signed up to proper disarmament measures. The fact that the Administration is now conceptualising this thought, rather than reiterating its commitment to regime change irrespective of Saddam's behaviour, is significant.
> "… My sense is that he [President Bush] will be keen to know that he still has your support; and keen to know that you approve of his plans to work through the UN. I am sure you should encourage him strongly.

> "If Bush takes this route, it will transform the way we can approach and handle the Iraq issue."

174. The record of that discussion was sent only to Mr Straw outside No.10.

175. The British Embassy Washington reported that in a further speech in San Antonio, Texas, on 29 August, Vice President Cheney had "toned down the line on the return of UN inspectors"; describing them as "not an end in themselves".[59] He had "called more clearly for Iraq to comply with UNSCRs [UN Security Council resolutions] by disarming fully", but had "underlined concerns that Saddam would nonetheless continue to plot to develop WMD".

US national security document on Iraq, 29 August 2002

On 29 August 2002, President Bush signed the national security document, 'Iraq: Goals, Objectives, Strategy'.[60]

The stated goal of the US was to free Iraq in order to:

- eliminate WMD;
- end Iraqi threats to its neighbours;
- stop the Iraqi government tyrannising its own people;
- cut Iraqi links to terrorism; and
- "Liberate the Iraqi people from tyranny and assist them in creating a society based on moderation, pluralism and democracy."[61]

The document stated that "the United States is prepared to play a sustained role in the reconstruction of post-Saddam Iraq with contribution from and participation of the international community", and that it would work closely with the Iraqi opposition to liberate and build a new Iraq.[62]

176. In his memoir, President Bush wrote that the possibility of war was "an all-consuming" news story in Washington and recalled that he had spent much of August 2002 in Crawford, reflecting on the "next decision" he faced:

> "… how to move forward on the diplomatic track. One option was to seek a UN resolution calling on Saddam to readmit weapons inspectors. The other was to issue an ultimatum demanding that he disarm – and rally a coalition to remove him if he did not comply."[63]

177. President Bush added that Vice President Cheney and Mr Rumsfeld "believed that going to the UN would trigger a long bureaucratic process that would leave Saddam even more dangerous". But Secretary Powell had told him that "a UN resolution was the only way to get any support from the rest of the world"; and that, "if we did take out Saddam the military strike would be the easy part. Then … America would 'own' Iraq."

MR BLAIR'S DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 29 AUGUST 2002

178. President Bush and Mr Blair discussed the need to make clear that Iraq was the UN's problem on 29 August. The issue had to be disarmament, not just the return of the inspectors, with a tough and unconditional resolution so that if Iraq complied it would change the way the regime operated.

179. Mr Blair's view was that conflict was "inevitable" because he did not think that Saddam Hussein would comply with the UN's demands; "but the choice was Saddam's".

180. Mr Blair and President Bush spoke on 29 August.[64]

181. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair and President Bush had discussed the implications of speculation in August and Mr Blair's view that the US and UK had been "outed before being fully ready to make the case" against Saddam Hussein.

182. Mr Blair and President Bush had also discussed the need to make clear that Iraq was the UN's problem and that the issue was total disarmament of Iraq's WMD and associated systems not just the reintroduction of inspectors. The next phase should be to go to the Security Council with a resolution which put the burden on Iraq. That would put the US and the UK on the front foot and the challenge was for the international community and the UN. Mr Blair:

> "… wanted the UN to meet that challenge, but if it could not we would have to act. So we should remake the case, put together the evidence against Saddam, and work up a UNSCR … [It] needed to be tough and unconditional so that – if Iraq complied – it would change the way the regime operated. It was right to issue not an ultimatum to the UN but a challenge to the international community."

183. Mr Blair also said that, before that, what was needed was "a line to take" so that "we were all answering the difficult questions in the same way", including timing, the nature of the challenge to the UN, and whether conflict was inevitable. He said that the UN route "if pursued carefully was an opportunity, not an obstacle".

[64] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 29 August 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with President Bush, 29 August'.

184. Mr Blair concluded:

> "… we were in the same place as the US. September should be the month to sort out the strategy. We should be clear within two weeks how the UN route should work. We were determined to deal with the WMD issue. September 11 had taught us the importance of dealing pre-emptively with these types of threats."

185. Copies of Mr Rycroft's minute were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and the Cabinet Secretary, and to Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS)), Sir Francis Richards (Director of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)), Sir Christopher Meyer (British Ambassador to the US), Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Mr Scarlett, and Mr Tom McKane (Deputy Head of OD Sec).

186. A fuller record was circulated within No.10 and to Mr Straw on a strictly personal basis.[65] It included references to the advice which had already been offered to the US and to the planned meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush in early September. It also stated that Mr Blair's view was that conflict was "inevitable": he did not think Saddam would comply with the UN demands, "but the choice was Saddam's".

187. Dr Rice told Sir David Manning that President Bush had worked carefully through the ideas in Mr Blair's Note of 28 July and concluded the best way forward was the "UN route".

188. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that the UK would share its ideas on a resolution "shortly".

189. Dr Rice and Sir David also discussed the need to launch an effective public relations campaign to coincide with the decision to go back to the UN.

190. Dr Rice and Sir David Manning spoke later that day to follow up the discussion between Mr Blair and President Bush.[66]

191. Dr Rice told Sir David Manning that President Bush had given "a great deal of thought to Iraq during his summer vacation at the Crawford ranch". He had worked carefully through the ideas in Mr Blair's Note of 28 July and had concluded the best way forward was the UN route.

192. Sir David and Dr Rice discussed how an approach to secure UN action might best be pursued and agreed that it would be useful for Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy) and Ms Karen Armstrong,[67] to talk:
"We needed to mount a really effective public relations campaign to coincide with the decision to go back to the UN." That should include addressing the nature of Saddam Hussein's Iraqi regime.

[67] The context suggests that the record should have referred to Karen Hughes, Counsellor to President Bush from 2001 to 2002.

193. The possible timetable for launching the initiative in the UN and the contents of a UN resolution were also explored.

194. The options for a UN resolution included a very short resolution along the lines of the ultimatum to Iraq in 1990 or a fuller resolution which spelt out:

- the extent to which Saddam was in violation of previous resolutions;
- the steps he must take if Iraq was to be welcomed back into the international community; and
- the need for a "real" deadline, possibly 1 November.

195. The possibility of "very invasive" measures, which would involve troops being deployed inside Iraq, e.g. to protect the inspectors or in northern Iraq to prevent attacks on the Kurds, and which would change the way Saddam Hussein could rule Iraq, were also raised.

196. Sir David told Dr Rice that a deadline "must be right if we were to avoid endless prevarication and evasion". He referred to the model which had been used "successfully" the previous year in dealing with the Taliban, and said that the UK had done some thinking on a resolution. That would be shared with Dr Rice "shortly".

197. Sir David sent Mr Straw a personal copy of his minute to Mr Blair.[68]

198. Visiting Washington for talks with officials in the US State Department and National Security Council (NSC) on 29 August, Mr Wright explained the "difficult domestic political management problems" on Iraq faced by the Government in the UK.[69] He "stressed" the importance of ensuring that there was "no daylight" between the US and UK in their public presentations and the need "in particular to focus on the WMD threat and how best to address it". That meant:

> "… we needed to use the UN track. This was the best way to pursue control of WMD. It would help to build international support. And if Iraq rejected a robust inspection regime, it would strengthen the case for other action."

199. The discussions acknowledged that much of the intelligence on Iraq's WMD was "inferential" and that the "aim" should be to present the case "in terms of [Iraqi] failure to comply with the international community's demands since 1991".

200. The discussions also covered the scale of the military operations being examined by the US and arrangements for inter-agency co-ordination in Washington. Mr Wright stressed the need for "close UK involvement in the work".

THE BRITISH EMBASSY WASHINGTON'S VIEW, 30 AUGUST 2002

201. The British Embassy Washington reported that it would be very difficult for President Bush to do nothing, but it was clear to the main players that they would have to make a convincing case before going ahead with any action.

202. Mr Brenton wrote to Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, to provide a "snapshot of the situation as it now looks here" for a meeting on Iraq to be held on 30 August by Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS).[70]

203. Mr Brenton advised:

> "The public debate … is now firmly engaged. We have seen contributions from practically every prominent Republican … With the signal exceptions of Scowcroft … and Zinni [General Anthony Zinni, former Commander in Chief CENTCOM and US Special Envoy for Middle East Peace], virtually all have endorsed the idea of military action, subject to various preliminaries (such as going through the UN) to maximise international support. Cheney's speech … has further raised expectations of an early decision leading to military action."

204. Mr Brenton described the key points under discussion as:

- a) Whether to do it at all: President Bush's public position was that he would "proceed 'cautiously and deliberately' with full consultations of Congress and allies, and that a range of options remained open".
- b) UN inspections: Mr James Baker and others had "argued that the US must go the UN route – demanding unfettered inspections (with the expectation, but not certainty, that Saddam will refuse), and the right to take action to enforce compliance, to maximise international support".
- c) Consulting Congress: The White House had "made it clear" that it saw "no legal need to get Congressional support for military action … But, they have also been briefing that there will be 'full consultation' and have not ruled out seeking formal support … if the Administration made an effective case, Congress was likely to support action."

205. Mr Brenton suggested that a number of other considerations continued to weigh heavily in the debate. Those were:

- the "day after" question;

---

[70] Letter Brenton to Chaplin, 29 August 2002, 'Iraq'.

- the impact on the oil market; and
- Saddam Hussein's possible use of WMD.

206. Mr Brenton wrote that the relevance of the MEPP had not been as prominent as might have been expected: "The hawks' argument here, which has gained some resonance, is that to postpone action until Arab/Israel improves is to postpone it for ever."

207. Mr Brenton also wrote that US public opinion was "lukewarmly supportive of action … Commentators believe that if a public case begins to be made that support will firm up."

208. Mr Brenton concluded:

> "… the hard questions are now … on the table and it is clear to the main players that they are going to have to make a convincing case before going ahead with any action. So far the absence of a political green light has hindered them in making that case … The expectations that have now been generated will make it very difficult for the President to do nothing (though this … does not mean that military action is inevitable) … Even if concrete action … is still some way off, the Republicans would far prefer an Autumn in which the press is dominated by Iraq headlines than one where the economy is the lead story."

209. Copies of the letter were sent to a number of addressees, including Sir David Manning.

Mr Blair's decision to set out a public script on Iraq

210. When Mr Blair returned to No.10 after his holiday, he set out his concerns about the public debate, and that he and President Bush had been "outed" as having decided on military action when no decisions had been taken.

211. Mr Blair stated that the "strategy" should be aimed at answering the questions of those who might support military action and, in doing so, set Iraq in a bigger context.

212. Mr Blair set out a series of steps to achieve that, including working for a new UN Security Council resolution which would effectively become an ultimatum.

213. Conflict would depend on the regime's response, but Mr Blair did not think it would be long before Saddam's true intention was clear.

214. As part of a wider note to No.10 officials on 30 August, Mr Blair set out his position on Iraq:

> "I don't need any convincing as to where we are on this. The state of opinion, the difficulties. The problems are compounded by the fact that [President] Bush and myself have been 'outed' as having decided for war, come what may, when actually no decisions have been taken. So the arguments are all being made against any action, when we are not yet in a position to make the arguments for it. But all this can be turned round in time, with the right strategy.

"My basic view on Iraq is clear and hard. The policy of containment … has worked up to a point, but can't continue indefinitely; there is no doubt that, uncontained, Iraq is a threat; they are trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability; they are developing ballistic missile capability for biological and chemical weapons of a longer range; they retain substantial WMD stocks; the regime is deeply repugnant, corrupt and repressive … The region, the world, the Iraqi people would be better off without Saddam.

"Opinion against action divides into two: those always opposed and the usual anti-American lobby; and those, a large number, who ask entirely sensible questions, but who might support action if the questions were answered."[71]

215. Mr Blair stated: "The basic strategy should be to answer these questions and, in doing so, set … Iraq in a bigger context." The steps to do that were:

- Raising the whole issue of WMD up the agenda with a separate strategy for each country developing WMD, "in particular [those] acquiring nuclear technology in secret".
- Setting out the "unique danger posed by Iraq … an inherently violent and unstable regime, with a track record of external aggression, unmitigated by any moderate elements unlike other WMD countries".
- Exposing and highlighting the "limits of the policy of containment".
- A strategy which "should be to work towards a new UN resolution on weapons inspections, effectively becoming an ultimatum to Saddam. But it must be unconditional access and change to the way the regime operates viz its military capability. It will be clear that refusal or non-compliance will not be a subject of negotiation but action. We need to begin the diplomatic work on this now. Russia and my visit to Putin [Russian President, Mr Vladimir Putin] in October will be crucial. Obviously – and this is the legitimate US worry – if we go the UN route, Saddam may yield, agree and then play about. We need to be very clear we won't let that happen. But it does mean that conflict is dependent on the regime's response, not inevitable, though I don't think it will be long before his true intention is clear."
- Building EU and Arab support for action "if the UN route does not deliver, ie we say … we will try the UN route; but doing nothing is not an option".
- Working "strenuously to put together a new MEPP process. This is the key to Arab opinion …"

[71] Note Blair [to No.10 officials], 30 August 2002, [extract 'Iraq'].

- Working on a post-Saddam Iraqi regime: "The conundrum is: if it is merely changing Saddam for another military dictator, that hardly elicits support from the rest of Iraq, especially the Shia majority, and is in any event, not in line with our principles; on the other hand, if the whole nature of the regime changes, the Sunni minority in power may be less tempted to fold and acquiesce in Saddam's removal. But there are ways through this."
- "[N]aturally" getting "detailed working on the military plan necessary to succeed".
- Developing a "proper media strategy" including "real information about life under Saddam … The moral case for regime change should be made."
- Addressing the "whole issue of the Muslim world and its relations with the West".

216. Mr Blair wanted detailed work internally within the UK and with the US and suggested:

> "A small team under JS [Jack Straw] and DM [David Manning] should meet and coordinate.
> "If I go to the US in the next couple of weeks, the idea should be to agree the strategy with GWB [President Bush], set it out at the TUC [Trades Union Congress] or shortly after and then get going."

217. In his memoir Mr Blair wrote that he had returned from holiday with his "lines clear". He:

> "… was going to be very tough: we had to deal with Saddam; it was right to do it; we had to send an unvarnished and plain message on WMD to the world.[72]

218. Mr Blair was concerned about the effect that press speculation, that he was seeking to influence the US, would have on President Bush.

219. Initially Mr Blair's instinct was to reiterate the lines he had been using earlier in the year, but he quickly decided to use a press conference on 3 September to set out a public script on Iraq.

220. Mr Campbell wrote to Mr Blair on 30 August to warn him that during the flight to a Sustainable Development Summit in Johannesburg the following day, the press would be pushing him on Iraq.[73] Mr Campbell recommended a statement with the top line message that inaction was not an option, but which did not move the line on the question of a decision on military action.

[72] Blair T. A Journey. Hutchinson, 2010.
[73] Minute Campbell to Prime Minister, 30 August 2002, 'Iraq/Press'.

221. Mr Campbell recorded in his diary that Mr Blair wanted to "avoid" talking about Iraq; and that he would use the line that doing nothing was not an option "if pushed", but he did not want to go beyond that.[74]

222. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair was:

> "Privately … growing more and more dismissive of the critics … Equally he was clear that the Yanks had not handled it well over the holiday … [T]hey had allowed the game to run ahead of them, and Cheney and Rumsfeld had just made it worse.
> "… He was a lot steelier than when he went on holiday. Clear that getting Saddam was the right thing to do …
>
> "David had got Condi to get GWB to offer TB next Saturday for a meeting in the margins of his so-called war counsel [sic]. I think they realised that they had messed up the presentation and had to get into a better position, so it seemed clear Bush did want TB there, but heaven knows what Cheney and Rumsfeld would make of it. TB was up for it."

223. In response to an article in the Financial Times of 31 August, reporting that Mr Blair had pressed President Bush for a UN mandate, Mr Campbell wrote in his diary on 1 September:

> "Iraq was becoming a frenzy again. TB was becoming more and more belligerent, saying he knew it was the right thing to do … Obviously the best thing to do would be to avoid war, get the inspectors in and all the weapons out … the US had to be managed into a better position … but we won't be able to do it if we come out against the US the whole time … Equally it was clear that public opinion had moved against us during August."[75]

224. On 2 September Mr Campbell wrote to Sir David Manning, and to Mr Powell and Mr Rycroft, saying that Mr Blair was "alarmed, and angry, at the way parts of our thinking and planning on Iraq are seeping into the media in an unco-ordinated and undisciplined way".[76] "Above all", Mr Blair was "concerned what the US Administration must think". Mr Blair intended to use his press conference the following day (in his Sedgefield constituency) to make the general position clear and "give people a public script". But more must be done "to ensure people do not depart from that, publicly or privately, or give a running commentary in every aspect of his thinking".

225. Mr Campbell wrote that he left it to Sir David and Mr Powell to decide what to do with his minute, "but it might be worth sending round as a general message that if people are talking loosely … they are being foolish and risk being highly counter-productive".

226. Mr Powell commented on the manuscript: "David [Manning] will speak to the FCO."[77]

227. Sir David Manning discussed the issue with Dr Rice on both 1 and 2 September.[78]

228. There is no record of the first conversation although it was a difficult one which Sir David had reported orally to Mr Blair. He described the second conversation as "much easier" and "a great deal better than it might have been". Sir David said he had told Dr Rice that Mr Blair was "angry at the way the British press were covering the Iraq issue", and that "We were doing all we could to ensure that there were no leaks at our end." Mr Blair "had given fierce instructions". Sir David suggested that the coverage "was probably the result of speculation, lucky hits, and people driving their own agenda".

229. Sir David told Dr Rice that Mr Blair would deal with Iraq at his press conference the following day. Mr Blair would "dismiss all suggestions" that he was "trying to pressure the US". There was "no lack of consultation" and Mr Blair would not "want to pressure the President" because he "believed very strongly that Saddam must be dealt with". "However difficult, we had to face up to the problem and to the wider problem of WMD." Mr Blair and President Bush "might get together at some point if you both felt that was useful". Sir David reported that Dr Rice was content with that line.

230. Sir David Manning also reported that he and Dr Rice had discussed elements of a "very tough" resolution, including a stipulation that the UN inspectors would have force protection and the possibility of "external back up" provided by larger military forces in a number of neighbouring countries who would invade Iraq if Saddam tried to obstruct the work of UNMOVIC. The assumption was that the resolution should be tabled two or three days after President Bush's speech on 12 September. Sir David added: "With luck, we may be over the worst. Your [Mr Blair's] press conference tomorrow will obviously be important."

231. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair was "livid" about the stories in the media and had spoken to Mr Powell and Sir David Manning "saying that he wanted message round the system that all this loose talk had to stop. And he wanted the Americans to know how angry he was".[79]

232. Mr Campbell also wrote that Dr Rice had "said it looked like we were trying to push them, and they didn't like it". He added that Dr Rice liked the argument that the UN was the route to deal with Iraq, not the route to avoid it.

233. The FCO was concerned that Mr Blair should strike a balance between acknowledging the deficiencies of the policy of containment without saying it had failed.

234. In preparation for his press conference in Sedgefield, Mr Blair asked for:

- a summary of "what we knew of the existing Iraqi WMD programme, in particular ballistic missile technology (and its significance); and nuclear weapons technology (including why the civil nuclear programmes they are funding is almost certainly misused for weapons programmes)";
- a "list of Saddam Hussein's atrocities";
- a "rough summary" of statistics showing the brutality of political repression;
- information on the "sanctions programme and containment" telling him "why the policy of containment cannot continue indefinitely"; and
- information on the extent to which Saddam Hussein's refusal to use the Oil-for-Food programme properly was harming the Iraqi people.[80]

235. Advice was provided by Mr Straw's Private Office on 2 September.[81]

236. Mr Charles Gray, Head of the FCO Middle East Department, explained to Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director:

> "The difficulty lies in providing No.10 with language which will adequately bring out the deficiencies in our present policy and show that there is a need to move beyond it, without suggesting that it has been a total failure (which, for the reasons set out in the first version … we do not believe to be the case). And I also see a presentational risk that if we do not in the end go hard over on a policy of military action, and [we] have already said categorically that containment has failed, we shall be setting ourselves up for accusations that we are then left with no policy at all.
> "So rather than tie us down to pursuing an alternative to containment immediately, the language … seeks to demonstrate why the present state of affairs cannot continue indefinitely, thus leaving us with some flexibility on the timing of any other action."[82]

237. As well as the briefing note, Mr Rycroft was sent a "blind copy" of Mr Gray's minute. He advised Mr Blair: "We need to bring out the deficiencies of the containment policy without saying that it has been a total failure."[83]

[83] Manuscript comment Rycroft to Prime Minister, 3 September 2002, on FCO briefing note '4. The sanctions programme and containment'.

238. The brief for Mr Blair stated:

- The purpose of the policy had been to ensure that Iraq was disarmed through two main elements:
  - disarmament through inspections regimes; and
  - reducing Iraq's ability to finance its WMD programmes by controlling its revenues from oil.
- The policy had had "some success in dismantling Saddam's arsenal when the inspectors were able to operate", and it had "slowed his efforts to rebuild WMD". The arms embargo had "been effective in preventing Saddam acquiring new complete weapons systems".
- But, "in the absence of inspectors" Iraq could "work on its WMD programmes unimpeded" and Iraq was "in violation of a string of Security Council resolutions intended to curb" those programmes.
- Controls on revenues were "eroding", giving Saddam Hussein "access to large sums over which the international community had no control" and "much" of that was "certainly going into his high-priority WMD programmes".
- Although the sanctions regime had been "targeted on goods of most concern", no sanctions regime would "be completely effective in stopping a ruthless and well-funded regime getting its hands on some of the goods and technology needed for a WMD programme".

239. The FCO response to Mr Blair's questions on Iraq's WMD, which stated unequivocally that Iraq had and was hiding WMD and that it had continued its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes after the departure of the UN weapons inspectors in 1998, is addressed in Section 4.2

The Sedgefield press conference, 3 September 2002

240. In his press conference, Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein was, "without any question, still trying to develop" a "chemical, biological, potentially nuclear capability"; and that to allow him to do so would be "irresponsible".

241. As he had discussed with President Bush, Mr Blair framed Iraq's position as a challenge to the UN which the UN should address.

242. Mr Blair's remarks indicated that time and patience were running out and that there were difficulties with the existing policy of containment.

243. Mr Blair announced that the "dossier" setting out the evidence of Iraq's attempts to develop its "chemical, biological and potentially nuclear capability" would be published in the "next few weeks".

244. Mr Campbell wrote that the hardest question to answer was "Why now?"

245. In his press conference, which lasted 90 minutes, Mr Blair stated:

> "… I think I would be right in saying that many of your questions will be on Iraq … I sense that some of you believe we have taken all the key decisions but just haven't got round to telling you. That isn't the case … We, at every level of government, have been and remain in close dialogue with the United States of America about this issue and where we are in absolute agreement is that Iraq poses a real and unique threat to the security of the region and the rest of the world. But Saddam Hussein is continuing in his efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction … We have to face up to it, we have to deal with it and will. The issue is then what is the best way of proceeding."[84]

246. Mr Blair emphasised the importance of the "broadest possible basis of support"; and that "because this is a problem for the world … the United Nations has to be the route to deal with this problem, not a way of people avoiding dealing with this problem".

247. Explaining his support for the US, Mr Blair stated: "For a long period of time we have done our best to contain that threat, though it is increasingly difficult to do without inspectors being back in there with a proper regime on the ground which alters the way the [Iraqi] regime behaves." The US was "right" to raise the issue and supporting them was not a question of "misplaced allegiance or blind loyalty"; it was the "right thing to do".

248. Mr Blair stated that the policy of containment of Saddam Hussein had "worked up to a point, but there is a point beyond which it hasn't worked because the inspectors aren't in, we don't really know what is happening now".

249. Mr Blair said: "I think I am right in saying that a couple of years ago we reckoned there was somewhere in the region of $1.8 billion of illicit money coming to the Iraqi regime, we think it is probably $3 billion … now".

250. Mr Blair also drew attention to Saddam Hussein's human rights record and the "thousands … of refugees flooding across Europe".

251. Referring to US concerns about Saddam Hussein's past record of obstructing inspections and the need to follow through on any resolution, Mr Blair concluded:

> "… is there a threat we can simply turn a blind eye to, despite the breach of all the UN resolutions. If the answer to that is no, we have to deal with it, then let's work out the right way of dealing with it. But it is perfectly understandable if in the light of previous experience, that people will look with a very sceptical eye as to whether any regime could be successful, but that is not to dismiss it."

252. A number of questioners pointed out that public opinion had moved against the idea of a strike against Iraq "partly because people feel that there hasn't been much evidence … We have heard again and again that there is a dossier of evidence about Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Why haven't we got it up to now and when are we going to see it?" Would there be any evidence in the dossier which had been "gleaned in the last four years" that Saddam Hussein had "moved any further down the route to nuclear weapons"? There were suggestions that there was "not going to be much new"; and that, in terms of public opinion, there was "a mountain to climb".

253. In response to the first question Mr Blair replied:

> "Originally I had the intention that we wouldn't get round to publishing the dossier until we'd actually taken the key decisions. I think it is probably a better idea to bring that forward."

254. Mr Blair added: "A lot of the work has already been done, there needs to be some more work and some more checking" but "the best thing to do is to publish … within the next few weeks". When that happened:

> "… people will see that there is no doubt at all the United Nations resolutions that Saddam is in breach of are there for a purpose. He [Saddam Hussein] is without any question, still trying to develop that chemical, biological, potentially nuclear capability and to allow him to do so without any let or hindrance, just to say, we [sic] can carry on and do it, I think would be irresponsible."

255. In terms of the specifics of Iraq's WMD Mr Blair made a number of comments including:

- "… there is no doubt that at some point the Iraqi regime were trying to develop nuclear weapons … I believe that there is evidence that they will acquire nuclear weapons capability if they possibly can."
- "Now we will provide what support we can for that, although of course the absence of inspectors … means there is necessarily a limit. But I don't think we should be in any doubt about the nature of this regime, they will acquire whatever weapons they possibly can."
- "Certainly they were trying to obtain a nuclear weapons capability. I think there is some evidence that they continued to do so."
- "… we don't really know what is happening now, there are huge amounts of stocks of chemical, biological weapons unaccounted for."
- "… we can't be quite sure what is happening on the nuclear side … but on the biological and chemical weapons side there is no doubt about it, there are vast stocks of these weapons unaccounted for by the previous weapons inspectors."
- "And in addition there is real concern that there is ballistic missile technology."

256. Mr Blair suggested that the reason Iraq might not be letting inspections take place was because "the last time the inspectors were in there, they uncovered so much that the Iraqi regime was deeply embarrassed". He also argued that people would "think about it differently once they see the evidence".

257. Mr Campbell wrote in his diary on 3 September:

> "The hardest [question] was: 'Why now? What was it that we knew now that we didn't before that made us believe we had to do it now?' It was not going to be at all easy to sell the policy in the next few months …"[85]

258. Mr Campbell added that announcing the publication of the dossier would "raise expectations massively. Today was about beginning to turn the tide of public opinion and it was going to be very tough indeed."

259. Mr Campbell told the Inquiry that the decision to bring forward the publication of the dossier was a way of trying to calm the situation.[86] Mr Blair had wanted "to set out for the public, in as accessible a way as possible, the reasons why he had become more concerned" about Iraq.

260. The decision to publish the dossier and its preparation is addressed in Section 4.2. That also sets out the separate work in the FCO on a script addressing why the problem of Iraq's WMD, unlike other countries' programmes including Iran's, could not be resolved through containment and diplomacy.

JIC Assessment, 3 September 2002

261. A JIC Assessment reviewing Iraq's manipulation of its trade relations to obtain diplomatic support was issued on 3 September.

262. An Assessment analysing the way in which Iraq used trade to exert influence, 'Iraqi Trade: A Tool of Influence', was issued at the request of the JIC on 3 September.[87]

263. The Key Judgements were:

- Iraq is successful in manipulating its trade relations to obtain diplomatic support from other countries. It will continue to do so. The weakness of the economies of many of Iraq's neighbours means they will continue to be susceptible to Iraqi pressure through the offer of lucrative trading opportunities.
- Trade dependency has muted, but not eliminated, criticism of Iraq by its neighbours – whose policies are influenced but not determined by economic factors.

[86] Public hearing, 12 January 2010, pages 66-67.
[87] JIC Assessment, 3 September 2002, 'Iraqi Trade: A Tool of Influence'.

- Iraq's ability to use cuts in oil supply or threats of such disruption to cause spikes to world energy market prices is likely to be temporary and limited by the extent to which Saudi oil production can make good any loss of Iraqi supplies.
- Iraq uses economic levers to put political pressure on Russia for support, whilst Russia sees its political importance to Iraq as a means to extract economic benefit. But Russia remains the dominant partner. At present Russia is able to exercise the greater leverage.
- Russian policy on Iraq will continue to be heavily influenced by its determination to protect its economic interests. The status quo provides the benefit of a privileged commercial position; but contracts which can only be realised after sanctions are lifted may not be honoured by a post-Saddam regime.
- Iraq's use of trade to further its political influence will be limited in future by its inability to significantly expand oil production."

264. Other points from the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 3 September 2002: 'Iraqi Trade: A Tool of Influence'

The Assessment concluded that Iraq deliberately used "trade with other countries as one way to achieve strategic goals".

"It had worked hard to build up trading relations, legal and otherwise, both with its neighbours and influential countries on the UNSC. The granting of future oil/gas extraction rights for the post-sanctions period is also a source of leverage."

In addition, "Iraq manipulates OFF contracts to obtain political support from other countries." The lifting of the ceiling on OFF contracts in 1999 had "increased Iraq's power of patronage significantly". Iraq had "used the OFF programme to divert funds illegally to Baghdad using a number of schemes, the most important being a 10 percent commission on all OFF contracts for goods coming into Iraq and the imposition of a surcharge on exports of its oil".

Iraq was also pursuing illegal trade which was described as "typically" involving "the transfer of Iraqi oil at below world prices". That gave the Iraqi regime "direct access to foreign currency" and allowed it "to procure goods prohibited by the UN from countries, firms and individuals willing to break sanctions".

The JIC assessed that Jordan and Syria were the two countries most dependent on Iraqi trade. For Jordan OFF and other trade with Iraq accounted for "about 20 percent" of its GDP; Syrian trade with Iraq was estimated to account for about 10 percent of its GDP, not including earnings of firms and individuals who dealt with Baghdad directly or some revenues derived from the use of Syria as a major transit route for illegal Iraqi trade. Illegal oil exports from Iraq through a pipeline with Syria began in 2000. Syria was the largest purchaser of illegal Iraqi oil which it used for domestic consumption allowing it to increase exports of its own oil.

With Egypt, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates, trade was "relatively significant".

The JIC set out the scale of Russia's economic interests in Iraq, including expected earnings of US$2.5bn in 2002 from OFF contracts; contracts to develop Iraq's oil and gas fields; and a five year trade agreement. Moscow was also concerned about recovering outstanding debt of at least US$8bn.

Iraq used its economic relationship with Russia to put pressure on Russia, including to engage in illegal trade which the Russian Government had resisted. Iraqi bribes paid to Russian officials, businessmen and politicians and oil industry lobbyists had helped "nurture an influential pro-Iraqi lobby in Russia".

Russian policy was "to hope for the best and plan for the worst – so far as its economic interests are concerned". Russia might see the "deals it has signed with Iraq as a card to negotiate some form of compensation should the current regime be toppled by the US". It was "hoping to maintain and possibly expand its current trading position".

Russia wanted "to maintain good relations with the US while at the same time opposing an attack on Iraq". It was "becoming increasingly irritated by Iraq's refusal to allow the return of UN inspectors", which Russia saw as "the best way to avoid a conflict in Iraq and get sanctions lifted".

US agreement to pursue "the UN route"

265. In a meeting on 3 September, Mr Blair told Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, that:

> "… Iraq needed to know that they had to let the inspectors back in and that, if they refused, the US would not ignore it. The President was under pressure not to go down the UN route and it was important that the international community stood ready to support him if he did."[88]

266. Mr Annan stated that he had been informed earlier in the year that it was thought Iraq would comply and let the inspectors back in.

267. Dr Rice telephoned Sir David Manning after the Sedgefield press conference to discuss the arrangements for Mr Blair and President Bush to meet at Camp David and develop US thinking on what the resolution should contain.[89]

268. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that he had "assumed we would need to table a very tough initial draft that included negotiating fat that could be conceded". Some of the elements Dr Rice had outlined would be a "tough sell" and "we might have … to modify these demands to get the resolution through". Sir David said he would get back to Dr Rice "when our experts had thought the issues through".

[89] Minute Manning to PM, 3 September 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

269. Outside No.10, only Mr Straw was sent a personal copy of the record of that discussion.

270. Mr Blair and President Bush agreed they should meet on 7 September to discuss Iraq.

271. President Bush announced the meeting on 4 September, as part of wider remarks about his determination to disarm Iraq about which he would also be consulting Congress and other world leaders.

272. President Bush and Mr Blair spoke later on 3 September.[90] They discussed Mr Blair's press conference and Mr Blair said he was confident that a very strong case could be made against Saddam Hussein. Mr Blair's visit to the US would be announced the next day. It would follow a US National Security Council meeting on 7 September and precede President Bush's speech to the UN on 12 September. They would also discuss the handling of the UK dossier.

273. On 4 September, in a press opportunity after a meeting with Congressional leaders in the White House to discuss foreign policy, President Bush stated that they had spent most of their time "talking about a serious threat to the United States" and to the world from Saddam Hussein. Doing nothing about that threat was "not an option".[91] He "looked forward to an open dialogue with Congress and the American people". The Administration would "participate fully in any hearings" that Congress wished to hold, and "at the appropriate time" he would seek Congressional approval to "deal with the threat".

274. President Bush also announced that he had asked Mr Blair to "come to Camp David on Saturday" where they would discuss "mutual concerns about how to make the world more secure and safe". President Bush said that he would also speak to other world leaders, including those of China, France and Russia, before giving his speech at the UN General Assembly in New York the following week.

275. Asked whether putting weapons inspectors back into Iraq was a viable option, President Bush replied that the issue was disarmament not inspectors. That was the primary issue and he would be discussing "ways to make sure that that is the case". In response to a subsequent question, President Bush added that he would be calling "on the world to recognize that he [Saddam]" was "stiffing the world"; and discussing "ways to make sure that he fulfils his obligations".

276. Asked whether the time had come to issue an ultimatum "similar to that you issued to the Taliban [in October 2001 – see Section 3.1]", President Bush replied:

> "I am going to state clearly to the United Nations what I think … he [Saddam] has not fulfilled any of the obligations that he made to the world. And I believe it is important for the world to deal with this man. And I believe it is really important for the world to have an open dialogue about how to deal with this threat.
> "We are in a new era; the first battle of the first war of the 21st century took place in Afghanistan. The United States is under threat … this is a debate the American people must hear, must understand. And the world must understand … that its credibility is at stake."

277. CNN published a letter that President Bush had given to Mr Dennis Hastert, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, during the meeting on 4 September.[92] The letter stated:

> "America and the civilised world face a critical decision in the months ahead. The decision is how to disarm an outlaw regime that continues to possess and develop weapons of mass destruction … Since September 11, we have been reminded that we are vulnerable to evil people. And this vulnerability increases dramatically when evil people have access to weapons of mass destruction.
> "I know Members of Congress agree that Saddam Hussein's regime is still a threat to peace … America intends to lead the way to make certain that Saddam Hussein's regime is not able to threaten anyone in the world with the world's most devastating weapons.
> "I am in the process of deciding how to proceed. This is an important decision that must be made with great thought and care. Therefore I welcome and encourage discussion and debate. Congress will hold hearings on Iraq this month, and I have asked members of my Administration to participate fully.
> "Doing nothing in the face of a grave threat to the world is not an option. At an appropriate time and after consultation with the leadership, I will seek Congressional support for US action to do whatever is necessary to deal with the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's regime. Congress can play an important role in building a national consensus for action."

278. After a reference to meeting Mr Blair and consulting other world leaders, the letter continued:

> "My Administration remains committed to the regime change policy enshrined in the Iraq Liberation Act. The world must address how the Iraqi people can be liberated …

Sir Jeremy Greenstock's advice, 3 September 2002

279. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised on 3 September that none of the options identified by the FCO for a draft resolution, giving Iraq an ultimatum which might then provide legal cover for military action, would be achievable. Even a challenge to Iraq to accept UN inspections would face "considerable opposition".

280. Sir Jeremy advised that the UK should focus on the elimination of WMD rather than regime change, and choose its tactics "with circumspection".

281. Mr Blair had concluded on 30 August that the UK strategy should be a new UN resolution which would become an ultimatum to Iraq.[93]

282. Sir Michael Jay had asked Sir Jeremy Greenstock for his "considered advice on the handling of a Security Council resolution on Iraq in preparation for the Prime Minister's visit to Camp David at the end of the week".[94]

283. Sir Jeremy replied to Sir Michael on 3 September addressing a draft FCO letter to No.10 provided by Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of UN Department in the FCO, "on the options for Security Council Resolutions aimed at putting pressure on Iraq and preparing the ground for enforcement action".

284. Sir Jeremy described the FCO draft as raising three possibilities:

- a resolution "specifically authorising the use of force";
- a "softer text determining a flagrant violation or material breach by Iraq of previous SCRs"; and
- a "middle-ground resolution aimed at provoking an indisputable example of Iraqi intransigence by calling for the re-admission of Inspectors with a tight timetable and more intrusive powers".

285. Sir Jeremy advised that none of those options was yet achievable and only the second was "likely to stand much chance of success after further work". He wrote:

> "We start from a point where the other 13 members of the Council will, at best, have serious doubts about the use of force. Despite the attractions from our and the US perspective of a clear and 'in your face' justification for the use of force, there is bound to be strong resistance to this in the Council. Nor would we have the necessary nine votes for an explicit pre-authorisation in the event of continued Iraqi non-compliance. There will even be considerable opposition to throwing down the gauntlet to Saddam by challenging him to accept UN Inspectors under tight conditions. […] introducing force protection for UNMOVIC is simply unachievable, even if UNMOVIC decided to ask for it. The majority of the Council members will see any attempt to ratchet up the requirements on Iraq as a device to create a pretext for military action rather than an effort to get verification and inspection under way. And trying and failing to obtain this sort of language would be worse than not trying at all because it would create a presumption of further Council discussion and decision before military action could start."

286. Sir Jeremy advised that the UK should be:

"… focusing our presentation as much as possible on WMD elimination rather than regime change, and … choosing our Security Council tactics with circumspection. On the assumption that our first requirement is to secure legal cover for military intervention if the UN route fails, our priority should be to reactivate SCRs 678 and 687. The Attorney General will need to give a view on the best way to make this legally watertight, but to be politically effective we would need to secure more than the minimum nine votes necessary."

287. In that context, Sir Jeremy wrote:

"… Ideally this [the text of an ultimatum resolution] should include 'material breach' (rather than 'flagrant violation') language and be under Chapter VII of the Charter. But, subject to the Attorney General's views, I do not think that either Chapter VII or an explicit ultimatum is necessary to secure the legal cover we need. […] … in my view [we] should be very cautious about spelling out an ultimatum, which could easily be used by others to argue for a further Council decision before military action is launched. Our real objective in a resolution should be to achieve the minimum language necessary to justify the use of force (without a further SCR) without striving for extra bells and feathers …

"We may need to discuss later how to handle Iraqi reaction to a successful resolution. Actually getting inspectors back in would change the picture."

288. Sir Jeremy asked Sir Michael Jay to arrange for the distribution of the letter in London. Sir Michael sent it to Sir David Manning and Mr Straw's Private Secretary "only at this stage. For discussion at my meeting at 12 noon."[95]

289. The letter was marked to Mr Blair by Mr Jonathan Powell who wrote: "I do not agree with this."[96]

290. Mr Blair replied "? why not? – sounds right to me except possibly it may be possible to get a middle ground resolution."[97]

FCO advice, 4 September 2002

291. The FCO advice to No.10 on 4 September reflected Sir Jeremy's view that it would be difficult to negotiate any resolution which implicitly or explicitly authorised the use of force without clear Iraqi provocation to provide a "trigger".

292. Mr Straw's Private Office sent advice to No.10 on 4 September on a "wider range of possible UNSCRs and a game-plan for securing them", drawing attention to Sir Jeremy Greenstock's advice in his letter of 3 September.[98] The letter to Sir David Manning made clear that Mr Straw had not seen the advice.

293. The FCO set out three possible approaches, but made no recommendation. First, a resolution specifically authorising the use of force: affirming that Iraq had "ignored" the UN's demands and failed to comply with relevant resolutions; confirming that Iraq's behaviour, and in particular its possession of WMD, "constituted a threat to international peace and security"; and authorising a "coalition of the willing to take 'all necessary measures' to ensure Iraq's compliance with the UN's demands".

294. Such a resolution would "provide an unambiguous justification for the use of force" but it would be "immensely difficult to negotiate" and the prospects would improve "only if there were a recent and flagrant example of Iraqi non-compliance".

295. Secondly, a resolution determining that Iraq's failure to co-operate with "UNMOVIC etc" constituted a flagrant violation or material breach of previous resolutions: with a call for Iraq to co-operate fully and possibly a timed ultimatum "though the warning to Iraq would be implicit without it".

296. In the FCO view "such a resolution could be argued to provide sufficient grounds for the use of force … on the [grounds] that it revived the authorisation … in [resolution] 687". That would "undoubtedly be easier for some UNSC members to support than one which explicitly authorised all necessary measures, although many would recognise it for what it is, and take up positions accordingly".

297. Thirdly, a resolution calling for re-admission of inspectors with a tight timetable, more intrusive powers etc: re-affirming Security Council support for UNMOVIC and the IAEA and for disarming Iraq of WMD with a tight timetable for compliance and UNMOVIC reports and a commitment to take action if UNMOVIC reported Iraq was not co-operating.

---

[97] Manuscript comment Blair, [undated], on Letter Greenstock to Jay, 3 September 2002, 'Iraq: Handling in the Security Council'.
[98] Letter Sedwill to Manning, 4 September 2002, 'Iraq' attaching Paper 'Iraq: UNSC Action'.

298. The FCO advised that, in that eventuality: "It would obviously be preferable to have automatic authorisation of the use of force" but the Russians and others were "likely to insist on a separate decision". Armed support for UNMOVIC "would be very difficult, if not impossible to negotiate".

299. Such a resolution would "demonstrate … willingness to give Iraq one last chance. But there would be pressure … to keep to the timetable outlined in … [resolution] 1284, which gave UNMOVIC months rather than weeks to report full Iraqi compliance." There would also have to be tight criteria for determining whether Iraq was co-operating "to ensure that there would be no return to Iraq playing cat and mouse with UNMOVIC".

300. The FCO judged that the UK would be "unlikely to secure language which provided a clear justification for future military action without further recourse to the UNSC". It also pointed out that, "A failed attempt in this area would be damaging. For this reason, it would be wise not to go for the hardest option."

301. Reviewing the "Prospects and Pitfalls" of action, the FCO concluded that it would be "difficult to negotiate any resolution which implicitly or explicitly authorises the use of force without clear Iraqi provocation". It identified the Russian attitude as "pivotal"; and argued that China and other Security Council members would be nervous of setting a precedent for "what may look like regime change".

302. The FCO also addressed the need for a trigger to support a resolution authorising the use of force:

> "The best trigger would be if Iraq were to be caught out taking action in clear violation of UN Security Council demands. For example, if we were to get new evidence of an egregious attempt by Iraq to rebuild its WMD programme … But it is unlikely that Iraq will play into our hands in this way.
> "The next best trigger would be to adopt a resolution demanding more intrusive inspections … in the expectation that Iraq would not co-operate … Iraq's refusal to let UNMOVIC in or a subsequent report from UNMOVIC of Iraq's failure to co-operate would suffice.
> "Even without a specific trigger … we might argue that the UNSC's patience had run out … the first anniversary of … resolution [1382] (on 29 November [2002]) might be a useful opportunity to focus minds."

303. Addressing an ultimatum the FCO advised:

> "Various types of ultimatum are possible. They would need to be linked to demands for the re-admission of inspectors, and Iraqi co-operation … Some options would include deadlines … but … in the absence of … Iraqi move[s] to comply within a reasonable (but short) period, they would be in clear violation."

304. The FCO concluded: "The first step must be to share our thinking with the US" before addressing the approach to the other Permanent Members of the Security Council.

Attack in Iraq, 5 September

In response to hostile acts against coalition aircraft monitoring the southern No-Fly Zone, US aircraft, with UK aircraft in support, attacked an Iraqi air defence facility in western Iraq on 5 September 2002, prompting press speculation that it was a prelude to Special Forces attacks and more general military action.[99]

Mr Amre Moussa, Secretary General of the Arab League, told a press conference in Cairo on 5 September that any attack would cause major instability in the region.[100] The press also reported Arab foreign ministers had said that military action to topple Saddam Hussein would "open the gates of hell" and that no Arab countries would join it.

FCO advice, 6 September 2002

305. Mr Straw had a different perspective. He advised that the UK should seek a resolution that simply determined that Iraq's failure to co-operate constituted a breach of its obligations and set an ultimatum for the readmission of inspectors on the basis of the provisions in resolution 1284.

306. Mr Straw's Private Secretary wrote to No.10 on 6 September offering "elements" for a possible resolution "authorising a tougher mandate and enforcement powers for UNMOVIC inspectors in Iraq" and a draft resolution taking a different approach.[101]

307. The first draft resolution made clear that "Iraq would be obliged to grant inspectors immediate access to any sites, records or officials as requested"; with the "provision of armed guards to accompany UNMOVIC" and authorisation for "a standby force to assist UNMOVIC obtain Iraqi compliance if necessary". The FCO stated that it had assumed military operations would be run by a "coalition of the willing led by the US", not run by the UN.

308. The FCO advised that there would be "strong pressure" from members of the Security Council "to be consulted again before military action" commenced. The draft aimed "high" by "including various formulae designed to obtain prior UNSC authority or at least approval in principle, for any enforcement action".

309. The timetable in the draft resolution was "modelled on the arrangements envisaged in UNSCR 1284 [1999]", which the FCO commented were "likely to be considered too leisurely in the current political climate". Any timetable would "in practice" need to take account of Dr Blix's views.

310. The draft included only an implicit reference to regime change; "the market will bear no more".

311. The draft "also included requirements for Iraq to allow access to humanitarian agencies, and for other UN members to co-operate by providing assistance to the coalition and information on sanctions busting".

312. The second draft resolution reflected Mr Straw's amendments to a draft letter to No.10 offered by officials on 5 September on which Mr Straw had commented that the options were "too 'in your face' at present".[102]

313. While Mr Straw recognised "the importance of engaging the White House in discussion of the UN options and of a tough draft UNSCR designed to get the inspectors back in", he believed the UK should:

> "… point out to the White House that this is unlikely to be achievable and that the concerns of Sir Jeremy Greenstock … must be taken seriously. You will recall that the Foreign Secretary mentioned this to the Prime Minister at yesterday's meeting."[103]

314. The letter of 6 September summarised Sir Jeremy's concerns and stated that the FCO was, "therefore", providing:

> "… a draft resolution which takes a different approach, namely determining that Iraq's failure to co-operate constitutes a material breach/gross violation of its obligations and sets an ultimatum for it to admit inspectors on the basis of the current arrangements."

315. The text of the draft resolution was that sent to No.10 by the FCO on 27 August. The FCO stated:

> "Even this approach will be difficult. We start from a point where the other 13 members of the Council will, at best, have serious doubts about the use of force."

316. The FCO concluded with a caution on timing:

> "… no action in the Security Council should be taken until the Russians have been squared. A text as complex as the revised UNMOVIC mandate would require even more pre-cooking if it were to succeed … It would be far less difficult to see that [a Russian resolution] off than to salvage a negotiation of our own that was launched before the ground had been properly prepared."

317. The FCO letter was sent to Sir David Manning; no copy addresses were identified.

318. Mr Straw's meeting with Mr Blair on 5 September is addressed later in this Section.

319. In a conversation with Secretary Powell on 6 September, Mr Straw said that the UK would not want a kitchen sink resolution which was un-negotiable.[104] He was sure that Mr Blair would reinforce that message with President Bush.

Sir David Manning's discussion with Dr Rice, 6 September 2002

320. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that there would be better prospects of securing a tough mandate if there was a promise to return to the Security Council before force was used.

321. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed the contents and handling of a draft resolution in the morning of 6 September.[105]

322. Sir David reported to Mr Blair that he had told Dr Rice:

- A resolution "must not be a transparent device to justify military action. The focus must be the return of Inspectors, and WMD. If Bush tabled something that could not easily be dismissed as a transparent pretext for immediate military action, there would be a wide measure of international support."
- That "did not mean that the resolution should not be tough on Saddam. But it would need nice judgement and strong nerves to get the balance right … Once the international community had signed up, we would be in a different place."
- "The Russians would be key. It was essential that Bush did a great deal of heavy lifting with Putin before the resolution was tabled …"
- "France would also be crucial to the argument." Mr Blair was talking to President Chirac that day.
- Sir David "thought that the French would rally to a well constructed, even if tough resolution, as long as they believed the US purpose in tabling it was genuine".
- A resolution was needed that "made it clear this was Saddam's last chance. But the question of an ultimatum would need great care. It might be worth adopting a strategy in two parts: an initial resolution that stipulated strict conditions with the implication that further action would follow swiftly if these were not met. Thereafter, if Saddam failed to fulfil the conditions, we would need a second resolution containing an ultimatum. Countries that had supported the first resolution would find it correspondingly harder to oppose the second … these were preliminary thoughts … you [Mr Blair] would want to explore the pros and cons of an ultimatum, and its timing, when you saw [President] Bush tomorrow."

323. Dr Rice did not contest Sir David's points. She told him that "the current plan" was for President Bush's speech at the UN General Assembly to "focus on a clear demand that Iraq must forswear WMD" which would be "accompanied by an announcement" that the US would be tabling a draft resolution.

324. Sir David reported that current White House thinking on the core points for the resolution included:

- full "WMD disarmament under the international supervision of the Security Council";
- "unrestricted access for UNMOVIC";
- freedom for "witnesses" to the WMD programme to leave Iraq and be interviewed by UNMOVIC "at any time";
- empowerment for inspectors "to destroy any prohibited material they discovered";
- "force protection" for UNMOVIC; and
- Iraqi agreement to no-fly and no-drive zones as required.

The resolution would conclude by stating that If Saddam Hussein "adhered to these conditions", that would "lead to a new international relationship with Iraq".

325. Sir David told Dr Rice that force protection would be "a hard sell". He had repeated the need to have some "negotiating fat" in the draft resolution for Russia, which might include force protection. Dr Rice agreed.

326. Sir David reported that he had "welcomed the fact" that the US was "not now thinking of stipulating regime change". Dr Rice said that as they "had discussed before, Saddam's acceptance of the other conditions would lead to a radically different regime anyway". Sir David also said that there was a need to find a way to emphasise that the "quarrel was with Saddam not the Iraqi people"; the "aim should be to isolate him, as we had tried to isolate Milošević". Dr Rice agreed.

327. Sir David reported to Mr Blair:

> "As I said to you afterwards, further encouragement. White House thinking about the contents of the resolution has come back to earth and looks broadly plausible. And their view of handling (a serious text, working with Putin etc) seems close to ours. We must hope all this survives Cheney and the NSC meeting starting this evening. But on this evidence, the Administration may now be ready to make a genuine effort to go the UN route. Cementing this at Camp David will be a real prize."[106]

328. Sir David did not send a report of his conversation to the FCO.

Sir Christopher Meyer's advice, 5 and 6 September 2002

329. Sir Christopher Meyer reported on 5 September that the US Administration was considering starting to make the case against Saddam Hussein and using President Bush's speech at the UN to indict him then circulating a draft resolution the following week. Congressional resolutions authorising military action would be sought in early October.[107] The US was also thinking about a further resolution at a date to be determined which would issue a 48 hour ultimatum before military action was taken.

330. Sir Christopher added that there was still "feverish debate" about the content of the first resolution, and in particular how to secure intrusive inspections and whether to expand the case against Saddam beyond WMD. A study to be released on 6 September would suggest an "Inspection Implementation Force" to be established in neighbouring countries. Other options were also being considered although any option was likely to be unacceptable to Iraq. One official had commented: "but that was the whole point".

331. Sir Christopher reported that he had made clear that the UK view was that the focus had to remain squarely on the WMD threat, but there were two US concerns about that approach. First, the intelligence was not substantial enough to make a convincing case that regime change was necessary and justified. American public opinion would need something more; issues like human rights would play well. Secondly, there was concern that, if the focus was only on WMD and Saddam Hussein folded at the eleventh hour, it would undercut the imperative for regime change.

332. Sir Christopher Meyer advised on 6 September that Iraq was likely to dominate Washington politics during the autumn and there was a raft of unanswered questions about a "UN route".

333. Sir Christopher warned that it was "far from a given" that the "UN process should be exhausted, as we would understand it, before military action is contemplated".

334. Sir Christopher suggested that it would be more important to get it right than to do it fast.

335. Before the meeting at Camp David, Sir Christopher Meyer advised that, while President Bush's decision to go the UN route and to consult widely at home and abroad was welcome it left "a raft of questions unanswered".[108]

[108] Telegram 1140 Washington to FCO London, 6 September 2002, 'PM's visit to Camp David: Iraq'.

336. Sir Christopher wrote:

- A military invasion and its aftermath would be "less perilous [for the US] in company".
- President Bush's initiative (his letter to Congress of 4 September) had "got him off the defensive" but he had "been damaged by policy drift". Iraq was "likely to dominate Washington politics until Congress adjourns for the mid-term elections [in November 2002]".
- President Bush had repeated comments that the policy was Saddam Hussein's removal: "Disarmament as [an] objective has been left to lesser spokesmen to articulate."
- President Bush's instincts "were with the hawks": Saddam Hussein had "had his chance" and would "never change". The elimination of WMD was "inseparable from the elimination of Saddam himself; inspections were a discredited instrument" and the UN "was not to be trusted".
- Mr Blair was "likely to find a President with his heart and his head in conflict". While President Bush's instincts might be to "move to attack Iraq as soon as possible", now that he had "launched a process of consultation" he would "to a degree be bound by its dynamic". The challenge for the President would be how to convince Congress and the American people "why it is urgent" to get rid of Saddam Hussein.
- Hearings in Congress could last "through October". There was a "huge debate inside the Administration about the content of Security Council resolution(s) … even the principle of a SCR remains under challenge. I am reluctant to predict how this will be decided … before the Prime Minister arrives."
- The "dilemma … over inspections" was "sharp": "Many Americans want to set the bar so high that if Saddam were to accept, it would be tantamount to regime change. I assume this is unsaleable in New York. For others … the nightmare is that Saddam will say 'yes' and avoid attack. I think it is far from a given … that the UN process should be exhausted, as we would understand it, before military action is contemplated. The UK could find itself in an awkward two-way stretch between the Americans and others in the Security Council."
- The White House hoped that the UN approach would "square the circle of divisions within the Administration". Sir Christopher commented that it might succeed but it was "as likely to reopen the fault line between [Secretary] Powell and the neo cons and by extension between the two sides of the Atlantic".
- "The pre-conditions for military action are a focal point for Camp David. So are post-war Iraq and the MEPP … The President seems to have bought the neo con notion that with the overthrow of Saddam all will be sweetness and light in Iraq, with automatic benefits in the rest of the Middle East (which partly explains his inactivity on the latter). In reality, it will probably make pacifying Afghanistan look like child's play. The US is probably in greater need of coalition and UN support for what is likely to be a very protracted post-war phase, than for the attack itself. Afghanistan has shown that the US is not good at consolidating politically what it has achieved militarily."

337. Sir Christopher commented:

> "The Prime Minister will have very clear ideas how he wants to play Iraq with Bush. I would say only that it is more important to get it right than to do it fast. Bush's head will agree. But his heart is impatient, he fears being labelled a wimp like his father, and his emotions will be stirred by the approach of the 9/11 anniversary."

There would be "pressure on Bush to elide the distinction" between the two positions.

President Chirac's views, 6 September 2002

338. President Chirac told Mr Blair that the inspectors had to return to Iraq immediately with full powers and they needed to be intelligent. He would support that sort of resolution.

339. The disadvantages of any US unilateralism would be much greater than the advantages.

340. In a conversation with President Chirac on 6 September, Mr Blair asked for his views in advance of the meeting with President Bush.[109]

341. President Chirac's response was reported to have included:

- Iraq had been "systematically and stupidly provoked … into getting rid of the inspectors".
- He did not think Saddam Hussein "posed an immediate nuclear danger, but clearly there were CBW risks".
- The inspectors had to return immediately, but in the current climate Mr Annan should give Iraq an assurance that the inspectors were real, not spies.
- The inspectors must have full powers, but they needed to be intelligent.

342. President Chirac told Mr Blair that France would support that sort of UN resolution, but if that did not work, there were two scenarios:

- The US could attack Iraq on its own initiative but, "France would not participate, 'since we are against unilateralism and do not want to feed anti-Americanism', and because it would be dangerous militarily especially if Saddam had CBW. It would not lead to the right result. There was a risk of Iraq blowing up in the absence of a serious opposition figure to take power. The disadvantages would be much greater than the advantages. He thought most Arab and EU countries would agree."

- The Security Council "could be seized. If so, France would be ready to discuss options. France would not be alone in the possible use of its veto."

343. Mr Blair told President Chirac that Saddam Hussein had to know that this was "his last chance to co-operate". It would be:

> "… difficult to persuade the US to go down the UN path unless they believed that a refusal by Saddam to abide by his UN obligations would result in some damage to him."

344. Mr Blair added:

> "… he understood the French position: support for a UNSCR on inspectors, no support for unilateral military action, and ready to discuss UN S[ecurity] C[ouncil] measures if Saddam refused to comply."

345. President Chirac:

> "… confirmed that that was his position. He recognised that maximum pressure was needed on Saddam. Saddam understood that he faced a choice: inspectors or attack. The problem was that he always took stupid decisions. So Chirac was worried. And worse was Cheney's talk about military action whatever Saddam did on inspections, which gave Saddam no incentive to accept inspectors. There were imbeciles on both sides."

346. Mr Blair "agreed to report back" to President Chirac after his discussions with President Bush.

Mr Blair's meeting with Dr Blix, 6 September 2002

347. Mr Blair met Dr Blix on 6 September.[110]

348. The record stated that Dr Blix told Mr Blair that Iraq was continuing to insist on a comprehensive settlement, which would link lifting the No-Fly Zones, removing the US threat, lifting sanctions, and establishing a zone free of WMD. The threat of military action had led to Iraq weakening its position but Iraq would not move to allow inspectors back in if it thought that military action was inevitable or if they thought there was no prospect of military action. They would move if they saw a link between a move and avoiding military action. Mr Blair said that he thought there was such a link but the inspection regime would have to be tough.

[110] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 6 September 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting with Hans Blix, 6 September'.

349. Dr Blix told Mr Blair that Iraq had two "fears":

- Once the inspectors returned there would be a "a stand-off over access which the US would take as a casus belli".
- UNMOVIC would "inherit UNSCOM's leakiness" which had "discredited UNSCOM".

350. Dr Blix said that he would support stronger inspections if that was the decision of the Security Council. Whatever arrangements were agreed, there would be limits to what inspections could achieve: "For instance, it would be very hard to catch Iraq's mobile installations."

351. Dr Blix also warned Mr Blair that UNMOVIC would need a couple of months to prepare and 60 days thereafter for "rebaselining": "So it would be nearly four months before the inspectors could present the issues to the UNSC."

President Putin's views, 6 September 2002

352. President Putin told Mr Blair that he had great doubts about the legality of the use of military force, but was prepared to work to achieve a UN resolution which would convince Iraq to readmit inspectors on terms which had been agreed in the Security Council.

353. In a telephone conversation on 6 September, President Putin stated that he thought the Russian and UK approaches were "very close":

- both were insisting on the return of inspectors in accordance with UN Security Council resolutions;
- Foreign Ministers were working with a close understanding; and
- we had to be 100 percent sure that Iraq would never produce WMD programmes.[111]

354. Russia had been working with Iraq to ensure that it understood, and the Iraqi Foreign Minister had confirmed in Moscow earlier that week that it was prepared to discuss the return of "UN structures". Iraq was prepared to allow UN inspectors and monitoring to return; we had to ensure that was on our conditions. Russia had to be involved in developing those conditions or it would not be possible for it to subscribe to those "rules". Mr Blair agreed.

355. President Putin told Mr Blair that Russia had great doubts about the legality of the use of military force and all diplomatic means were far from exhausted: "But he thought it would be possible for the UN Security Council to come up with a common position, to ensure that the Iraqis saw that they had no way out."

---

[111] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 6 September 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Telephone Call with President Putin, 6 September'.

356. Mr Blair also agreed to a request from President Putin for the information on Iraq's WMD that had formed the basis of his remarks in his press conference on 3 September.

Saudi Arabia

357. Mr Straw and Mr Blair met the Saudi Foreign Minister, Prince Saud, on 6 September. They discussed concerns about the effect on the solidarity of the international coalition on terrorism of the current speculation about military action in Iraq and the dangers in the region if military action was taken without some improvement in the situation of the Palestinian people. Mr Blair agreed to reflect those points in his discussions with the US.[112]

Military options

358. No decision on a possible UK military contribution to US operations was taken before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, but the MOD advised that there could be a need for tough decisions within two weeks of that.

359. Mr Blair told Mr Hoon and Mr Straw that he did not expect President Bush imminently to commit the US to military action.

360. Mr Hoon had cautioned Mr Blair about the potential impact of a firefighters' strike in the MOD advice of 26 July.[113] The strike and its impact on the development of military options in the MOD are addressed in Section 6.1.

361. The MOD's assessment of the implications of having to earmark military personnel to provide cover during a firefighters' strike (Op FRESCO) was set out in a letter to Sir David Manning on 28 August.[114] The letter said that Mr Hoon considered:

> "… it particularly important that we guard against any false assumptions that the US might make about the UK's potential contribution to any military action … Explaining the impact … to the US would … serve to focus US planners on the real practical limitations we would face, were political decisions taken to join the US in military action."

362. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell that he was not clear where the firefighters' issue stood; and that he would be "grateful for a word ab[ou]t what to say to Washington and when".[115]

363. Mr Blair's view, as reported on 3 September by Sir David Manning, was for "nothing to be said to the US about Op FRESCO for the moment".[116] Mr Blair hoped it would be possible to discuss the issues with Mr Hoon the following week before he flew to Washington.

364. Mr Blair discussed the UK's military contribution with Mr Hoon on 5 September.[117] Mr Straw was also present.

365. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, recorded that Mr Blair, Mr Hoon and Mr Straw had discussed the packages, and that Mr Hoon had highlighted the benefits of Package 2. "No decisions were taken" and Mr Blair "did not expect President Bush to commit himself imminently to a military campaign".

366. Mr Watkins also recorded that Mr Hoon had met Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to discuss the options and alert him to the likely costs of Package 2.

367. There was no No.10 record of the meeting.

368. Mr Watkins wrote to No.10 on 6 September, providing an update on US military planning and "the factors informing decisions on any UK military contribution".[118] He cautioned that the MOD's assessment was "necessarily provisional", partly because the US plan was still evolving, and partly because there had not yet been "detailed joint planning with the US".

369. The MOD had identified three options ranging from minimum to maximum effort, including a further revision of the impact of Op FRESCO which meant that:

> "Were we to throw in everything we are likely to have, the UK could potentially generate up to a divisional headquarters, an armoured brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and a logistic brigade."

370. The MOD was also "examining whether a Royal Marine Commando could form part of Package 2 [the air and maritime forces packages]".

371. A land Task Force would "offer significant capability to a US-led northern force, although it would not be fully suitable for involvement in decisive war-fighting operations".

372. The MOD advice concluded that should "US military preparations continue at their current pace, we will face some early tough decisions within two weeks of your return from Camp David".

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, Camp David, 7 September 2002

375. President Bush held a meeting of his National Security Council at Camp David before his meeting with Mr Blair, during which he decided to seek a UN resolution on Iraq.

376. President Bush described the meeting of the US National Security Council at Camp David on 7 September as having been convened "to finalize my decision on the resolution"; the US was "trying to find a way to remove the threat in Iraq without war".[119]

377. The meeting was given a briefing by Gen Franks, who introduced his concept of five simultaneous "operational fronts" in Iraq.[120]

378. Describing the positions of senior members of the Administration, President Bush wrote that:

- Vice President Cheney had recommended giving Saddam: "30-60 days to come clean, and then disarm him by force if he refused to comply … We can't delay for another year … An inspection regime does not solve our problem."
- Secretary Powell had pushed for a UN resolution: "If we take the case to the UN, we can get allies to join. If not, it will be hard to act unilaterally. We won't have the international support we need to execute the military plan."[121]

379. President Bush also wrote:

> "After listening to the options one last time, I made a decision: We would seek a resolution. 'There's ambiguity in the international community's view of Saddam … and we need to clear it up. Either he will come clean about his weapons or there will be war'."

380. President Bush had told his team that he would deliver the message in his speech to the UN the following week:

> "Either the words of the Security Council would be enforced, or the UN would exist only as a useless international body …"

381. Dr Rice gave a similar account of the 7 September NSC meeting in her memoir:

> "The President had decided on a policy of coercive diplomacy. He would give Saddam a chance to respond to the united pressure of the international community, and the build-up of US forces would make that pressure credible … One way or another, the threat of Saddam Hussein's Iraq would finally be removed."[122]

382. Dr Rice further commented:

> "Some people have claimed that the President never asked his advisors whether he should go to war against Saddam. At that September meeting … the National Security Council, after a full and frank discussion, decided on a course of action. Everyone in that room heard the President say: 'Either he will come clean about his weapons, or there will be war.' There was no disagreement. The way ahead could not have been clearer."

383. Vice President Cheney wrote that he had been a strong advocate of using President Bush's speech to "challenge the UN", to "confront" it and "hold the organization accountable", making clear that "if the Security Council was unwilling to impose consequences for violations, the UN would become irrelevant".[123] He did not want "yet one more meaningless resolution".

384. Vice President Cheney also wrote that President Bush:

> "… had not yet made a decision, but in neither this meeting nor any other I attended did any of the President's advisors argue against using military force to remove Saddam … Nor did anyone argue that leaving Saddam in power, with all the risks and costs associated with that course, was a viable option."

385. Mr Tenet wrote in his memoir:

> "Colin Powell was firmly on the side of going the extra mile with the UN. The Vice President argued just as forcefully that doing so would only get us mired in a bureaucratic tangle with nothing to show for it other than time lost off a ticking clock … To me, the President still appeared less inclined to go to war than many of his senior aides."[124]

386. In a press conference before the discussions at Camp David, Mr Blair stated that Iraq had to be dealt with; the purpose of the meeting with President Bush was to work out the strategy.

387. President Bush and Mr Blair gave a press conference before their meeting.

388. President Bush stated that it was "an important meeting" with "an important ally" and friend. They were going to talk about how to keep the peace, the threats faced by the world and how to promote freedom.[125]

389. Mr Blair was more direct, stating that they would be "discussing the issues that are preoccupying us", and adding:

> "The point I would emphasise … is the threat from Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction, chemical, biological, potentially nuclear weapons capability, that threat is real. We only need to look at the report from the International Atomic Agency [sic] this morning[126] showing what has been going on at the former nuclear site to realise that. And the policy of inaction is not a policy we can responsibly subscribe to. So the purpose of our discussion today is to work out the right strategy for dealing with this, because deal with it we must."

390. In response to a question, Mr Blair emphasised concern about Iraq's attempts to develop nuclear weapons and the importance of the IAEA report he had mentioned, which showed there was "a real issue that has to be tackled here". He stated that, on the way to Camp David, he had been reading "the catalogue of attempts by Iraq to conceal its weapons of mass destruction, not to tell the truth … over a period of years".

391. President Bush said that Saddam Hussein had:

> "… said he was going to get rid of weapons of mass destruction. And for 11 long years, he has not fulfilled his promise. And we are going to talk about what to do about it. We owe it to future generations to deal with this problem, and that's what these discussions are all about."

392. Asked about international support, Mr Blair replied that:

> "… people were asking perfectly reasonable questions … but the one thing no one can deny is that Saddam Hussein is in breach of the United Nations resolutions on weapons of mass destruction … that that poses a threat not just to the region, because there is no way, if those weapons are used, that the threat would simply stay in the region.
> "People understand that. Now we have got to make sure that we work out a way forward that, of course, mobilises the maximum support, but does so on the basis of removing a threat that the United Nations itself has determined is a threat to the whole world."

[126] The IAEA issued a press release (IAEA Press Release 2002/11) on 6 September 2002 stating: "With reference to an article published today in the New York Times, the International Atomic Energy Agency would like to state that it has no new information on Iraq's nuclear weapons programme since 1998 when its inspectors left Iraq. Only through a resumption of inspection … can the Agency draw any conclusion with regard to Iraq's compliance with its obligations … relating to its nuclear activities."

393. The British journalists covering the Camp David meeting focused on the WMD dossier.

394. The Sunday Express anticipated a "Dossier of Doom".[127]

395. An editorial in the News of the World claimed that the dossier would be "as devastating as it is vital".[128] It would show that "evil Saddam has enough chemical and biological stocks to attack the entire planet, and the missile technology to deliver them", and would confirm that he is on the brink of nuclear capability. The editorial concluded "We believe Mr Blair CAN convince us a military attack on Iraq is right. We have faith in our Prime Minister."

396. In their meeting Mr Blair told President Bush that he was in no doubt about the need to deal with Saddam Hussein.

397. Mr Blair argued that the strategy should be to seek two resolutions; one making tough initial demands including intrusive inspections, with the option of a second if and when Saddam Hussein did not comply.

398. The UN would then need to accept the responsibility for enforcing its decisions, or action would be taken without it.

399. Mr Blair also set out the need to build a case to persuade the international community of the threat posed by Iraq, including the potential for fusion of WMD and terrorism.

400. It was "critically important" that the US and UK made it clear that they remained committed to the return of inspectors.

401. Mr Blair cautioned President Bush about his assumption that the UK would be ready to lead a strike into northern Iraq. But he told President Bush that the UK would take a significant military role if it came to war with Iraq.

402. Sir David Manning suggested that US and European opinion should be reminded that, while the US and UK would prefer to take action through the UN, they would find other means if that was not possible.

403. Mr Campbell recorded that Mr Blair had discussed the content of a resolution on the flight to Camp David; and that "after a long discussion", Mr Blair had "[come] round" to Sir David Manning's view "that it was probably best to get a tough first mandate by promising to go back to the UN, but make it clear that the UN had to face up to this".[129]

404. The meeting at Camp David was in two parts.[130]

405. Mr Blair, supported by Sir David Manning, discussed Iraq with President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Dr Rice from 1600 to 1745. Sir David Manning recorded that it was a "remarkable" meeting. President Bush had congratulated Mr Blair on his speech at Sedgefield.

406. During the meeting, the arguments for taking the issue to the UN, the type of resolution, the attitude of other members of the Security Council, the relationship with the MEPP, and aspects of a military campaign and the "morning after", were discussed in depth.

407. Mr Blair said that he was in no doubt about the need to deal with Saddam Hussein; and that the likelihood was that this would mean military action at some point. The immediate issue was "how to maximise the chance of resolving the Saddam dilemma quickly and cleanly". It was possible that sustained pressure would lead to his quick collapse, but "we could certainly not count on it". That might "in part" depend on "winning the propaganda battle" and securing wide international support:

> "If it came to force, we could hope that we would secure the relatively quick overthrow of Saddam. But even if we did, we would still be faced with the big issue of what followed his departure."

408. There would be even more difficult problems if Saddam Hussein did not collapse quickly. We should not assume that there would be a quick collapse in Iraq as there had been with the Taliban in Afghanistan.

409. Mr Blair stated that the position of the international community made it important to bring the issue back to the UN and secure a new Security Council resolution. Indeed, two resolutions might be necessary: one setting conditions and one stipulating action when Saddam failed to meet them. Without a resolution, military action would have little or no international backing.

410. Later, Mr Blair recognised that the two resolution route offered a better chance of setting tough initial demands, but with a risk of difficulties in securing a second resolution authorising action. In a discussion about how a breach would be established and the need to avoid a long debate, Mr Blair said: "If Saddam was obviously in breach we would know, and we had to be ready to move." On balance, Mr Blair favoured a tough initial resolution leaving open the option of going back to the UN for a second resolution, if and when Saddam were in breach.

---

[130] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 8 September 2002, 'Your Visit to Camp David on 7 September: Conversation with President Bush'.

411. Mr Blair said that it was "unlikely" that Saddam would comply with the new resolution; even if he let the inspectors back in he would probably prevent them from doing their job. He added:

> "We should then be in a very powerful position in demanding action in response to his obstruction and prevarication."

412. Mr Blair suggested the need, in parallel with UN activity, to:

> "… start making military deployments to demonstrate to Saddam and the international community our seriousness of intent; and to be ready to move if we had to. The message would be stark; either the regime must change in response to the UN resolution, or it would be changed through military action."

413. Mr Blair stated that there would be a need to table a very strong resolution that would stipulate intrusive inspection; and that Dr Blix would do a "thorough job". Dr Blix had put forward some good ideas about UNMOVIC's coverage of Iraq in a discussion the previous day. The resolution would also need to include provisions for humanitarian monitoring inside Iraq, and possibly force protection for UNMOVIC. "The trick would be to make a resolution acceptable to Security Council members but sufficiently stringent to bring about profound change in Iraq were Saddam to implement it."

414. Mr Blair also set out the need to make a good public case against Saddam, publishing all the evidence. The UK would publish a dossier. He stated that the US and UK:

> "… must build our case, persuading the international community of the nature of the threat. In particular we must get over to our publics the reality that any crisis in the Gulf generated by Saddam would inevitably involve us."

415. Later Mr Blair stated that there was a need to explain the case for action fully to public opinion: "While insisting that no-one wanted war, we must spell out why we had to act." This included reminding people of the horrors of Saddam's regime.

416. Mr Blair said that there was a:

> "… natural reluctance to do difficult things, made worse by ignorance … of Saddam's capabilities and intentions. We had to correct this, at the same time answering the legitimate question of why we were taking action now. 11 September was a powerful argument for dealing with threats before they materialised … At some point, WMD and terrorism would come together, with appalling consequences, unless we took action."

417. In the context of a discussion about the attitudes of other members of the Security Council, Sir David Manning suggested that US and European opinion should be reminded of what had happened over Kosovo:

> "We had tried to go the UN route; we were thwarted; so we had had to resort to a coalition of the willing. The moral was that we would prefer to take action through the UN if we could but we would find other means if we could not."

418. Mr Blair stated that in those circumstances, the US and UK would have to make clear that either the UN accepted its responsibilities for enforcing its decisions, or action would be taken without it. It was "critically important" that the initial resolution should not appear to be "merely a pretext for military action"; we had to make it clear that we remained committed to the resumption of inspections and wanted the resolution to succeed.

419. President Bush and Mr Blair also discussed the prospects for a military campaign, including the possibility of leaving Saddam "bottled up" in Baghdad.

420. Sir David Manning recorded that Mr Blair had expressed caution about the US assumption that the UK would be ready to lead a strike from Turkey into northern Iraq and provide two-thirds of the force. But Mr Blair emphasised that the UK would indeed take "a significant military role" if it came to war with Iraq.

421. Finally, the importance of US action to make progress on the MEPP was also discussed.

422. Sir David Manning's record of the discussion was submitted to Mr Blair and sent to a number of colleagues in No.10. A personal copy was also sent to Mr Straw. No other copies appear to have been made.

423. US and UK officials held a meeting in parallel with the discussions between President Bush and Mr Blair. The only record of that meeting appears in Mr Campbell's diary, in which he wrote that they had addressed three issues:

- building the case on the evidence for why Saddam had to be dealt with now;
- why Saddam posed a unique threat; and
- the need for the US to engage on the Middle East.[131]

424. A plenary meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair and their teams followed the restricted discussion.[132]

425. Presentational issues were discussed between officials and in the plenary, including the "Why now?" question.

[132] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 8 September 2002, 'Prime Minister's Meeting with Bush, Camp David 7 September: Public Presentation of Iraq Policy'.

426. Mr Blair stated that since 1998, there was evidence, including in the 6 September IAEA report, of continued development of WMD. He also thought that the nature of the Iraqi regime "should become part of our case on WMD"; and that: "We needed an active strategy to take the debate to the rest of the world." He set out the UK's plans to publish the dossier within a few weeks. Mr Campbell emphasised the need for people "to understand what BW actually did"; and that the "media threshold would be high, so the dossier would need to include new facts from the last four years".

427. During the plenary meeting Mr Stephen Hadley, US Deputy National Security Advisor, put forward principles for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq: territorial integrity, democracy, and a role for the UN.

428. Mr Rycroft's record of the plenary contained little of the substance addressed in the restricted meeting. It was sent to the Private Secretaries to Mr Hoon and the Cabinet Secretary, and to Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards, Mr Scarlett, Mr Bowen, Sir Christopher Meyer and Sir Jeremy Greenstock. It was again marked personal and it is clear from the copy on the FCO files that named senior officials were allowed to read the letter only in Mr Straw's Private Office.

429. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair "felt that his job was to sell the case for the UN route to Cheney".[133] After the private meeting, Sir David Manning had said that President Bush had used Mr Blair to persuade the Vice President; and that President Bush had made up his mind on the threat and the need for the UN to deal with it.

430. The official record confirms that was the UK perception.[134]

431. Mr Campbell wrote that President Bush had told him:

> "… it's the right thing to do and future generations will surely thank us. I really believe that. I really believe the world has to get rid of Saddam and I really appreciate y'all coming over."[135]

432. President Bush wrote in his memoir that he had told Mr Blair at Camp David that he had taken the decision to ask the UN for a resolution to disarm Saddam Hussein; and that if diplomacy failed he would take military action.

433. President Bush wrote in his memoir that following the attack of 11 September 2001, he had chosen to pursue a policy of coercive diplomacy on Iraq:

> "My first choice was to use diplomacy …

"… We believed Saddam's weakness was that he loved power and would do anything to keep it. If we could convince him that we were serious about removing his regime, there was a chance he would give up his WMD … The odds of success were long. But given the alternative it was worth the effort. The approach was called coercive diplomacy.

"Coercive diplomacy with Iraq consisted of two tracks: One was to rally a coalition of nations to make clear that Saddam's defiance of his international obligations was unacceptable. The other was to develop a credible military option that could be used if he failed to comply. These tracks would run parallel at first. As the military option grew more visible and more advanced, the tracks would converge. Our maximum leverage would come just before they intersected. That would be the moment of decision. And ultimately, it would be Saddam Hussein's decision to make."[136]

434. President Bush wrote that Mr Blair had been "pleased when I told him that I was planning to ask the UN for the resolution", and that Mr Blair had replied: "Many opponents wish we would just be unilateral – then they could complain … But you are calling their bluff."

435. President Bush added:

"We both understood what the decision meant. Once we laid out our position at the UN, we had to be willing to follow through with the consequences. If diplomacy failed, there would be only one option left. 'I don't want to go to war,' I told Tony, 'but I will do it'.

"Tony agreed."

436. Vice President Cheney wrote that President Bush wanted to support Mr Blair's position; but he also expressed scepticism about the utility of inspections in achieving the US objectives.

437. Vice President Cheney wrote that in the meeting with Mr Blair they had talked through the need for UN involvement:

"Blair was tough. He understood the stakes and the importance of acting against Saddam, and he was clear that he would be with us no matter what – and that was likely to include strong opposition from within his own party.

"Blair argued that a UN resolution was necessary to achieve maximum international cooperation. He was very persuasive, and I understood that the President wanted to support his friend. There was no legal obligation for us to pursue a resolution, but there were some in the United States and many more in Europe who felt it would legitimize military action, and a resolution would also speak to their concerns. The President told the Prime Minister he would go forward with a resolution.

> "I knew the President was no more interested than I was in an endless round of inspections and deception in Iraq, and in the days that followed, I recommended inserting into the resolution a requirement for Saddam to submit within thirty days a declaration disclosing his WMD capacity and holdings."[137]

438. Mr Blair told Mr Hoon that he had been alarmed by US expectations that the UK would lead the northern axis and that there should be no visible preparations for a month or so. But Mr Hoon was not sent a copy of Sir David Manning's record of the discussions at Camp David.

439. Mr Blair telephoned Mr Hoon on the evening of 8 September, to give him a read-out of his discussions with President Bush and Vice President Cheney, and the US position on the UN route, in advance of Mr Hoon's visit to the US.[138]

440. Mr Rycroft recorded that:

> "The Prime Minister said that he had been alarmed that [President] Bush had understood that the UK would be 'leading the invasion' from the North of Iraq. This required very careful handling. Having received the military advice, the Prime Minister's view was that we could not offer Package 3 in the timescale required and given the constraints of Operation Fresco. But we might be able to offer Package 2, plus some further elements. There should be no visible preparations for a month or so."

441. Mr Hoon was not sent a copy of the record of the discussion at Camp David.

442. Mr Hoon told Secretary Rumsfeld on 11 September that the UK would not want to offer more than it could deliver and was therefore expecting to offer maritime and air assets for any military campaign.[139]

President Chirac's interview, 8 September 2002

443. President Chirac's concerns about the broader implications for the international system of military action against Iraq without a Security Council decision, including the impact on the international coalition to counter terrorism, were published in the New York Times on 9 September.

444. President Chirac supported the return of inspectors on the basis of the provisions of resolution 1284. He made clear that consideration of the use of force should be considered in a second resolution if Iraq refused to allow inspections.

[139] Letter Williams to Manning, 13 September 2002, 'Iraq: Meeting with Donald Rumsfeld: 11 September 2002'.

445. President Chirac gave an interview to the New York Times on 8 September, which was published the following day.[140]

446. In the context of the US position that a doctrine of pre-emption was necessary to fight terrorism, President Chirac stated that he had told President Bush that he had "great reservations" about that doctrine: "As soon as one nation claims the right to take preventive action, other countries will naturally do the same … How would the Americans, the Europeans and others react?"

447. Asked what would be the best way to be sure that Saddam Hussein did not develop "further weapons of mass destruction" and whether he shared the US objective of regime change, President Chirac replied:

> "I don't need to tell you that I condemn the regime …
> "Secondly, I am totally against unilateralism in the modern world. I believe that the modern world must be coherent and consequently, if a military action is to be undertaken, it must be the responsibility of the international community, via a decision by the Security Council. Now, the Security Council has decided that Iraq must not have weapons of mass destruction; it did not say that a regime change was necessary there. So if the objective is to prevent Iraq from having weapons of mass destruction, we have to go along with what the United Nations has done, that is, impose the return of inspectors in Iraq without restrictions or preconditions … If it refuses, then it's up to the Security Council to deliberate and decide what must be done and notably whether a military operation should be undertaken or not …"

448. Asked about divisions between allies in the context of Mr Blair's visit to Washington and his own meeting with Chancellor Schröder, President Chirac replied:

> "France is a member of the Security Council, it cannot be prejudiced … I agree completely that there must be a Security Council decision concerning the return of the inspectors … If the inspectors are not allowed to return, then there should be a second Security Council resolution to say if there should be or not an intervention. Following the second resolution, France will definitely give its position. But I am very worried about the consequences of an intervention on the international coalition to counter terrorism …"

449. Asked under what circumstances France would favour the use of force, President Chirac responded that he "naturally" wished for a change in the Iraqi regime:

> "But a few principles and a little order are needed to run the affairs of the world. The issue today is to know whether there are any weapons of mass destruction. And to see it, the inspectors must be free … to visit. This is the objective. If this is fulfilled, then it's over. The Security Council or the international community never wanted to > change the regime in Iraq, because there are numerous countries where one wished to see another regime. But if we go down that road, where are we going?"

450. President Chirac stated that military action was possible "if it's decided by the international community on the basis of indisputable proof. For the moment, we have neither proof, nor decisions …"

451. In a conversation with Mr Blair on 9 September, President Chirac reiterated his points.[141] Mr Blair gave him a report of his talks with President Bush. Mr Blair told President Chirac that a UN resolution must focus on WMD, not regime change, and ensure that the inspectors could return unconditionally and do their job properly.

452. Mr Rycroft recorded that President Chirac supported a resolution seeking the return of inspectors but was concerned that some in the US wanted Saddam Hussein to refuse to justify military action. In President Chirac's view, there would have to be a second resolution to justify military action "and that would not be adopted". Mr Blair responded that that "would depend on the circumstances". If the inspectors returned and Saddam's WMD were disarmed, the nature of the regime would change. Saddam Hussein should be given the chance to comply. If he refused to do so, we should be tough.

453. In response to a question from President Chirac about whether the UK was sure that Saddam Hussein had WMD, Mr Blair said that: "Personally he had no doubt that Saddam was trying to rebuild his WMD capacity." Mr Blair's view was:

> "… we should move to the point where the choice was Saddam's. Either he accepted and abided by the new resolution, or we would have to act to ensure that he abided by it."

454. After further discussion of the US approach and its potential impact, Mr Blair said that he had made clear to President Bush the need to take action to relaunch the MEPP and the importance of Afghanistan. He was "convinced that through co-operation with the US on Iraq it would be possible to make progress in other areas".

455. Following a conversation between Mr Jean-David Levitte, French Permanent Representative to the UN, and Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 11 September, the UK Mission to the UN New York reported that the French view was:

- Two resolutions were the only way of achieving consensus and building a coalition on Iraq. France would negotiate a second resolution, if needed, in a "positive spirit".
- Consultations should start in capitals with the Permanent Five in New York discussing "concepts" not a draft text.

[141] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 9 September 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with President Chirac, 9 September'.

- To be successful in achieving the return of inspectors, any resolution had to coincide with a credible military timetable to maximise the pressure on Saddam.
- There should be no additional conditions for inspections.[142]

JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002: 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios'

456. The JIC issued an Assessment of Iraq's possession of chemical and biological weapons and possible scenarios for their use on 9 September 2002.

457. The Assessment contained a number of significant changes which strengthened previous JIC judgements on Iraq's possession of chemical and biological weapons and the likelihood of their use.

458. In response to the request from Sir David Manning for advice on the possible scenarios for Iraqi use of chemical and biological weapons, the JIC commissioned an Assessment.[143]

459. The Key Judgements of the JIC Assessment, which was issued on 9 September, were:

- Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it.
- Faced with the likelihood of military defeat and being removed from power, Saddam is unlikely to be deterred from using chemical and biological weapons by any diplomatic or military means.
- The use of chemical and biological weapons prior to any military attack would boost support for US-led action and is unlikely.
- Saddam is prepared to order missile strikes against Israel, with chemical or biological warheads, in order to widen the war once hostilities begin.
- Saddam could order the use of CBW weapons in order to deny space and territory to coalition forces, or to cause casualties, slow any advance, and sap US morale.
- If not previously employed, Saddam will order the indiscriminate use of whatever CBW weapons remain available late in a ground campaign or as a final act of vengeance. But such an order would depend on the availability of delivery means and the willingness of commanders to obey."[144]

460. The preparation of the Assessment, its detailed findings, and the intelligence underpinning it are addressed in Section 4.2. That Section also addresses the dossier,

Mr Blair's speech to the TUC, 10 September 2002

461. In his speech to the TUC on 10 September, Mr Blair argued that the threat posed by Iraq was not imminent but it had to be dealt with before it could "erupt and engulf us all".

462. As he had planned in his minute of 30 August, Mr Blair set out the rationale for tackling the problem of Iraq – "why I say Saddam is a threat that has to be dealt with" – in the first section of his speech to the TUC on 10 September.[146]

463. In the speech, Mr Blair elaborated many of the points he had made in his press conference on 3 September. Mr Blair argued that Saddam Hussein's actions in starting wars of aggression, using chemical weapons against his own people and oppressing them made his regime:

> "With the Taliban gone … unrivalled as the world's worst regime …
> "Given that history … to allow him to use the weapons he has or to get the weapons he wants would be an act of gross irresponsibility and we should not countenance it."

464. Mr Blair stated that "when the weapons inspectors were evicted from Iraq in 1998 there were still enough chemical and biological weapons remaining to devastate the entire Gulf region". He also stated that Saddam Hussein had a nuclear programme, which he had denied and which had been "disrupted" by inspections. He was in breach of "23 outstanding UN obligations requiring him to admit inspectors and disarm".

465. Containment had worked "up to a point", but sanctions were eroding and Saddam Hussein was getting around US$3bn a year through illicit trade which he was "almost certainly" using for his weapons programmes. British and American pilots were risking their lives to police the No-Fly Zones; and that couldn't "go on for ever".

466. Addressing the way ahead, Mr Blair stated that it was right to deal with Iraq through the UN; it was the will of the UN that Saddam was flouting. The challenge for "all in the UN" was "to resolve the threat from Saddam not avoid it". Mr Blair added:

> "Let it be clear that he must be disarmed. Let it be clear that there can be no more conditions, no more games, no more prevaricating, no more undermining of the UN's authority.
> "Let it be clear that should the will of the UN be ignored, action will follow. Diplomacy is vital. But when dealing with dictators … diplomacy has to be backed by the certain knowledge in the dictator's mind that behind the diplomacy is the possibility of force being used.

"… if we do not deal with the threat from this international outlaw and his barbaric regime, it may not erupt and engulf us this month or next; perhaps not even this year or the next. But it will at some point. And I do not want it on my conscience that we knew the threat, saw it coming and did nothing."

467. Mr Blair concluded this section of his speech by asking people to "listen to the case" he would "be developing over the coming weeks and to reflect on it".

468. In a broader call for action, including to "restart the Middle East Peace Process" and for renewed efforts on international terrorism, Mr Blair stated:

"Internationalism is no longer a utopian cry of the left, it is practical statesmanship."

469. It is clear from a record of Mr Hoon's discussions in Washington on 11 September that officials in the US Administration were following what Mr Blair said in public closely: one senior official had described the speech to the TUC as "spectacular".[147]

The decision to recall Parliament

470. Mr Blair asked for Parliament to be recalled to debate Iraq and the issue of weapons of mass destruction.

471. On 11 September, Mr Blair wrote to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and to the Lord Chancellor, asking for Parliament to be recalled in the week beginning 23 September.[148]

472. Mr Blair wrote that "Parliament must and will be at the heart of the national debate on the issue of Iraq and Weapons of Mass Destruction". He was seeking permission "to recall Parliament for a one-day debate on the Adjournment", led by Mr Straw, following a statement from himself. He added:

"By then, important discussions at the UN will have taken place. And the Government will be in a position to publish the dossier on what we know of the Iraqi regime and its WMD programme."

473. Mr Blair emphasised that "we are not yet at the stage of making decisions about military commitments with regard to Iraq, and that should we be so in the future, Parliament would obviously be given every opportunity to express its view".

Establishing the objectives of a UN resolution

474. Questions emerged in Washington shortly after the meeting at Camp David about whether Mr Blair regarded intrusive inspections as a necessary first stage in the plan.

475. In discussions with Secretary Powell about the strategy, Mr Straw raised doubts about the plan to seek authority for the use of military force in a second resolution.

476. Letters from Sir Christopher Meyer[149] and Mr Brenton[150] on 9 September reported suggestions in the US Administration that Mr Blair had indicated at Camp David that he would be willing to move straight to a resolution that sought approval to use "all necessary means" in response to Iraq's existing material breaches of its obligations without a resolution strengthening the inspection regime first. The UK was being asked to make sure that the White House correctly understood its position and, in particular, whether the UK regarded intrusive inspections as a necessary first stage in the plan.

477. Mr Straw spoke twice to Secretary Powell on 9 September.[151]

478. In the first conversation they discussed the issue of whether to go for one or two resolutions. The record stated that both were concerned to preserve what they described as "the Kosovo option"; and that Mr Straw thought that that "would require only one resolution as long as it contained a fig leaf for military action. We should not commit to a second resolution, although that option could be kept open."

479. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell also agreed that no public document could produce an incontrovertible case for military action; the focus had to be on compliance with UN resolutions.

480. In the second conversation, Mr Straw had "confirmed '100%' that a UNSCR was a key part of the strategy discussed between" Mr Blair and President Bush, and that President Bush had "made clear he did not regard military action as the first option".

481. Secretary Powell and Mr Straw discussed the latest position in a telephone conversation on 10 September.[152] US thinking, influenced by Mr Blair at Camp David, was that the provision for the use of "all necessary means" against Iraq should be put in the second resolution. Mr Straw said that he was:

> "… in two minds. He was searching for what would work best. If we could get what was needed in the first resolution, it would be good to have it in the bank. He was certain that Saddam would play carefully and long to undermine the coalition we put together to pass the first resolution."

482. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the possibility that a second resolution might not be agreed, whether they would be free to follow the "Kosovo model" and what Security Council members opposed to the use of force might do. Mr Straw said that "good wording in the first resolution would change the politics". They agreed to discuss the issues further after Mr Straw had spoken to Mr Blair and Sir Jeremy Greenstock.

483. In parallel discussions with Dr Rice and in the context of clear US concerns about the potential timetable required by inspections, Sir David Manning emphasised the importance of inspections and the need for a report to the Security Council before addressing enforcement. Dr Rice asked for Mr Blair's views.

484. Mr Blair stated that Iraq needed to be played cleverly, using a step by step approach to convince opinion that action was needed.

485. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice also discussed the developing thinking on a UN resolution on 10 September.[153] Sir David reported to Mr Blair that Dr Rice had told him President Bush was:

"… keen to find a way to ensure the onus was put back on Saddam. We did not want the 'inspectors searching around forever' in a game of cat and mouse. Bush was uneasy about finding himself in the position of asking the Security Council to give Saddam a last chance when Saddam had been given so many last chances already."

486. Sir David had replied that this:

"… was unavoidable: we would inevitably be in the business of giving Saddam 'another last chance'. This had its difficulties. But it had the overriding benefit of ensuring that we could attract widespread international support by making clear that we wanted to go the UN route. And this 'last chance' came with the widespread expectation that, this time we meant business."

487. Dr Rice told Sir David that the US Administration was:

"… exploring the possibility of tabling a resolution in two parts. The first would stipulate that Saddam must make a declaration within fifteen to thirty days explaining why there had been a discrepancy between his claims and those of the UNSCOM inspectors … in 1998. He would be required to account for the materials that UNSCOM had been unable to identify and to promise that UNSCOM would have access to any that were remaining. This would challenge him to provide physical evidence relating to his WMD programme, as well as test his commitment of re-engaging seriously with the international community. Anything less than a forthcoming response would amount to an admission of guilt, confirming that he was in material breach of the … UN resolutions.

"The second part would deal with inspections. This would stipulate that the inspectors would have sixty days to certify that they had now been granted full and unfettered access to all installations and materials in Iraq, with provision for them to report back to the Security Council … If Saddam were co-operating, inspections could continue after the sixty day period. This part of the resolution would cover the conditions … including free access (anyone, anywhere, anytime) … and an explicit invitation to all members of the international community to provide full intelligence to the Inspectors."

488. Dr Rice told Sir David that the US had abandoned the idea of seeking force protection for UNMOVIC and the second part of the resolution could be "dispensed with" if the response on a declaration was "unsatisfactory". She said the US and UK "could argue that this would amount to a material breach and provided a green light for action".

489. Sir David replied:

"… there were attractions in demanding a declaration from Saddam although we should not kid ourselves: he was likely to refuse, or to announce blithely that there had been no discrepancy with UNSCOM and all his WMD had long since been destroyed. But his response would show either that he was unco-operative and obstructive; or that he was ready to make claims that the inspectors would probably quickly expose.

"But … there could be no question that the second part of the resolution could be dispensed with if Saddam's response to the first part seemed unsatisfactory. As … [Mr Blair] had told President Bush at Camp David, it was essential that the resolution stipulated intrusive inspection, and that this was carried out. This was the only way in which the international community would believe that we were serious about the UN route. I reiterated forcefully the points you had made at Camp David about avoiding any impression that the resolution was merely a pretext for quick military action, or that we were not sincere when we said that our preferred option was the reintroduction of an inspection regime. However unsatisfactorily Saddam responded to the first part of the proposed resolution, we were bound to be faced with a chorus of demands that we should test his response by getting the Inspectors back into Iraq. It was only after they had reported that we could move onto the enforcement issue."

490. Dr Rice "pressed" Sir David, who said he:

"… was absolutely clear. We needed the international community behind us; this meant a resolution that did not appear to be a pretext for military action; and this in turn meant serious commitment to UNMOVIC inspections. I was confident that this would be your view. I would check with you as soon as possible. The second part of the draft resolution was an integral part of the strategy."

491. Dr Rice told Sir David that "'speaking very frankly', there was a timing problem". The timetable he had set out "risked running well into next year before we could clear the decks for military action (assuming Saddam's continued obstruction)".

492. Sir David told Dr Rice that the US and UK should refuse to accept the:

"… ideal, but too leisurely, UNSCOM timetable. Once we had a resolution stipulating the return of the inspectors, we should get teams in quickly to look at carefully chosen targets. We should insist that they tackled the job right away. [Dr] Blix could build up to full strength in slower time."

493. Dr Rice also said that the US was looking at giving the inspectors a Security Council label, which Sir David resisted because it would "look restrictive and alienate the wider UN membership". It might be possible to associate the Security Council with the teams, and that "could be advantageous" if it was "sold" to Russia "as a way of ensuring" it was "fully consulted and implicated".

494. Dr Rice said she would feed Sir David's views into the White House debate and asked for Mr Blair's views by the end of the day.

495. Sir David commented:

"The pressure on Bush to try a quick fix through the 'material breach ploy' will be Cheney's attempt to rewrite the Camp David conclusions. I pushed back hard and made it clear that this would not run."

496. Sir David subsequently discussed the issues with Mr Blair who:

"… emphasised the need to play Iraq cleverly. We must look reluctant to use force, making it clear that we saw the current situation as a challenge to the credibility of the UN, and to the international community. You [Mr Blair] were increasingly convinced that, in the end, people would come round to accepting the need to deal with Saddam, if we had made full and willing use of the UN route. You were confident that we could get the Security Council behind us once we had demonstrated clearly that Saddam remained in violation. But if we appeared to be riding roughshod over the UN or taking it for granted, opinion would be very difficult to shift. We should move step by step. Once we had a new resolution … we would be putting the onus on Saddam as Bush wanted. But this would only work if the Americans resisted the Cheney temptation to go to the UN with what amounted to a take it or leave it resolution, and with the clear intention of early resort to military force."

497. Sir David advised that, despite his prodding, the UK did not know what President Bush would say in his speech on 12 September. Mr Blair might have to speak to President Bush again "to try to hold him to the Camp David conclusions".

498. Sir David subsequently informed Dr Rice that Mr Blair's position was that Iraq must be made a challenge to the whole international community through a UN resolution which required intrusive inspections; that they were an indispensable part of the strategy; and that if the UN route was proposed with real conviction, support could be secured.

499. Sir David spoke again to Dr Rice on the evening of 10 September conveying Mr Blair's:

> "… very strong view that we must make Iraq a challenge to the whole international community. We must do so through a UN resolution that … provided for an intrusive inspection regime. The inspectors were an indispensable part of the strategy. Saddam would either refuse to let the inspectors back, or he would let them in but almost certainly obstruct their operations. We should then be in a very strong position to insist on action. You [Mr Blair] believed that we should deal with Iraq step by step. We needed to get this resolution under our belt, put the onus squarely on Saddam, and then decide what to do in the light of his reaction."[154]

500. Sir David added that it was "essential" that a resolution was put forward:

> "… with conviction and made it absolutely clear that we wanted it to succeed. We should be emphasising at every turn that war was the last resort. The US Administration would have the worst of both worlds if it appeared to have been forced reluctantly to choose the UN route, or if it appeared to want a new resolution to serve as nothing more than a pretext for early military action."

501. Sir David added that it was "increasingly" Mr Blair's:

> "… impression that public opinion would come round if we proposed the UN route with real conviction. If and when it became clear that Saddam had yet again violated the will of the UN and the international community, there was a real chance that we could build wide support for further action. But if we failed to do this, and it appeared that Washington wanted to go the unilateral route, the international community would be resistant or hostile to action. Securing wide support would be a great prize, one that you [Mr Blair] believed was in reach."

---

[154] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 11 September 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

502. Sir David told Mr Blair that Dr Rice had been "pretty receptive to his arguments". President Bush was "not currently planning to say anything about a resolution or inspection". The speech made:

> "… a strong and persuasive case about the horrors of Saddam and his regime, but cannot bring itself to say that, in dealing with this threat, we must have another UN resolution and further inspections. Arguably, this is implicit. But it would be far better in winning hearts and minds if Bush made it explicit, and did not leave it to Colin Powell to make the UN case afterwards …"

503. Sir David told Dr Rice that Mr Blair would want to talk to President Bush before the speech.

504. Sir David commented to Mr Blair:

> "There is little doubt that the Cheney counter-attack, with its wilful distortion of what you said at Camp David, will be sustained right up to the moment that Bush mounts the UN rostrum. Despite my two conversations with Condi … it would still be very valuable if you could speak to Bush yourself."

505. Although Sir David's minutes were apparently sent only to addressees within No.10, copies were in the papers sent to the Inquiry from the Private Offices of Sir Michael Jay and Mr Straw.

506. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Mr Annan on 10 September that the UK wanted to avoid the use of military force.

507. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Mr Annan on 10 September that there had been "intensive discussions" between the US and UK.[155] "The priority for the UK was to make the UN route work if at all possible and to avoid the use of military force." But the problem of WMD in Iraq "must be dealt with". Sir Jeremy predicted that there was work to be done, including between capitals, before a debate could be launched in the Security Council.

508. Sir Jeremy and Mr Annan also discussed Iraq's position, including a suggestion that Mr Tariq Aziz had been "casting around for a way out, willing to contemplate the return of inspectors but apparently genuinely puzzled as to how this could help Iraq if the inspectors were likely to be cover for spies to indicate Iraqi military targets". Mr Annan said he had assured Mr Aziz of Dr Blix's professionalism and independence.

509. Sir Jeremy commented that Mr Annan was aware that Iraq would not be contemplating any moves at all without the threat of military action.

510. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that there was still debate in Washington about the UK's position on the need for inspectors.

[155] Telegram 1611 UKMIS New York to FCO, 10 September 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Annan'.

511. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that he would need to make his position clear to President Bush.

512. On 10 September, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell, with officials, met for supper in New York.[156]

513. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that President Bush's speech would not refer to a resolution but he (Powell) would confirm to journalists that a resolution was the aim. It would have four key elements:

- A "statement that Iraq was in 'material breach' of its obligations".
- Iraq to provide "all information required under [resolution] 687" within 15 days, and "a declaration of everything they were holding". There had been a debate in the Administration about how to respond if Iraq complied. Inspectors "would have to go in to destroy what Iraq had declared: there [would] be no further scope for military action. But most in the Administration did not think that Iraq would respond satisfactorily."
- Secretary Powell had acknowledged that intrusive inspections were an "alternative at this stage" and that all necessary means could be in either a first or second resolution.
- "Either way, the first resolution would deal with Iraq's violation of everything apart from WMD … [T]he President would linger on this kind of thing in his speech."

514. Secretary Powell said:

> "It was possible that the US would want to move from material breach to all necessary means without interim steps, ie without inspectors … [T]there was some confusion about how the Prime Minister had left things at Camp David, i.e. some argued that the Prime Minister did not attach priority to inspectors."

515. Using Sir David Manning's record of the discussions at Camp David, Mr Straw put Secretary Powell "straight" on the UK position. He stressed that Mr Blair's "whole focus was on inspectors: regime change might be an incidental consequence of our policy but it was not the aim".

516. Secretary Powell said that he had heard that Dr Rice had presented Sir David Manning with the "declaration of holdings option"; and he implied that was "with some success".

517. Mr Straw said that was the first he had heard of the option and asked whether it "was a device to avoid inspectors". The world knew that Saddam Hussein was bad but not everybody was convinced by the threat he posed; the only way to prove it was to get inspectors in. Mr Straw was "worried about the motives of those suggesting the declaration alternative. Saddam was intelligent and well advised; he could be coached into providing a difficult answer."

518. In response to a question from Sir Jeremy Greenstock about whether the US was genuine about the UN approach or whether it was "a brief effort before the early use of force", with the status of inspectors the key difference between the two approaches, Secretary Powell said that President Bush was not doing this as a fig leaf for war: the US could not act unilaterally; it needed too much help in the region. Secretary Powell added that the US needed more than resolution 1284 (1999). If the UN approach worked and regime change "dropped away", the US would need a really tough inspection regime ("Blix plus plus"), not a weak UNSCOM.

519. Mr Straw gave an account of Sir David Manning's telephone conversation with Dr Rice earlier that day, which Secretary Powell summed up as the UK saying that the US can't say "we don't like the answer [to our declaration demand], we're going to war". Secretary Powell advised that Mr Blair might need to make the importance he attached to the return of inspectors clear to President Bush.

520. Mr Straw sent Mr Blair a separate minute reporting the conversation and "recommend[ing] strongly" that Mr Blair should speak to President Bush after his speech "to secure a reconfirmation" of what he had agreed at Camp David.[157] Mr Straw suggested that Mr Blair should also "dismiss" any idea of simply giving Iraq 15-30 days to explain the discrepancies the inspectors had unearthed then moving to military action rather than seeking the insertion of inspectors.

521. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that Mr Blair thought President Bush should use his speech at the UN General Assembly to make a virtue of going the UN route.

522. Sir David Manning spoke again to Dr Rice at 12.15pm on 11 September.[158] He suggested that President Bush's speech needed to expand his concluding sentence on the role of the UN by announcing he would be proposing a new resolution "within the next few days". That would have "immediate impact at the UN and great resonance in Europe and more widely. At present the speech left us hanging." It was "at best, only implicit" what President Bush thought the UN should do.

523. In response to a question from Dr Rice, Sir David told her he was "confident" that was Mr Blair's view. The President should use the speech to make a virtue of going the UN route.

524. Dr Rice told Sir David that President Bush "would probably be ready to do this" for Mr Blair.

The UN General Assembly

MR ANNAN'S SPEECH, 12 SEPTEMBER 2002

526. Mr Annan opened the annual debate of the UN General Assembly on 12 September by re-affirming the indispensable necessity and enduring relevance of multilateralism and multilateral institutions in maintaining international peace, security and freedom for all.

527. Mr Annan called on Member States to act through the UN adding that an effective international security system depended on the Security Council's authority and willingness to act even in the most difficult cases.

528. Mr Annan called on Iraq to comply with its obligations and appealed to those who had influence with Iraq to encourage it to do so. If Iraq's defiance continued, the Security Council "must face its responsibilities".

529. Mr Annan's address to the General Assembly on 12 September focused on the arguments for multilateral not unilateral action to address the challenges on the UN's agenda and for the full use of multilateral institutions, where all States had "a clear interest, as well as a clear responsibility, to uphold international law and maintain international order".[161]

530. Mr Annan stated that "only concerted vigilance and co-operation among all States" would offer "real hope of denying terrorists their opportunity" and warned:

> "On all these matters, for any one State – large or small – choosing to follow or reject the multilateral path must not be a matter of simple political convenience. It has consequences far beyond the immediate context …
> "The more a country makes use of multilateral institutions – thereby respecting shared values, and accepting the obligations and restraints inherent in those values – the more others will trust and respect it, and the stronger its chance to exercise true leadership."

531. Addressing the role of the Security Council, Mr Annan stated that "when States decide to use force to deal with broader threats to international peace and security", not acting under the inherent right to self-defence under Article 51 of the UN Charter, there was "no substitute for the unique legitimacy provided by the United Nations". Member States attached "fundamental importance to such legitimacy and the international rule of law". They had shown, "notably in the action to liberate Kuwait", that they were:

> "… willing to take actions under the authority of the Security Council, which they would not be willing to take without it.
> "The existence of an effective international security system depends on the Council's authority – and therefore on the Council having the political will to act, even in the most difficult cases … The primary criterion for putting an issue on the Council's agenda should not be the receptiveness of the parties, but the existence of a grave threat to world peace."

532. Addressing "current threats to world peace, where true leadership and effective action are badly needed", Mr Annan stated:

> "… the leadership of Iraq continues to defy mandatory resolutions adopted by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter.
>
> "I have engaged Iraq in an in-depth discussion on a range of issues, including the need for arms inspectors to return, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions.
>
> "Efforts to obtain Iraq's compliance with the Council's resolutions must continue. I appeal to all who have influence with Iraq's leaders to impress on them the vital importance of accepting the weapons inspections. This is the indispensable first step towards assuring the world that all Iraq's weapons of mass destruction have indeed been eliminated, and – let me stress – towards the suspension and eventual ending of the [economic] sanctions …
> "I urge Iraq to comply … If Iraq's defiance continues, the Security Council must face its responsibilities."

533. Mr Annan wrote in his memoir that concerns had been expressed in early September about the impact on international law of pre-emptive action taken by one state, and that his response had been that support given by the United Nations for military action would bestow both legitimacy and legality on anything done with respect to Iraq.[162] In his address to the Assembly, he stated:

> "…there was no alternative for the legitimate use of force than through a united Security Council and that there was still time to seek a peaceful way out."

534. Mr Annan added:

> "After the meeting I spoke with Tony Blair for whom the process of negotiating a new resolution wasn't so much about achieving the disarmament goals. To him, above all, it was a test of the UN in the eyes of the United States: 'a critical moment for the UN to persuade the US that the UN has the wherewithal to be effective and relevant in the future'."

PRESIDENT BUSH'S SPEECH, 12 SEPTEMBER 2002

535. In his speech to the General Assembly, President Bush set out his view of the "grave and gathering danger" posed by Saddam Hussein and challenged the UN to act to address Iraq's failure to meet the obligations imposed by the Security Council since 1990.

536. President Bush made clear that, if Iraq defied the UN the world must hold Iraq to account and the US would "work with the UN Security Council for the necessary resolutions".

537. But the US would not stand by and do nothing in the face of the threat.

538. President Bush's speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September focused primarily on Iraq.[163]

539. President Bush began his speech by referring to the origin of the United Nations, stating that the Security Council had been created "so that, unlike the League of Nations, our deliberations would be more than talk, our resolutions would be more than wishes". He stated that security was being challenged by regional conflicts, ethnic and religious strife, and "outlaw groups and regimes that accept no law of morality and no limit to their violent ambitions". The "greatest fear" was that terrorists would "find a shortcut to their mad ambitions when an outlaw regime supplies them with the technologies to kill on a massive scale".

540. President Bush stated:

> "In one place and one regime, we find all these dangers in their most lethal and aggressive forms – exactly the kind of aggressive threat the United Nations was born to confront."

541. President Bush stated that, to suspend hostilities after its invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, Saddam Hussein had "accepted a series of commitments" and "agreed to prove" that he was "complying with every one of those obligations". By "breaking every pledge", Saddam had "made the case against himself".

542. President Bush set out the obligations imposed by the UN on Iraq, including that it should:

- "cease at once repression of its own people";
- "return all prisoners from Kuwait and other lands";

---

[163] The White House, 12 September 2002, President's Remarks to the United Nations General Assembly.

- "renounce all involvement with terrorism and permit no terrorist organisations to operate in Iraq"; and
- "destroy and stop developing all weapons of mass destruction and long range missiles and to prove to the world it has done so by complying with rigorous inspection".

543. President Bush set out Iraq's failure to meet those obligations. Iraq had "broken every aspect" of the last pledge, including:

- "Right now, Iraq is expanding and improving facilities that were used for the production of biological weapons."
- UN inspections had revealed that Iraq "likely maintains stockpiles of VX, mustard and other chemical agents, and that the regime is rebuilding and expanding facilities capable of producing chemical weapons".
- Iraq continued "to withhold important information about its nuclear program"; employed "capable nuclear scientists and technicians"; and retained "the physical infrastructure needed to build a nuclear weapon". It had "made several attempts to buy high-strength aluminium tubes used to enrich uranium for a nuclear weapon". If Iraq acquired fissile material, "it would be able to build a nuclear weapon within a year".
- Iraq's "state controlled media" had "reported numerous meetings between Saddam Hussein and his nuclear scientists, leaving little doubt about his continued appetite for these weapons".
- Iraq also possessed "a force" of SCUD-type missiles with greater than permitted range and was "building more … that can inflict mass death throughout the region".
- Iraq had "subverted" the OFF programme "to buy missile technology and military materials".
- Despite the UN's demands for the return of inspectors, Iraq had had "four years … to plan and to build and to test behind the cloak of secrecy".

544. Challenging the United Nations to act, President Bush stated:

> "We know that Saddam Hussein pursued weapons of mass murder even when inspectors were in his country. Are we to assume that he stopped when they left? The history, the logic and the facts lead to one conclusion: Saddam Hussein's regime is a grave and gathering danger. To suggest otherwise is to hope against the evidence. To assume … good faith is … a reckless gamble … [T]his is a risk we must not take.
> "We have been more than patient … Saddam Hussein has defied all these efforts and continues to develop weapons of mass destruction. The first time we may be completely certain he has … nuclear weapons is when … he uses one. We owe it to all our citizens to prevent that day from coming.

> "The conduct of the Iraqi regime is a threat to the authority of the United Nations, and a threat to peace … All the world now faces a test, and the United Nations a difficult and defining moment. Are the Security Council resolutions to be honoured and enforced, or cast aside without consequence? Will the United Nations serve the purpose of its founding or will it be irrelevant?
> "The United States … want the United Nations to be effective and respected and successful. We want the resolutions of the world's most important multilateral body to be enforced, and right now those resolutions are being unilaterally subverted by the Iraqi regime …"

545. Challenging Iraq, President Bush stated: "If the Iraqi regime wishes peace" it would act in accordance with its obligations to the UN. He listed those obligations but did not explicitly mention the obligation to allow weapons inspectors to return.

546. President Bush offered the prospect of a new relationship:

> "If all these steps are taken, it will signal a new openness and accountability in Iraq. And it could open the prospect of the United Nations helping to build a Government that represents all Iraqis – a Government based on respect for human rights, economic liberty and internationally supervised elections.
>
> "The United States has no quarrel with the Iraqi people …
> "My nation will work with the UN Security Council to meet our common challenge. If Iraq's regime defies us again, the world must move deliberately and decisively to hold Iraq to account. We will work with the UN Security Council for the necessary resolutions. But the purposes of the United States should not be doubted. The Security Council resolutions will be enforced, and the just demands of peace and security will be met, or action will be unavoidable, and a regime that has lost its legitimacy will lose its power."

547. President Bush warned:

> "Events can turn in one of two ways.
>
> "If we fail to act in the face of danger the people of Iraq will continue to live in brutal submission. The regime will have new power to bully, dominate and conquer its neighbours, condemning the Middle East to more years of bloodshed and fear. The regime will remain unstable … With every step the Iraqi regime takes towards gaining and deploying the most terrible weapons, our own options to confront that regime will narrow. And if an emboldened regime were to supply these weapons to terrorist allies, then the attacks of September 11 would be a prelude to far greater horrors.
> "If we meet our responsibilities, if we overcome this danger, we can arrive at a very different future. The people of Iraq can shake off their captivity. They can one day join a democratic Afghanistan and a democratic Pakistan, inspiring reforms throughout the Muslim world …"

548. President Bush concluded:

"Neither of these outcomes is certain … We must choose between a world of fear and a world of progress. We cannot stand by and do nothing while dangers gather … By heritage and by choice, the United States will make that stand. And, delegates to the United Nations, you have the power to make that stand as well."

549. President Bush also made a brief reference to the conflict between Israel and Palestine, stating:

"… there can be no peace for either side without freedom for both sides. America stands committed to an independent and democratic Palestine, living side by side with Israel in peace and security … My nation will continue to encourage all parties to step up to their responsibilities as we seek a just and comprehensive settlement to the conflict."

550. Dr Rice wrote in her memoir that the speech was intended to remind the audience of the dangers of Saddam Hussein's regime and "to put the world on notice that the United States would act – alone if necessary – to deal with the threat".[164] President Bush had been "supposed to call for a new resolution … Somehow it had been left out … The President … immediately noticed the omission and ad-libbed a line that put the fate of Saddam into the hands of the UN Security Council."[165]

551. There was uncertainty in the UK until the last moment about whether President Bush would announce that the US would seek a new Security Council resolution on Iraq.

552. Mr Straw wrote in his memoir that he had "been slipped an advance copy" of the speech and that he and others had:

"… spotted that the crucial line on working with the Security Council 'for the necessary resolution' had been omitted … I immediately assumed dirty work … But simple human error … was to blame. Fortunately the President spotted the omission and ad-libbed …"[166]

553. In a handwritten letter to President Bush congratulating him on the speech, Mr Blair wrote:

"It was a brilliant speech. It puts us on exactly the right strategy to get the job done. The reception has been very positive with every one now challenged to come up to the mark. Well done."[167]

MR DE VILLEPIN'S SPEECH, 12 SEPTEMBER 2002

554. Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, stated that France supported a demarche requiring Iraq to meet its obligations within a defined timetable, but emphasised the need for collective responsibility to be exercised through the Security Council; and that the Security Council should determine the action taken if Iraq did not comply.

555. In his statement to the General Assembly Mr de Villepin warned that the use of "force alone" was "often futile" and that, in an interdependent world, "Let us take care that our interventions do not give rise to new frustrations, do not produce new imbalances and spark fires which we cannot put out."[168]

556. Mr de Villepin stated:

> "The case of Iraq is typical of this new situation. It is a country that has defied the authority of the Security Council and flouted international law for several years. It is a regime that poses a grave threat to security, particularly the security of the peoples of its region, because of the risk of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Its conduct is the direct cause of the great suffering endured by its people.
>
> "Is the international community concerned? Of course it is. Can it continue to tolerate this situation? Definitely not. Should it act? Obviously: the status quo cannot go on. France's determination to obtain compliance with the law is absolute.
> "We must act, but we must do so effectively …"

557. Mr de Villepin added that action should not "exacerbate" a situation that was "already very disturbing":

> "We must act, but there are many traps. Intervention that is politically or legally ill-defined or poorly mounted would not garner the broad support necessary; it might galvanise public opinion in the region against it, and the regime in Baghdad which is isolated now could benefit; lastly, it might aggravate tensions in the Middle East and beyond at a time when we should … re-double our efforts to return to the path of dialogue and peace."

558. Mr de Villepin stated that there was "only one way" to avoid those traps, the path of "collective responsibility":

> "The necessary measures must be adopted by the international community after an in-depth and transparent consideration. Any temptation to engage in unilateral preventive action would be dangerous. We must take care to avoid any suspicion of bias or injustice. This is the only way to ensure that any action to enforce law and restore security does not add to insecurity …

> "That is why … France advocates a demarche made completely legitimate through collective deliberation. It requires two successive steps. First, we must together reaffirm the need for United Nations inspectors to return and demand that Iraq comply at last with its obligations under the Security Council decisions taken since 1991, and to do so according to a definite timetable … If Baghdad persists in its refusal to allow the inspectors to return unconditionally, then there must be consequences. The Security Council should then decide measures to be taken without excluding any option. Responsibilities would be clarified. The world must be able to act. But it must also be coherent and effective, in a sustained way. That is today the real challenge to our values, and to our democracies."

559. Mr Blair spoke to President Chirac on 13 September to discuss the UN resolution.[169] Mr Blair emphasised the need for a tougher inspections regime. He said that Saddam Hussein had to understand that there would be action against him if he did not comply: "unless Saddam thought we were serious there was no chance of him complying".

560. Mr Blair and President Chirac also discussed the need to be clear when the inspectors had finished their work "either because WMD had been discovered and destroyed or because there was no WMD". Mr Blair said that he would think about the two resolutions route (a return to the Security Council in the event of Iraq's non-compliance).

RUSSIA AND CHINA'S COMMENTS ON IRAQ

561. Russia and China emphasised the importance of dealing with Iraq through the instruments of the UN and in accordance with international law.

562. In his speech on 13 September, Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, made only a brief reference to Iraq. In a passage in his speech on regional conflicts he stated:

> "Experience shows that no matter how complex international crises and conflicts may be, whatever challenges and threats they may be fraught with, they can be settled with the aid of United Nations instruments and on the basis of international law. This fully applies to the situation around Iraq, which has long required political settlement in strict compliance with the Security Council resolutions."[170]

563. Mr Tang Jiaxuan, the Chinese Foreign Minister, stated that:

> "Counter-terrorism should be pursued on the basis of international law and of the norms of international relations, allowing the United Nations and its Security Council to play a leading role … Efforts should be made to prevent the arbitrary enlargement of the scope of the counter-terrorism campaign, but proven terrorists … must be resolutely stamped out."[171]

564. Mr Tang added that, in relation to Iraq, China stood "for a political settlement" in which the United Nations "should play an important role". He called on Iraq to "implement the relevant Security Council resolutions in a faithful and strict manner".

MR STRAW'S SPEECH, 14 SEPTEMBER 2002

565. Mr Straw's speech to the General Assembly focused on the unique challenge to the UN posed by Iraq's continued defiance, and the consequences for the UN's wider authority if action was not taken.

566. Mr Straw's speech to the UN General Assembly on 14 September focused on the critical role the UN had to play in world affairs, and the "three rising challenges" of failing states, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction.[172] He cited the experience with the International Security Assistance Force working with the UN in Afghanistan as showing what could be done.

567. Addressing the threat from proliferation, Mr Straw stated: "Nowhere is the case for universal support for the enforcement of the UN's law stronger than in the field of weapons of mass destruction." He added:

> "… with one infamous exception – no States have resorted to these, the world's worst weapons.
>
> "That exception is Iraq. For two decades, Saddam has defied and frustrated every attempt to enforce the international rule of law. Iraq is the only country to be condemned by the United Nations for breaching the Convention on Chemical Weapons. Iraq has fought two wars of aggression … No country has deceived every other country in the world as systematically and cynically as Iraq. And no country presents as fundamental a challenge to the United Nations …
> "Every society has to have rules … So those of us who believe in an active international community cannot stand by and do nothing while Iraq continues to defy the will of the United Nations. All of us who believe in the United Nations have to make up our minds now about how to deal with Iraq. The authority of the United Nations itself is at stake.
> "We cannot let Iraq do grave damage to this Organisation and the international order it represents. We cannot let Iraq go on defying a decade of Security Council resolutions. If we do, we will find all our resolutions are dismissed by aggressors everywhere as mere words …

> "There are times when hard choices have to be made. On Iraq, we have now reached such a moment. If we fail to deal with this challenge, the United Nations will be seriously weakened. And that would make the world a much more dangerous place.
> "As President Bush spelled out … we have to be resolute in the face of Iraq's defiance as President Bush said in his excellent speech … and secure the will of the United Nations. We must require Iraq to re-admit inspectors with unfettered access. We have not just an interest but a responsibility to ensure that Iraq complies fully with international law. We have to be clear to Iraq and to ourselves about the consequences which will flow from a failure by Iraq to meet its obligations."

THE UK GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

568. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that he had decided during August 2002 that Saddam had to be dealt with; and that the one objective of his meeting with President Bush at Camp David on 7 September was to persuade President Bush to go to the UN.

569. Mr Blair described that as obtaining a resolution and giving Saddam Hussein a final chance to comply.

570. In his memoir Mr Blair described Iraq, and what the UK was going to do about it, as, by the summer of 2002, "an insistent and pervasive backdrop".[173] He recorded that as a result of 24-hour media:

> "Literally every day, stories would appear moving the debate this way and that and in line with developing patterns of reporting, always hardening speculation into fact. At times we would not be sure whether we were driving the agenda or being driven by it. On holiday in France in August 2002, I took a call from George, who was equally frustrated by the fact that everyone assumed we had made up our mind and that the march to war was inexorable."

571. Mr Blair added:

> "When I returned from holiday … I also had my lines clear. I was going to be very tough: we had to deal with Saddam; it was right to do it; we had to send an unvarnished and plain message to the world."

572. Mr Blair wrote that the Camp David meeting had had one objective:

> "… to get [President Bush] to go down the UN route, ie to agree that before any action we would pass a UN resolution and give Saddam a final chance.

---

[173] Blair T. A Journey. Hutchinson, 2010.

> "This was not an easy sell. The US context … was completely opposite to ours; and the UN did not play well there. The meeting was a little tense … In the end, one to one, I got his acceptance … because … ultimately he bought the idea that this was going to be a whole lot easier if we had a coalition behind us."[174]

573. In the context of putting Iraq back into the UN system, Mr Blair told the Inquiry, that he had had "to persuade [President Bush] to take a view radically different from any of the people in his Administration".[175]

574. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that it would in his view have been impossible for the UK to act in support of the US without "the UN route", but US acquiescence was reluctant.

575. Asked what thought had been given to the position if President Bush had decided not to take the UN route, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that his assumption was that it would have been impossible for the UK to act for two reasons:

> "One was that I thought the domestic political position was just impossible … the other … was it seemed to me legally it would be very, very difficult."[176]

576. Asked whether the US had fully embraced the UN route, Sir David replied:

> "No, I think the description … is we moved them from scepticism to reluctant acquiescence. I don't think there was a sudden conversion."

577. In his memoir, Mr Straw expressed concern that the US Administration interpreted Mr Blair's position in his discussions with President Bush as offering the UK's unconditional support.

578. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that President Bush's speech was the critical point at which the US "committed itself to the strategy which we had been arguing for", and "meant that we were embarked on the strategy which, in my judgement could easily have led to a peaceful resolution of this major dispute and that was fundamental to the approach of the British Government".[177]

579. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote:

> "… when telling people things they didn't want to hear, Tony frequently used ambiguous, elliptical language. I continually worried that Bush heard Tony's nuanced phraseology as offering unconditional support. Time and again, on Iraq and the Middle East especially, Colin told me that this was exactly what he was picking up inside the US Administration. 'The Bush team took TB's comments as full support, and pocketed them', is Colin's subsequent comment to me."[178]

580. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that the UK's strategy on Iraq was set following the meeting at Camp David.

581. Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary from September 2002 to September 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "I arrived at a very interesting transitional phase in this whole story … This was, I would say, the conclusion of the strategy phase. The strategy was basically set following Camp David. The idea that Saddam Hussein would be confronted, that there would be an approach to the UN in alliance with the US and a justification would be put into the public domain. All that happened within days of my arrival …"[179]

582. Lord Turnbull added:

> "I think that was a point where a particular strategy coalesced, and at that point the position of [the] Cabinet Office, the Civil Service generally was: we now have a settled strategy and we now will pursue this and make it effective.
>
> "… there was never any opportunity seriously to say, 'This is the wrong option. Iran is the real problem or Korea is the real problem' or whatever … certainly by September 2002 that decision had been made …
> "… We had agreed, not only what we wanted to do but the Prime Minister … had agreed with the President of the United States what was going to be done next, and the idea of formulating [a] single resolution, and you could almost say setting a trap for Saddam Hussein – the idea of an ultimatum, that was all formulated at around that time."[180]

583. Asked whether the pros and cons of toppling Saddam Hussein had been examined, Lord Turnbull replied: "I think that was largely concluded by September."[181]

Conclusions

584. Following Mr Blair's meeting of 23 July, there were no further collective recorded discussions within the UK Government about the UK's Iraq strategy before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David on 7 September.

585. From the end of July 2002 until Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David, Mr Blair and Mr Straw were attempting to persuade the US Administration to secure multilateral support before taking action on Iraq.

586. By late August, the UK was proposing coercion of Iraq to disarm by means of a UN resolution issuing an ultimatum to Iraq to admit the weapons inspectors. In the event that Saddam Hussein refused, or subsequently obstructed, the inspectors, the UK was seeking a commitment from the Security Council to take action.

587. The UK Government's first objective was to offer Iraq the opportunity and a last chance to comply with its obligations and avoid military action. In the event of Iraq not taking that opportunity, the UK was also seeking to establish conditions whereby military action (should it become necessary) would command multilateral support and be taken with the authority of the Security Council.

588. In his public statements, Mr Blair clearly presented the strategy as providing a final opportunity for Saddam Hussein to disarm peacefully.

589. Reflecting the level of public debate and concern, Mr Blair decided in early September that an explanation of why action to deal with Iraq was needed should be published. That led to the publication of the Iraq dossier on 24 September. He also considered debate on the issue was sufficiently important for both Houses of Parliament to be recalled from recess.

590. As a result of Mr Blair's initiative and the subsequent bilateral discussions involving Mr Blair, Sir David Manning and Mr Straw, the US Administration was left in no doubt that the UK Government needed the issue of Iraq to be taken back to the Security Council before it would be able to participate in military action in Iraq.

591. The UK's arguments complemented and reinforced the arguments being made within the US Administration, particularly by Secretary Powell, that the US should not act alone.

592. The UK was a key ally whose support was highly desirable for the US.

593. That and the force of UK diplomacy undoubtedly made a significant contribution to President Bush's decision in the meeting of the National Security Council on 7 September to take the issue of Iraq back to the UN.

594. The objective of the subsequent discussions between President Bush and Mr Blair at Camp David was, as Mr Blair stated in the press conference before the discussions, to work out the strategy.

595. Although at that stage no decision had been taken on which military package might be offered to the US for planning purposes, Mr Blair also told President Bush that, if it came to war, the UK would take a significant military role.

596. When President Bush made his speech on 12 September, the US and UK had agreed the broad approach but not the substance of the proposals to be put to the UN Security Council, nor the tactics.

597. Statements made by China, France and Russia in the General Assembly debate after President Bush's speech highlighted the different positions of the five Permanent Members of the Security Council, in particular about the role of the Council in deciding whether military action was justified. The UK also recognised the danger that the US might seek to set the bar for Iraq so high that a new resolution might not be agreed by the Security Council.

598. Those tensions meant the negotiation of resolution 1441 was complex and difficult. That is addressed in Section 3.5.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the negotiation of resolution 1441 following President Bush's speech to the United Nations (UN) General Assembly on 12 September, including the provision of legal advice, and the unanimous adoption of the resolution by the Security Council on 8 November

2. There were a number of other key developments during this period which are addressed elsewhere in the Report:

- The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessments of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capabilities and Iraq's intentions for their use are set out in Section 4. The production of the Iraq dossier, published on 24 September 2002, and the presentation of its contents to Parliament are addressed in Section 4.2. The subsequent assessments of Iraq's actions, including its attitude towards the return of weapons inspectors, are addressed in Section 4.3.
- The development of options for a possible UK contribution to a US-led military invasion of Iraq, and the decision on 31 October to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes, are addressed in Section 6.1.
- UK planning for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq is addressed in Section 6.4.

3. The discussion within the UK Government after the adoption of resolution 1441 about the legal effect of the resolution, and Lord Goldsmith's advice on that issue and the legal basis for military action in Iraq, are addressed in Section 5.

Key findings

- The declared objective of the US and UK was to obtain international support within the framework of the UN for a strategy of coercive diplomacy for the disarmament of Iraq. For the UK, regime change was a means to achieve disarmament, not an objective in its own right.
- The negotiation of resolution 1441 reflected a broad consensus in the UN Security Council on the need to achieve the disarmament of Iraq.
- To secure consensus in the Security Council despite the different positions of the US and France and Russia, resolution 1441 was a compromise containing drafting "fixes".
- That created deliberate ambiguities on a number of key issues including: the level of non-compliance with resolution 1441 which would constitute a material breach; by whom that determination would be made; and whether there would be a second resolution explicitly authorising the use of force.

US/UK discussion of a draft resolution

4. The US and UK were in agreement about the objective of securing a UN resolution demanding that Iraq should permit the immediate and unconditional return of weapons inspectors and setting out the consequences of non-compliance.

5. At the beginning of the negotiations, however, there were significant differences between the US and the UK about the detailed content of a UN resolution and the approach to negotiations with China, France and Russia, the other Permanent Members, and with the wider Security Council.

6. The debate between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) and No.10 on the objectives and terms for a new Security Council resolution on Iraq, between the end of July and President Bush's speech to the United Nations (UN) General Assembly on 12 September, are addressed in Section 3.4.

7. Initial discussion within the UK, and between the UK and US, about the terms of a draft resolution revolved around seven key issues:

- the need for a UN determination that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations;
- whether the demands for Iraq to comply should be limited to WMD (weapons of mass destruction) or address Iraq's wider failures to meet the obligations specified in UN resolutions since 1991;
- the nature of the ultimatum to Iraq on WMD and whether that should demand an immediate Iraqi declaration of its WMD holdings, and/or the return of weapons inspectors;
- whether to seek more intrusive and quicker inspections than those specified in resolution 1284 (1999);
- whether to seek explicit agreement to the use of "all necessary means" in the event of Iraqi non-compliance, which would provide explicit authority for military action;
- when the UN route would be deemed exhausted and the role of the Security Council in determining the seriousness of any reported Iraqi breach and in authorising the use of force; and
- whether to seek one resolution which met all the objectives or to adopt a two stage approach.

8. Resolution 1284 establishing the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), to replace the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM), was adopted on 17 December 1999, with China, France, Russia and Malaysia all abstaining.[1]

---

[1] UN Security Council resolution 1284 (1999).

The timetable for inspections and the position of UNMOVIC in September 2002 is set out in the Box below.

Resolution 1284 (1999) and action to establish UNMOVIC

In March 1999, the panel chaired by Mr Celso Amorim, the Brazilian Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, which was tasked to provide a "comprehensive review" of UN approaches to Iraq, reported that "although important elements still have to be resolved, the bulk of Iraq's proscribed weapons programs has been eliminated".[2] Nonetheless, some inspections-based monitoring was needed to prevent rearmament.

The timetable set out in resolution 1284 for UNMOVIC and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to start work and report to the Security Council on Iraq's position resolution envisaged the inspectors would:

- "draw up, for approval by the Council, a work programme" not later than 60 days after they started work in Iraq;
- report "immediately when the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification is fully operational in Iraq";
- 120 days after that, report on whether "Iraq has co-operated in all respects with UNMOVIC and the IAEA in particular in fulfilling the work programmes in all the aspects to suspend sanctions".[3]

The resolution also stated that:

- The 120 days would be renewable, subject to the "elaboration of effective financial and other operational measures" to ensure that Iraq did not acquire prohibited items.
- Should the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC or the Director General of the IAEA report that Iraq was not co-operating in all respects, sanctions could be renewed.
- The IAEA would remain responsible for nuclear inspections and certification.

As Section 1.1 shows, the resolution was a compromise. Iraq was not required to demonstrate full compliance, just co-operation; and co-operation was not clearly defined. In addition, there was no certainty of a definitive end to sanctions. For this reason Iraq did not accept resolution 1284. It apparently hoped that sanctions would be suspended or at least eroded without it having to do much.

The decision to establish a new organisation to replace UNSCOM reflected allegations that it had not been impartial and had been used by western intelligence agencies to spy on Iraq. The intelligence agencies of member states could supply information to any new body but could not expect to receive any in return. Intelligence traffic would only be one-way. Inspectors were to be recruited independently and work directly for the UN, following UN standards and rules on impartiality and professionalism, rather than be loaned to the Commission by Member States. UNMOVIC was to be controlled by a College of Commissioners.

UNMOVIC was funded from Oil-for-Food (OFF) revenue.

[2] UN Security Council, 30 March 1999, 'Letter dated 27 March 1999, from the Chairman of the panels established pursuant to the note by the President of the Security Council of 30 January 1999 (S/1999/100) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1999/356).
[3] UN Security Council resolution 1284 (1999).

Dr Hans Blix was appointed as Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC on 27 January 2000.

A junior member of the UK permanent Mission to the UN in New York met Dr Blix on 12 September 2002 for a confidential conversation to explore:

- how long it would take UNMOVIC to establish a presence in Iraq;
- how long it would take to be "up and running";
- how often it would be realistic for UNMOVIC to report on progress; and
- what its priorities would be for reinforcing inspections.[4]

The official reported that the practical arrangements for the return of inspectors would be crucial and would need to be agreed before their deployment. Discussions on the arrangements should take place outside Iraq, but once agreed an advance party from UNMOVIC could be in Iraq in a week. UNMOVIC would prefer to have three months to build up its presence before it "started work as set out in resolution 1284", but it "could just about manage two months".

The 60 days to draw up a work programme was "doable if Iraq co-operated" but that deadline could slip; the report would need to be shown to Iraq and approved by the College of Commissioners. Some inspections could take place within that period; that would be an early test of Iraqi compliance. There was nothing to stop Iraq providing UNMOVIC with the backlog of its biannual declarations on WMD. Depending on the co-operation it received, UNMOVIC could be "fully operational at the same time as it presented the work programme".

The official noted that UNMOVIC already produced quarterly reports and a report every month was likely to be "too frequent". Regular reports could help to put pressure on Iraq and could be used to highlight non-co-operation.

Dr Blix had received a suggestion that UNMOVIC be asked to report to the Council immediately if Iraq was not co-operating positively. He did not underestimate the difficulties of annulling the modalities governing access to sensitive sites and had advised that the Security Council could usefully reaffirm existing rights. Asking UNMOVIC to put forward suggestions to strengthen inspections would put its independence in doubt.

9. In preparation for a meeting with Mr Blair and following initial discussions in New York, Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, set out his thinking on the UK's approach to the negotiation of a new UN resolution on 14 September.

10. Mr Straw advised that the UK's objective should be a more intrusive inspections regime. If Saddam Hussein complied, that would achieve the UK's WMD objectives.

11. Mr Straw advocated that the UK and the US should seek only one resolution; and that it should incorporate both a demand for the return of inspectors and a tougher inspections regime. That would maximise pressure on Iraq to comply and avoid giving France and Russia a veto over military action.

---

[4] Minute FCO [junior official] to HMA [UKMIS New York], 12 September 2002, 'Iraq: Meeting with Blix'.

12. Reporting a conversation with Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, at a reception given by President Bush on 12 September, Mr Straw wrote that he had rehearsed his concerns about a two resolution strategy, "not least because it was being pushed … by those who wanted a veto on military action and who wanted to avoid hard choices".[5] They had also discussed the possibility of seeking an Iraqi "declaration" of its WMD programmes. While that might create "something to do" while UNMOVIC got its teams into place, Mr Straw had said he thought it could be a "very dangerous proposal". Saddam Hussein "would be very likely to respond with a massively detailed document to split the five Permanent Members of the Security Council (the P5) and international public opinion and buy more time".

13. Following his discussions in New York and in preparation for a meeting with Mr Blair on 17 September, Mr Straw sent a minute to Mr Blair setting out a proposed strategy for "achieving our objectives through the UN".[6]

14. Summarising his views, Mr Straw advised that the UK should:

- deliver a more intrusive inspection regime which, if Saddam complies, achieves our WMD objectives;
- demand Iraqi actions not words, within tight deadlines;
- get all we need into a first resolution, without either committing ourselves [to] or ruling out a second [resolution];
- persuade President Bush to commit to the heavy lifting necessary to secure Russian acquiescence, while we take the lead with the French;
- be prepared to run the resolution ourselves if the US agree, since we are better placed to deliver in the Security Council."

15. Mr Straw wrote that President Bush's speech on 12 September had "transformed the politics of the issue, at least in the short term", which "gives us a huge opportunity". He added that achieving the objectives would be a "highly complex process" which would require Mr Blair's intervention at "crucial moments", and that:

> "US views will carry a lot of weight. But as on many issues, they will need our advice and tactical judgement to get what they need out of the Security Council."

16. Mr Straw reported that he had been assured that President Bush was "serious about trying intrusive inspections as a means to achieve Iraqi WMD disarmament". There were, however, differences of view within the US Administration. Mr Straw was concerned that there were voices suggesting that any resolution should be loaded "with impossible demands to ensure the inspectors never get deployed, and to create the earliest pretext for military action".

---

[5] Letter Straw to Manning, 13 September 2002, 'Iraq'.
[6] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 14 September 2002, 'Iraq: Pursuing the UN Route'.

17. Mr Straw was also concerned that others in the Security Council wanted an approach which would "make it politically impossible to take military action". It would be "crucial to avoid both traps".

18. Addressing the substance of the issues, Mr Straw wrote that "our own emerging thinking and that of the US is converging" and the US and UK should seek a resolution which:

- determined that Iraq had been and was "now in material breach of a … series of obligations to the Security Council". That was "designed to provide the necessary legal cover";
- demanded "unfettered access for inspectors, with clear deadlines as a first test of Iraqi acceptance and a more intrusive mandate"; and
- included "some provisions on what happens if Iraq fails to comply with the specific requirements", but "falling short of authorising 'all necessary measures'". Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, judged that was "simply a non-starter" with China, France and Russia.

19. Mr Straw provided "an illustrative draft" resolution, which reflected initial discussions with the US but had not been shown to them.

20. The draft included elements from each of the options offered by the FCO on 6 September (see Section 3.4). Mr Straw identified a number of issues that would require political judgements:

- The advantages and disadvantages of the US proposal to challenge Iraq to produce a full declaration of its WMD holdings very quickly. Mr Straw thought that was "a bad idea" and that there were "better ways of setting early deadlines".
- How much tougher an agreed inspection regime could be without making demands which would not be agreed by either the members of the Security Council or Iraq. The US was "thinking of a provision which would allow [Dr] Blix to decide what further access he needed to achieve his mandate". That "would mean jettisoning previously agreed special arrangements (like exemption of palaces etc)". That "would be difficult to negotiate" and Mr Straw did not want Iraq to reject the resolution because it "could be said to move the goalposts"; but he favoured trying the approach.
- How clear the resolution could be about the consequences in the event of non-compliance. That would be "the hardest-fought point in the Security Council". As "all necessary measures" looked "unnegotiable", and the US would "adamantly oppose a requirement" for a further resolution, the current US preference was "to stipulate that any failure to comply with the provisions of the resolution would constitute a further material breach and that Iraq would be responsible for the serious consequences of that". Mr Straw took the view that, while the negotiations should "start tough": "The final result will almost certainly be less explicit."

21. Addressing the tactics, Mr Straw wrote that the P5 lunch the previous day had, in the words of Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, been "a good start on securing a consensus".

22. Mr Straw added that France's approach of two resolutions was "attractive to some precisely because it postpones any hard choices and gives Russia and France a veto on military action. I think it a very dangerous idea." It would postpone hard choices and give other members of the P5 a veto over military action.

23. Mr Straw had argued to his Ministerial colleagues that "the tougher and more complete the first resolution, the greater the chance of Iraqi compliance. Paradoxically … [a] two resolution approach would make the use of force more likely, because Iraq would view it as weak."

24. Mr Straw wrote that he and Secretary Powell both believed that "we should get a long way down the road of agreeing the strategy in capitals" with the P5 before putting any draft text into the Council. They envisaged that, after intensive discussions, the US and UK would be "in a position to table proposals in the Security Council early in the week of 23 September". He also suggested that there might be tactical advantages in the UK tabling the resolution.

25. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and the Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), sent the minute to Mr Blair with his own comments on a number of points:

- Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, would not accept the use of the phrase all necessary measures "at this stage".
- A declaration did not need to precede inspections: it could be pursued in parallel.
- The UK dossier was "designed to show how unsatisfactory absolving palaces from inspections has proved".
- Mr Straw's view that the negotiations should start tough but the consequences in the event of non-compliance would be less explicit than agreement to "all necessary measures" looked "right."[7]

26. The UK was concerned to avoid US proposals for a comprehensive Iraqi declaration being used to provide the basis for military action before the return of inspectors.

[7] Manuscript comments Manning to Prime Minister on Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 14 September 2002, 'Iraq: Pursuing the UN Route'.

27. US and UK officials discussed draft resolutions on 15 and 16 September. Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, reported that the main differences between them were; a US demand for comprehensive declarations and making failure to comply with that a "casus belli"; detailed proposals for unfettered access for inspectors; and "the 'all necessary means' issue".[8]

28. Sir David Manning discussed developments with Dr Rice on 16 September.[9] He stated that the position was "very much better … than … eight weeks ago"; and that Mr Blair was "pleased that the issue was now focused in the UN, where the early signs suggested the debate was going well". Saudi Arabia had announced that they would permit overflights if there was a resolution authorising action.

29. Sir David Manning reported that he had told Dr Rice:

- The UK would consider two resolutions, one dealing with Iraq's WMD and one dealing with other aspects of the Iraqi problem, including the restoration of Kuwaiti property.
- The UK was still considering whether to demand that Saddam Hussein should make a "Declaration about his WMD stocks". There would be a discussion between Mr Blair and Mr Straw the following day.
- Mr Blair would be "sympathetic" to the need for an effective and intrusive inspections regime and the measures to ensure that, such as protection for UNMOVIC and the role of P5 representatives.
- On the question of whether to seek "all necessary means" or accepting language specifying "serious consequences", there was the option of falling back on the Kosovo model (taking independent action if ultimately the UN route failed). It was the right way forward.

30. The US and UK Missions to the UN in New York produced a draft "composite resolution" on 16 September, which Mr Straw and Sir Jeremy Greenstock discussed with Secretary Powell later that day.[10]

31. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that he had discussed the possibility of an Iraqi letter agreeing to unconditional access for inspectors with Mr Kofi Annan, Secretary-General of the UN, "three times in the last 14 hours". Mr Annan had made it clear to Iraq that there would be a new resolution and there was nothing it could do to stop it.

32. Mr Straw thought that "overall the argument was going well". Egypt and other countries were complaining about where an objective of regime change left them, but: "Saddam Hussein had a choice, either complying with SCRs [Security Council resolutions] and surviving; or failing to comply and his regime ending up being changed as a consequence of the international community enforcing compliance."

33. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that the US was looking for a serious response from Iraq to a required declaration. If it was not serious, "Saddam would clearly be playing games and that should be considered a casus belli". The US wanted something which it could measure, and "to assess Iraqi seriousness before they got rolling on inspectors". In his view, Mr Blair and President Bush "needed to talk about the role of a declaration: there was still some uncertainty in the Administration about what the UK wanted/could live with".

34. Mr Straw replied he "feared" a declaration "could be a trap for us, not Saddam", and "a real chance that Saddam would deliver a Rolls Royce reply in order to 'scatter his enemies' … [A] full, final and complete declaration could only be done with the inspectors." A declaration could be folded into the process in a different way. The US and UK should focus on the return of the inspectors and ask for a declaration after practical arrangements had been agreed but before the inspectors arrived.

35. Asked what would happen if the declaration was inadequate, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that the Security Council could say the "inspectors would check the points over which there was disagreement".

36. Secretary Powell said that "his hunch" was that Iraq would be forthcoming:

> "They would send something which matched what we knew. In that case we could say we had a 'serious basis' for inspectors … If, on the other hand, the Iraqis gave something thin, there would be no point sending inspectors …"

37. Mr Straw thought that Iraq would calibrate its response to satisfy France and Russia: "We preferred the test to rely less on subjective judgement". Mr Blair had "been consistent in giving prominence to the importance of inspections since the Crawford meeting in April. A declaration would be a diversion from our long-standing position."

38. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell agreed that there were "no real differences" between the US and UK on the conditions for the inspectors' return and the modalities for their operations.

39. Sir Jeremy Greenstock asked "how fierce the US wanted to be over 'all necessary means'". Sir David Manning's conversations with Dr Rice seemed to indicate this was "not an absolute requirement" for President Bush. The US should talk to Russia before putting it to the Security Council. If the US and UK tried and failed to get Security Council agreement to inclusion of the phrase, "we would be further back than if we had not tried at all".

40. Secretary Powell assessed that Mr Vladimir Putin, the Russian President, "wanted to be on this train" and we could get him "to sign up to most anything". He reminded Mr Straw that "the US was going to deliver the French".

41. In relation to the preparation of the UK dossier, Secretary Powell said "he was laying less stress on (disputable) dossiers and more on the fact that Saddam had (indisputably) violated SCRs for the last 11 years".

42. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell also discussed whether to produce two resolutions. Mr Straw "pointed out that … would both fulfil President Bush's promise and help Villepin [Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister] off a hook". The UK preference was for a second resolution, addressing other problems with Iraq including terrorism, to be tabled later "so as not to blur the focus on WMD".

43. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell were reported to have agreed that "we will only get a peaceful resolution if we prepare for war".

44. Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, sent a separate letter to Sir David Manning reporting that, at the end of the discussion, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell had had a private word to discuss US uncertainty about Mr Blair's position on the proposal for a comprehensive declaration.[11] Mr McDonald advised Sir David that Mr Straw had concluded "we need to incorporate a declaration within our approach but not in such a way that it can be used as a casus belli".

45. Mr Straw also discussed possible resolutions with Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, including whether, if Baghdad offered to allow the inspectors to resume their work, a new resolution would be needed.[12]

46. Mr Ivanov warned Mr Straw not to repeat the actions of Operation Desert Fox (in December 1998) or Kosovo (in 1999).

47. In parallel with negotiations on the content of the UN resolution, preparations to publish the Iraq dossier continued.

48. Mr Blair saw the purpose of the dossier as making the case for the return of inspectors with a tough regime.

49. In a note to No.10 officials covering a range of issues on 15 September, Mr Blair wrote:

> "The dossier is crucial. The expectations must be right. Remember the case we need to make is for the return of a tough inspection regime, not that he is about to launch a strike. In my view, advice to me from the JIC is sufficiently persuasive. We also need to decide what we can show key politicians here and in the EU; early sharing of the info. will go down well and show willing."[13]

Iraq's agreement to the return of inspectors

50. Iraq informed Mr Annan on 16 September that it had decided to allow the return of inspectors and that it was ready to discuss the practical arrangements with the UN.

51. A subsequent letter from Saddam Hussein made clear that Iraq still saw agreement on those arrangements as part of a wider discussion reflecting Iraq's rights under the UN Charter and the need to address all the obligations of both Iraq and other Member States in relevant Security Council resolutions, not just Iraq's disarmament obligations.

52. Saddam Hussein declared that Iraq was "totally clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons"; and challenged President Bush's "insinuation" that Iraq was linked to the attacks on 9/11 and international terrorism.

53. In a meeting with Foreign Ministers of the League of Arab States on 14 September, Mr Annan sought their support for the return of inspectors to Iraq as a means to strengthen peace and stability in the region and to avoid another major conflict.[14] He also raised the issue in a meeting with Mr Amre Moussa, the Secretary General of the League of Arab States, and Dr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister, later that day.

54. Dr Sabri wrote to Mr Annan on 16 September to inform him that, following the series of talks between Iraq and the UN in New York and Vienna between March and July 2002 and the latest round in New York on 14-15 September, Iraq had decided "to allow the return of United Nations inspectors to Iraq without conditions".

55. Dr Sabri stated that, in taking the decision, the Government of Iraq was responding to the appeals of Mr Annan, Mr Moussa and those of "Arab, Islamic and other friendly countries". The decision was based on Iraq's "desire to complete the implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions and to remove any doubts that Iraq still possesses weapons of mass destruction".

56. Responding to the points in Mr Annan's statement to the General Assembly on 12 September, the Dr Sabri stated that the decision was:

> "… the indispensable first step towards an assurance that Iraq no longer possesses weapons of mass destruction and equally important, towards a comprehensive solution that includes the lifting of sanctions … and the timely implementation of other provisions of the relevant … resolutions. To this end … Iraq is ready to discuss the practical arrangements necessary for the immediate resumption of inspections."[15]

57. Mr Annan sent the letter to the President of the Security Council, asking him to bring it to the attention of the Council.[16]

58. Mr Blair and Mr Straw agreed that they should secure as much of the elements required as possible in a first resolution, keeping an open mind on whether to seek two resolutions as the US would not at that stage accept a two stage approach.

59. Sir David Manning discussed the Iraqi initiative with Dr Rice in the early hours of 17 September.

60. Sir David reported to Mr Blair that he had told Dr Rice Mr Blair's position was that "the UN must be a facilitator for Iraqi disarmament".[17] The UK would "continue to express scepticism about Saddam's intentions, given his capacity for games playing". Sir David stated he was sure Mr Blair would "continue to insist on a very tough resolution" demanding the return of inspectors and Iraq's full and immediate compliance with its terms. The UK would argue that "the new resolution was as important as ever in establishing the criteria for future Iraqi behaviour, and the benchmark for measuring it".

61. Sir David and Dr Rice had agreed to speak again later that day.

62. Mr Blair discussed the "state of play on the Iraq UNSCR(s)[UN Security Council resolutions]" with Mr Straw and Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 17 September.[18] Mr Jonathan Powell (Mr Blair's Chief of Staff), Sir David Manning, Mr Alastair Campbell (Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy), and Baroness Morgan (Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations), were also present.

63. The record of the meeting listed its conclusions as:

- "The UK should continue to press, quickly, for a new resolution
  - (a) describing Saddam [Hussein] as in 'material breach' of his obligations,
  - (b) setting out the demand … to allow unconditional UNMOVIC entry, and
  - (c) using the strongest language the Security Council … would bear on the consequences in the event of non-compliance …"
- The UK should "seek to secure in the first resolution as much as possible of the wording required, using the argument that the tougher the resolution, the less likely military action would become"; and "keep an open mind on whether a second resolution would be required, ruling it neither in nor out. It would be too much for the US to accept two resolutions now."

[18] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 17 September 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting with Foreign Secretary and Sir Jeremy Greenstock, 17 September'.

- The "proposed declaration of Iraq's WMD should be an update rather than a final and complete declaration … [pursued] in parallel with the return of inspectors, not delay the inspectors' return".
- "Publicly" the UK should "describe [Iraq's] offer of accepting inspectors as a tactical ploy, exactly as we had expected. We suspected that he [Saddam Hussein] had absolutely no intention of complying with all UN demands. It showed [the] tough approach was working. We must maintain the pressure. The inspection regime must be tough and able to do its job."
- Mr Blair would speak to President Putin "in concert with" President Bush's call.
- The UK "should keep in close touch with Blix, so that the resolution took account of his practical considerations". He would "have to be very tough with the Iraqis".

64. The record of the meeting was sent to the Ministry of Defence (MOD), Cabinet Office, the Private Secretary to Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS)), and to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Sir Christopher Meyer (British Ambassador to the US), Sir John Holmes (British Ambassador to France) and Sir Roderic Lyne (British Ambassador to the Russian Federation).

65. Sir David Manning subsequently informed Dr Rice of the conclusions of Mr Blair's meeting.[19]

66. The record of that conversation shows differences of view on the advantages and disadvantages of demanding a comprehensive Iraqi declaration; whether the resolution should address non-WMD issues; and the details of a new inspection regime.

67. Sir David and Dr Rice agreed that the purpose of the resolution was to dismantle Saddam Hussein's WMD, not to get the inspectors back into Iraq: "The inspections were a means to this end, not an end in themselves." They also discussed the risk that the inspectors would find nothing. Sir David said he thought "we were likely to find evidence, even though Saddam would have been busily hiding and disguising his stocks of WMD".

68. Sir David and Dr Rice agreed that Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Ambassador John Negroponte, US Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, should be asked for "their expert advice on next steps about content and handling".

69. Reporting a statement by Mr Straw, the FCO informed the UK Permanent Mission in New York that: "We see no advantage in an early UNSC [UN Security Council] debate on the Iraqi offer … But we accept that pressure for Council discussion may be irresistible."[20]

[20] Telegram 535 FCO London to UKMIS New York, 17 September 2002, 'Iraq: Letter Accepting Weapons Inspectors'.

70. The key points of the UK position were:

"
- … scepticism. Iraq has a long history of playing games. The … offer comes only four days after Iraq rejected inspections;
- Not clear what, exactly, the Iraqi letter amounts to …
- Note Iraqi reference to discussion of practical arrangements for inspections. Iraq must not be allowed to drag this process out. A new UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] would need to address this point …
- Offer does not make clear that Iraq has accepted our basic demand, namely to grant inspectors immediate access to any site, building, records, personnel at any time of UNMOVIC's choosing …
- We must keep up the pressure on Iraq. Their latest offer has only come because the international community has demonstrated its determination to stand firm. We must continue to do so.
- We must, therefore, work for a new UNSC resolution …
- History tells us that we cannot trust Saddam's word. This time, our goal is to ensure that he complies with UNSC demands."

71. Mr Blair and President Bush decided to continue to pursue a new Security Council resolution.

72. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the position on 18 September.[21]

73. Mr Blair said that they should stick to the strategy. A resolution was needed and the inspectors must be allowed in to do their job properly. Mr Blair was sceptical about whether Saddam would comply: "It was obvious that Saddam would play games. He had only made his offer on inspections … because he felt under pressure." The pressure would need to be continued.

74. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the need for a new inspections regime that was unconditional and unrestricted. Mr Blair's view was that:

> "This time we must be clear that obstruction would mean military action. This had to be a disarmament process. There could be no mindset of accepting conditions …"

75. Mr Blair stated that, in relation to the overall strategy, Saddam Hussein was "trying to drag us into a negotiation", and that the UN route provided the means to deprive him of the argument that the US would attack him whatever he did. Mr Blair said that disarmament "would occur, either through inspections or military action" and that the "choice was Saddam's". In Mr Blair's view, the Iraqi regime "could crack with the arrival of inspectors". Keeping up the public pressure would give the international community "no option but to support us".

[21] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 18 September 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with President Bush, 18 September'.

76. Iraq welcomed the US decision to act through the UN while emphasising that Iraq's "inalienable rights" should be met and members of the Security Council should meet their obligations.

77. A letter from Saddam Hussein stated that Iraq was "totally clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons" and would accept inspections to "achieve, with transparency the goal of making sure Iraq no longer possesses … weapons of mass destruction".

78. In his speech to the UN General Assembly on 19 September, Dr Sabri offered Iraq's "condolences to the American people, especially the families of the victims" of the 11 September 2001 attacks.[22]

79. Dr Sabri expressed "sincere gratitude" to states and organisations which had rejected US threats against Iraq and called for "a comprehensive political solution to the impasse in the relationship between Iraq and the Security Council". The Iraqi Government's decision "to allow the return of UN weapons inspectors without conditions as a first step towards a comprehensive solution" that included "the lifting of sanctions imposed on Iraq and the timely implementation of other provisions of relevant Security Council resolutions", was a response to the appeals of Mr Annan and others.

80. Dr Sabri told the Security Council that he had been instructed by Saddam Hussein to convey excerpts from his letter to the General Assembly, which presented "Iraq's position on the latest developments in the relationship between Iraq and the Security Council".

81. Saddam Hussein welcomed the US decision "for the first time since the end of the cold war" to put one of its problems to the General Assembly "after years of disregard of the weight, effect and opinion of others". But the letter was critical of American actions on Iraq and its support for Israel. It described President Bush's speech on 12 September as presenting "extreme distortions of the so-called nuclear, biological, and chemical threats" posed by Iraq:

> "… so as to make American citizens believe the deliberate insinuation that Iraq was linked to the American people's tragedy of September 11."

82. Saddam Hussein's letter set out Iraq's views on US actions and statements, including:

> "So, after utilizing the American propaganda machine for a long time and spouting official statements full of lies, distortion, and falsehood, the focus was basically turned on inciting the American public against Iraq and pushing it to believe the United States Administration's schemes of aggression as a fait accompli as if it were the solution or the necessary rescue that would allow American citizens to live in security and stability after what they had gone through in the 11 September events."

83. Saddam Hussein stated that when the US Administration had realised the necessity to have:

"… international cover for using force and that the world did not believe the lies it tried to propagate to link Iraq to the September events, it changed the issue and began to shed crocodile tears about international law and the necessity to comply with the resolutions of international legitimacy, alleging that Iraq is not complying with the Security Council resolutions, especially with regard to … inspectors. This implied that Iraq had the intention to develop or already possesses nuclear, chemical and biological weapons …"

84. Iraq "might give those weapons to terrorist organizations that pose a threat to world security".

85. After complaining about the "intelligence and espionage" activities of weapons inspectors in the past and accusing the US of "acting on behalf of Zionism" and wanting "to destroy Iraq in order to control Middle East oil, and consequently control the politics as well as the oil and economic policies of the whole world", Saddam Hussein stated that Iraq "was, and still is ready to co-operate with the Security Council and international organizations". But it rejected "anyone's transgression of its rights, sovereignty, security and independence".

86. Iraq had "not rejected the relevant resolutions", even though they were "unjust and at odds with the United Nations Charter and international law". It called on members of the Security Council to meet their obligations, and demanded that Iraq's "inalienable rights" should be met.

87. Saddam Hussein declared that Iraq was "totally clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons" and offered to receive "any scientific experts accompanied by politicians" who wished to see "places and scientific and industrial installations" alleged to "contain prohibited materials or activities". He also stated that Iraq had "accepted the return of inspections teams … taking into consideration the arrangements that should safeguard" the principles that Iraq's rights, sovereignty and security should be respected. That would "achieve, with transparency, the goal of making sure that Iraq no longer possesses nuclear, biological and chemical weapons of mass destruction".

88. Saddam Hussein stated that Iraq had been:

"… keen to see the issue discussed between the Security Council and Iraq, through the United Nations Secretary-General and the representatives of Iraq, with a view to reaching a balanced formula, based on the principles of the Charter and the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, within a comprehensive solution which should bring to an end the cyclone of American accusations and fabricated crises against Iraq. At the same time, this would reassure Iraq with regard to its security, sovereignty, territorial integrity and its right to choose its own way without interference, in accordance with … the [UN] Charter …"

Discussion of US draft of 20 September 2002

89. Intensive discussions about the approach to be adopted continued.

90. Some elements of the US proposals continued to present difficulties.

91. Sir David Manning explicitly warned Dr Rice that the UK was not in the business of manufacturing a casus belli.

92. Intensive discussions between the US and UK continued over the next three days. As well as discussions between officials in New York and Washington, there were frequent telephone calls between No.10 and the White House.

93. Mr Straw also spoke to Secretary Powell.[23]

94. Mr Straw spoke to Mr Dominique de Villepin.[24]

95. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, spoke to the Élysée.[25]

96. In addition to the points set out in the preceding paragraphs, other issues which emerged during the discussions were:

- Re-writing or going beyond resolution 1284 (1999) would open up "Pandora's box".
- Whether to seek to interview Iraqi citizens outside Iraq.
- Saddam Hussein could not impose conditions on UNMOVIC operations.
- Disarmament would occur either through inspection or military action.
- There was a good chance that Iraq would now make mistakes.
- Avoiding Saddam Hussein spinning out the process so that military action could not be launched and completed before summer 2003.
- The importance of demonstrating a firm position and unity in the Security Council.

97. Following two conversations with Dr Rice on 19 September, Sir David Manning recorded that Mr Blair:

> "… accepts that we should bid high … with a view to being negotiated down to the sort of resolution … we really want. He is content for us to work for specific mention of disarmament in the resolution. He is also content for us to work for a compromise on the question of an Iraqi declaration in parallel with preparations for the inspectors' return. He is ready, too, to agree to a formulation that stipulates that UNMOVIC's inspection regime must be settled in consultation with the Security Council; and that we should load this section of the resolution with demands on force protection for regional bases, participation by the P5 etc., in the knowledge that we shall have to jettison some of this under pressure from the Russians and French. He has, however, confirmed that he is not willing to allow references to terrorism to detract from the force of a resolution. This remains a firm UK red line."[26]

98. In advance of a planned visit to Moscow on 10 and 11 October, Mr Blair spoke to President Putin on 19 September.[27]

99. Mr Blair said that the US decision to take the issue of Iraq to the UN was a significant and welcome step, but in the light of Iraq's letter of 16 September:

> "… we must hold to our original position: unconditional access for inspectors, backed by a strong resolution. It was only under pressure that Saddam would move further. So we had to keep the pressure up."

100. President Putin had agreed that firm action was needed and that we must not lose time or give Saddam Hussein a breathing space. As a result of pressure, including from Russia, Saddam Hussein had yielded to an ultimatum. It would be wrong to engage in a debate about a new resolution until we had seen how the inspectors got on. President Putin would think further about what Mr Blair had said, and they had agreed that it would be vital to keep together. There would be further discussions between officials, including a briefing in London on Iraq's WMD capability.

101. The US produced a draft resolution late on 20 September.

102. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice on 21 September that the draft was "very difficult" for the UK.[28] The risk was that it would be interpreted as a pretext for very early military action and the UK was:

> "… not in the business of manufacturing a casus belli. Only if we were seen to have tried genuinely to make a success of the inspection route would we be able to secure support for other action if Saddam blocked us."

[28] Letter Manning to McDonald, 21 September 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

103. With President Bush, Mr Blair emphasised the need for the inspectors to return to test Saddam Hussein's intentions.

104. On 21 September, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the difficulties if the resolution was too weak and Saddam Hussein outwitted the inspectors so that when they returned they found nothing.[29] They also discussed the need for the draft resolution to be divided into two: a strong resolution concentrating on WMD – the toughest regime possible – and a second on non-disarmament issues.

105. Mr Blair argued that if Saddam Hussein "messed about with the inspectors, we must be ready to pull them out and take the appropriate steps. This was not going to be a re-run of UNSCOM." It was likely that "Saddam would get up to his old tricks pretty quickly". But "for the moment we must insist that we wanted to make inspections work so that we could disarm Saddam".

106. Mr Blair agreed the need for a quick resolution and the rapid return of inspectors. They could not wait for another year for the inspectors to do their work.

107. Mr Campbell recorded that Mr Blair had had to "work on" President Bush in a conversation that had lasted 30 minutes because the US was "going down an impossible road again, basically a route that was unsellable". No.10 was "worried that Rumsfeld [Mr Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense] and Cheney [Mr Dick Cheney, US Vice President] were pushing for the idea that we get in conditions that we know Iraq could not meet".[30]

108. The record of the discussion between President Bush and Mr Blair on 21 September (and records of other discussions) confirms those comments.[31]

109. Mr Blair and Mr Straw eventually agreed on 23 September that the time had come to test the negotiability of the US position with France and Russia. They also agreed a negotiating strategy which asked for more than the UK thought could be agreed.

110. Mr Blair and Mr Straw discussed the content of the revised draft resolution on 23 September.[32] They agreed that there were dangers with a proposal for a full, final and complete declaration of Iraq's capabilities but the time had come to test its negotiability with France and Russia.

111. Mr Blair agreed that Mr Straw should tell Secretary Powell that, while he understood the US anxieties about whether the UN would deal effectively with the Iraqi threat, the strategic decision that this was a better course than unilateral action was right. It would be "important to show that we were serious about allowing the UN to do its business".

112. Following that meeting, Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that Mr Blair and Mr Straw were "pleased that the new draft resolution focused on the destruction of Iraq's WMD, and the regime that would govern UNMOVIC inspections. This was the right place to be but there was one area of the draft in particular that continued to give us serious difficulties."[33] That was the stipulation that Iraq must make a declaration of its holdings within 15 days of the passage of the resolution. He and Dr Rice had discussed the issues many times, including the likely response of other Security Council members. They discussed the language on that point and in the final operative paragraphs [OPs] and the regime for inspections.

113. Reporting the discussions Sir David Manning wrote that he had been assured that the resolution was not a "trigger" for military action and that he had told Dr Rice that he expected the discussions on the resolution to be difficult:

> "They would be particularly resistant to the reference in OP10 to '… authorises Member States to use all necessary means'. We were very unlikely to get this, even though we should press it to see how the other Security Council members reacted. Condi agreed. She said that the Administration was privately prepared to concede this and settle for something like 'serious consequences'."

114. Sir David concluded that the UK had "done as much as we can in the last 48 hours to get the resolution into something approaching a plausible shape". The UK would now have to wait to see the reactions to the draft.

Agreement to offer UK military forces to the US for planning purposes

115. On 20 September, the MOD sought Mr Blair's agreement to offer Package 3 as a "possible add-on" to the US "for planning purposes".

116. In parallel with the discussions on a new UN resolution, military planning continued although knowledge was kept to a very tight group of people and the sensitivities about potential leaks remained.

117. In response to a minute from Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head of OD Sec (Foreign Policy), primarily about military planning which Mr Drummond had classified 'Confidential', Sir David Manning commented: "Please ensure all minuting is Secret and Personal – and keep circulation to [the] barest minimum."[34]

118. Mr Peter Watkins, Principal Private Secretary to Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, wrote to Sir David Manning on 20 September, advising that two issues needed quickly to be addressed:

- what potential UK force contribution should be presented to a US planning conference the following week; and
- whether to replace army units already allocated to Operation FRESCO, the plan for the Armed Forces to provide cover in the event of a firefighters' strike, so that they would be available if a land force contribution was approved.[35]

119. The MOD proposed that the air and maritime package, with Special Forces (Package 2), should be presented as a potential UK contribution at the US Central Command (CENTCOM) planning conference; and that further work was under way on whether the UK might also offer a Commando Group of around 1,700 Royal Marines for early operations in southern Iraq, although further work would be needed to establish whether that could be sustained in parallel with ground operations in northern Iraq.

120. The MOD had also considered the provision of a divisional headquarters together with an armoured brigade to operate with the US (Package 3). That would be "more complicated", but the Chiefs of Staff regarded it as the "minimum sensible" ground contribution to operations in the North. It would entail a commitment of around 28,000 service personnel in addition to the 13,000 in Package 2, and the call-out of around 6,000 reservists.

121. Mr Watkins told Sir David that Mr Hoon felt it would be "premature" to offer a ground contribution on the same basis as Package 2:

> "… we should indicate to CENTCOM that we are still considering this option and that they should model two plans in parallel, one including the UK land force contribution and one without it."

122. Mr Blair and Sir David Manning had reservations about the viability and costs of the MOD proposal.

123. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that:

> "The possibility that the military could make a land contribution in the North is a surprise. Until recently we were being told that covering the firemen's strike (Operation FRESCO) would make this impossible. Now, suddenly it isn't. The (militarily mouth-watering) prospect of being given tactical leadership of the campaign in the North … may have something to do with this volte face."[36]

[35] Letter Watkins to Manning, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq: Potential UK Contribution to Any Military Action'.
[36] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 22 September 2002, 'Iraq: Possible UK Military Contribution'.

124. Sir David advised Mr Blair to register "extreme caution" and to address a number of questions; in particular how this was suddenly possible, the Turkish angle, and whether the UK could sustain the numbers and, if so, for how long.

125. Mr Blair commented: "As discussed. Be careful of this Land idea …"[37]

126. In a meeting with Mr Hoon on 23 September, Mr Blair agreed limited contingency preparations for a land option, but asked for publicity to be minimised.

127. Following the discussion, the MOD informed the US that the UK was still considering a land option.

128. That was not the No.10 understanding of what had been agreed.

129. In the context of the many issues which were being addressed on 23 September 2002,[38] the Inquiry has seen no evidence to indicate that the difference of view about what Mr Blair and Mr Hoon had agreed was anything other than a genuine misunderstanding.

130. Mr Blair discussed the issues with Mr Hoon on 23 September.

131. Following that meeting, Mr Watkins informed officials in the MOD that:

> "The Prime Minister is content for us to proceed broadly as set out in my letter of 20 September. The Prime Minister remains very cautious about the viability of Package 3, not least because of its implications for our ability to meet other contingencies and the significant cost premium entailed. In the light of this, Mr Hoon believes that it is all the more necessary heavily to caveat this possibility in contacts with the US. We should emphasise that it is at the limits of what we could offer and that – because of other potential demands on our Armed Forces including FRESCO – we cannot be sure that we could deliver it. The US must therefore examine carefully how they would plan the campaign in the absence of such a contribution."[39]

132. The packages that might be offered to the US were to be conveyed in terms cleared with Mr Hoon's Private Office.

133. When the Chiefs of Staff discussed Iraq planning on 25 September, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff, emphasised that:

> "… expectation management with respect to UK caveats had to be taut. Package 2 … was a formidable contribution in its own right and Package 3, given its importance to the US, was not just a 'nice to have'."[40]

134. Sir David Manning's record of the meeting on 23 September, issued on 25 September, stated that Mr Blair had agreed that "we should present Package 2 as a potential contribution at the CENTCOM Planning Conference".[41] "We should not be shy about presenting this as a significant and valuable offer." Units for Op FRESCO should be re-allocated to maintain the possibility of a Land Force contribution, with minimum publicity. Mr Blair did not, however, want "any suggestion" that the UK might offer "a major land contribution to a Force in northern Iraq. We should not surface the possibility at the [US] Planning conference."

135. By that time, the MOD had already acted. Mr Hoon's Private Office replied to No.10 immediately, stating:

> "Separately and heavily caveated, we have indicated to CENTCOM that we are still considering a Land option … [W]e agreed that the UK involvement … should continue on this basis. Defence staffs will continue actively to ensure that US expectations remain realistic."[42]

136. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Jonathan Powell: "Just about OK" and referred to being "bounced" by the MOD.[43]

Publication of the Iraq dossier

Cabinet, 23 September 2002

137. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 23 September that the dossier "would show that the policy of containment had worked up to a point" but Saddam Hussein "continued to rebuild" his weapons of mass destruction.

138. Cabinet was informed that the question of military action would arise "only if inspections were thwarted again"; and "there would be a discussion about the military options".

139. Mr Blair concluded that a "crunch point" had been reached with the sanctions regime being eroded and Saddam Hussein "on the way to acquiring new capability in weapons of mass destruction". Iraq "had to comply" with its obligations to the UN.

140. The record of the meeting held by Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), at 1pm on 20 September (see Section 4.2) stated that copies of the dossier would be made available for Cabinet on 23 September.[44]

141. Cabinet met at 5pm on 23 September. The minutes record only brief updates by Mr Blair and Mr Straw.[45]

142. Opening the discussion, Mr Blair told his colleagues that:

> "… the dossier on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction would show that the policy of containment had worked up to a point, but that Saddam Hussein … continued to rebuild his programme to acquire such weapons. The evidence showed his efforts to procure equipment and materials, and to restore production facilities. This was an issue for the United Nations, with whose Security Council resolutions Iraq had not complied. A new resolution was being negotiated."

143. Mr Blair added:

> "It was the threat of military action which had caused Saddam Hussein recently to invite United Nations inspectors back into Iraq. Only if inspections were thwarted again would the question of military action arise. Meanwhile, pressure had to be maintained … We were not at the point of authorising military action now."

144. Mr Blair stated:

> "In presenting the case to Parliament … he intended also to stress our commitment to rebuilding Afghanistan and making progress towards solving the Israel/Palestine problem."

145. Mr Straw told Cabinet that "the climate of opinion had changed". Since President Bush's speech to the UN on 12 September:

> "Responsibility for dealing with Iraq's non-compliance had been placed with the United Nations. To achieve a peaceful outcome a tightly worded Security Council resolution was required and maximum support, including for the threat of the use of force."

146. Mr Straw added that "the nature of the motion to be put before Parliament if military action became necessary would require consideration".

[44] Minute [Cabinet Office] to Rycroft and others, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq Dossier: Public Handling and Briefing'.
[45] Cabinet Conclusions, 23 September 2002.

147. In discussion a number of points were made:

- "the accusation of double standards, particularly in respect of dealing with Israel, would be made, but the … development of weapons of mass destruction by Saddam Hussein presented a quite different order of threat";
- "facing the United Nations with its responsibility for dealing with Iraq provided an opportunity" for the UN "to achieve success". Iraq's "defiance of the international community needed a firm response";
- "promotion of multilateral action through the United Nations and our respect for international law" gave the UK's stance "political legitimacy";
- "in the event of military action a clear vision was required of the outcome we wanted in reconstructing Iraq: this would be a major task";
- "the proportionality of any military action would have to balance the safety of UK forces with the avoidance of civilian casualties";
- the impact on Muslim opinion in the UK "would need to be managed to preserve community cohesion";
- the UK had "a clear role to play in overcoming a tendency in the United States towards unilateralism and in Europe towards anti-Americanism";
- "the Middle East needed political impetus, as did other international problems …"
- "the international community had to build confidence in democratic values and address the causes of terrorism"; and
- "solidarity and resolution backed by the threat of force" would be needed "to achieve a peaceful outcome".

148. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said that a "crunch point" had been reached:

> "The sanctions regime … was being eroded and Saddam Hussein was on the way to acquiring new capability in weapons of mass destruction. Iraq had to comply with the obligations placed on it by the United Nations. A tough line was required. If military action was required, the job could be done. There would be a discussion about the military options … civilian casualties should be kept to a minimum, but there could be no doubt that the main beneficiaries of the removal of Saddam Hussein would be the Iraqi people. Iraq was basically a wealthy country. The international community had to be committed to Iraq's reconstruction. Progress also had to be made in the Middle East which he had stressed in his contacts with the United States Administration."

149. Mr Blair concluded that the UK had to engage with Muslim countries. It also had to "deal with weapons of mass destruction elsewhere as a growing threat to peace and security".

150. Cabinet "Took note".

151. Cabinet was not told about the difficulties in reaching agreement on the content of a UN resolution.

152. Cabinet recognised that the strategy being pursued would lead to the use of military force if Saddam Hussein failed to disarm, but it was not asked to address the strategy or to endorse any decision.

153. Mr Campbell wrote that:

- Mr Blair had explained that the dossier "brought together accumulated evidence about Iraq's attempts to build WMD, part historical, part intelligence-based" – "not saying that he [Saddam Hussein] was about to launch an attack on London, but we were saying there was an attempt to build a WMD programme in a significant way". Mr Blair had "made clear we were still focused on the UNSCR route and if he doesn't comply there will have to be international military action", and that Saddam Hussein would not comply "unless he thinks the threat is real".
- Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister and Deputy Leader of the Labour Party, had said that the Cabinet was "in this together" and Mr Blair had "done a brilliant job of moving the US down the UN route and we should stick with him and stick together".
- Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had made "a few long-term points for the US, the need to think through post-Saddam, the importance of the MEPP [Middle East Peace Process]".
- Ms Patricia Hewitt, the Trade and Industry Secretary, had suggested that the Attorney General should come to Cabinet to explain the legal position.
- Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, has said that "if we are going to have collective responsibility we should have a collective decision"; there was "no doubt that Saddam was dedicated to possessing WMD but re the UN there's a double standard vis-a-vis Israel".
- Mr Blair had said "he believed it would be folly for Britain to go against the US on a fundamental policy" and that he "really believed in getting rid of bad people like Saddam".
- Mr Hoon had said "the ultimate objective was disarmament and that the weapons inspectors are a means to an end. The clearer we are that we would use force, the likelier it may be that we don't have to." On "why now?", Mr Hoon had said Saddam's record, his use of WMD and the continued development.
- Mr Blair had argued that the US could become unilateralist or it could "be part of a wider agenda on Africa, MEPP, Afghanistan".[46]

154. Mr Campbell commented:

> "It was a pretty good discussion, though focused as much as anything on the idea that we were having to deal with a mad America and TB [Mr Blair] keeping them on the straight and narrow. JP [John Prescott] referred to the idea that TB would have sleepless nights, that we knew it could go to a difficult choice between the US and the UN."

155. Mr Campbell added that the discussion had been "serious and sober and hard-headed and TB was in control of all the arguments": "Funnily enough, I think TB won the Cabinet over more easily than the public."

156. In his memoir published after the conflict, Mr Robin Cook, Leader of the House of Commons, June 2001 to March 2003, wrote that only he and Ms Short had "openly questioned the wisdom of military action".[47] Ms Short had concluded that it was an unjust war. Mr Cook wrote that for him "the most difficult question was 'Why now?'. What had happened in the past year to make Saddam Hussein more of an imminent danger than he has been any year in the past decade?" Mr Hoon's attempt to answer that question by reference to the attack on 11 September 2001 had, in Mr Cook's view, "only served to confirm the difficulty of the question" as "no one has a shred of evidence that Saddam Hussein was involved" in that attack.

157. Mr Cook wrote that he had closed his contribution:

> "… by stressing the vital importance of getting approval for anything we do through the UN. 'What follows after Saddam will be the mother of all nation building projects. We shouldn't attempt it on our own – if we want the rest of the international community with us at the end, we need them in at the start.'"

158. Mr Cook also wrote that in summing up the meeting, Mr Blair had:

> "… put rather more stress on the US than the UN. 'To carry on being engaged with the US is vital. The voices on both the left and right who want to pull Europe and the US apart would have a disastrous consequence if they succeeded.'"

159. Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary from September 2002 to September 2005, described Cabinet on 23 September as an "important meeting"; the members:

> "… weren't simply listening … They were actually applying their political judgement and – for the most part supportively, in the direction that the Prime Minister wanted.
>
> "… the only dissension was Robin Cook … Everyone else accepted … that containment wasn't working and he was the one person to say he thought it was, and I am sorry he isn't around to take the credit for that …"[48]

[47] Cook R. The Point of Departure. Simon & Schuster UK Ltd, 2003.
[48] Public hearing, 13 January 2010, page 49.

160. Asked if Mr Cook thought containment was working and could be defended and sustained, Lord Turnbull replied:

> "Yes, but what the Prime Minister was saying was it wasn't working, it couldn't be sustained and we couldn't take the risk that he [Saddam Hussein] would use this period to come back at someone."
>
> "… there is a slight implication in the way you put that they were just getting a nice interesting briefing. What was interesting about these occasions was – and it happens quite rarely – virtually everybody spoke."[49]

161. Lord Turnbull also stated that Mr Cook had said: "You are overestimating the extent to which containment has been eroded."[50]

162. Lord Boateng, Chief Secretary to the Treasury in September 2002, told the Inquiry that Cabinet in September 2002 was a "critical discussion". His sense was that the UK was not, at that point, set on a particular course; it was:

> "… engaged in a process, where there was strenuous diplomatic activity in order to bring Saddam Hussein to the table, that we were engaged in a process where diplomacy was obviously the preferred route and considerable activity in the UN and in capitals around that …"[51]

163. Asked whether there had been a debate about different scenarios and different possible courses, Lord Boateng replied:

> "… there was certainly a discussion around different scenarios that came up in the way in which we addressed these issues in Cabinet …
> "… in the September meeting, where, as you know, we were about to publish the dossier, there was about to be a report to Parliament and there was a discussion around that and it was a full discussion and, in the course of that, colleagues made various contributions and various scenarios surfaced. Did we come together at that meeting in September and say 'These are the options, what are we going to go for?' It wasn't that sort of discussion …
> "What we did have was a full discussion around the issues as they were reported to us by those … who were obviously most closely involved, and you never got a sense that debate and discussion were being curtailed, but you also got a sense – and indeed it was the case – that there were those who were most intimately involved on a day-to-day basis because it fell within their areas of responsibility and competence and that they clearly were having the sort of debate and discussion that you have referred to."[52]

164. Asked if, given his estimation that Saddam Hussein was unlikely to back down, Cabinet understood that beyond the UN route lay the possibility of military action, Mr Blair said he had been saying that at every Prime Minister's Questions, and the Cabinet was fully behind the UN route.[53] He added that there were two groups in Cabinet:

"One group would have been absolutely with me all the way. The other group were saying: 'Well … we understand it's a big problem, but let us try to avoid military action if we possibly can and the United Nations route is a good way of doing that.'

"All of us knew that at some point there was going to be a moment of truth … where you had to decide are you seeing it through or are you not …"

165. In response to a series of questions about when he sought Cabinet endorsement for the policy and whether Cabinet was aware that preparations for military action were under way and that it was taking collective responsibility for the policy, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

"… the policy was totally clear. The policy was that we were going to deal with this issue. Our preference is to deal with it through the United Nations but not dealing with it is not an option."[54]

166. Mr Blair added:

- "Of course they were taking collective responsibility for the policy because it was being outlined the entire time. They know you can't simply decide one day …"
- "I would have been astonished if they didn't [know that military preparations were under way] because there was discussion of that."
- "I don't think anybody was in any doubt about the course they were on."
- "… that does not mean to say that there were not some who were saying 'I wish we weren't on this course', but it really does defy common sense and logic, let alone the discussion, to think that there were people in the Cabinet who didn't know … that we were on a course where the principles of it were absolutely clear. Go down the UN route, get an ultimatum. If he fails to meet the ultimatum we are going to be with America on military action … my public comments at the time. I set it out with crystal clarity at the time. That was our position. It was a position … I was under a certain amount of criticism for having, but the Cabinet were completely aware of the fact that's what we were on."[55]

Parliamentary debates, 24 September 2002

167. Both Houses of Parliament were recalled from recess on 24 September 2002 to debate the case for effective action in respect of the threat posed by Iraq.

168. When he sought the recall of Parliament, Mr Blair wrote that: "Parliament must and will be at the heart of the national debate on the issue of Iraq and weapons of mass destruction"; and that he envisaged a statement from himself followed by "a one-day debate on the Adjournment", led by Mr Straw.[56]

169. The dossier, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction – The Assessment of the British Government, was published on 24 September 2002 (see Section 4.2).[57]

170. The Foreword to the dossier written by Mr Blair set out the Government's position that "the inspectors must be allowed back to do their job properly". If Saddam Hussein refused or "made it impossible for them to do their job" then "the international community will have to act".

MR BLAIR'S STATEMENT, 24 SEPTEMBER 2002

171. Mr Blair stated that the dossier had been produced to explain the Government's concerns to the British people.

172. The accuracy of the information in the dossier and some of the comments made by Mr Blair in its Foreword and in his statement to Parliament are addressed in Section 4.2.

173. Mr Blair's statement to Parliament on the publication of the dossier on 24 September and the subsequent questions and answers lasted for 90 minutes.[58]

174. Mr Blair began by thanking the Speaker for recalling Parliament "to debate the best way to deal with the issue of the present leadership of Iraq and weapons of mass destruction" and described the dossier as "detailing the history of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme, its breach of United Nations resolutions and its attempts to rebuild that illegal programme".

175. Addressing the problems encountered by the inspectors, Mr Blair placed the issues being addressed firmly in the context of:

> "… an 11-year history … of UN will flouted, of lies told by Saddam about the existence of his chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and of obstruction, defiance and denial.

> "There is one common, consistent theme … the total determination of Saddam to maintain that programme; to risk war, international ostracism, sanctions and the isolation of the Iraqi economy …"

176. Addressing the question of why Saddam Hussein had decided in mid-September, but not before, to permit the weapons inspectors, Mr Blair stated that the answer was in the dossier, and it was because:

> "… his chemical, biological and nuclear programme is not an historic left-over from 1998. The inspectors are not needed to clean up the old remains. His weapons of mass destruction programme is active, detailed and growing. The policy of containment is not working. The weapons of mass destruction programme is not shut down; it is up and running now."

177. Mr Blair stated that the dossier disclosing the intelligence assessments provided by the JIC had been produced because it was "important to explain our concerns about Saddam to the British people". The "intelligence picture" painted by the JIC "had been accumulated over the last four years" and was:

> "… extensive, detailed and authoritative. It concludes that Iraq has chemical and biological weapons, that Saddam has continued to produce them, that he has existing and active military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons which could be activated within 45 minutes, including against his own Shia population, and that he is actively trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability."

178. Addressing the content of the dossier, Mr Blair told Parliament that:

- As well as the chemical agents and pre-cursor chemicals, growth media for anthrax and special munitions for the delivery of chemical and biological agents which were "missing and unaccounted for" in 1998, Iraq continued "to produce chemical weapons; has rebuilt previously destroyed production plants across Iraq; has brought dual use chemical facilities; has retained key personnel … and has a serious ongoing research programme into weapons production, all of it well funded".
- "… production of biological agents has continued; facilities formerly used for biological agents have been rebuilt; equipment has been purchased for such a programme; and again Saddam Hussein has retained the personnel who worked on it prior to 1991. In particular, the UN inspection regime discovered that Iraq was trying to acquire mobile biological weapons facilities … Present intelligence confirms that it has now got such facilities." The UK believed Iraq could produce anthrax, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and ricin, which "all eventually result in excruciatingly painful death".
- Saddam Hussein's previous nuclear programme had been "shut down by the inspectors" and "known remaining stocks of uranium" were "held under supervision" by the IAEA. Key personnel who used to work on the nuclear weapons programme were "back in harness". Saddam Hussein had also:

- "bought or was attempting to buy" items that could have a use in a nuclear programme; and
- "been trying to buy significant quantities of uranium from Africa, although we do not know whether he has been successful".

- Iraq's ballistic missile programme was required for the delivery of its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and "a significant number of longer-range missiles were effectively concealed from the previous inspectors and remain, including up to 20 extended-range SCUD missiles". In mid-2001 there had been a step change in the programme; "development of weapons with a range of more than 1,000km was well under way; and … hundreds of people are employed in that programme". The capability being developed was "for multi-purpose use, including with WMD warheads".

179. Mr Blair stated that: "In addition, we have well founded intelligence to tell us that Saddam Hussein sees his WMD programme as vital to his survival and as a demonstration of his power and influence in the region."

180. Mr Blair added:

> "There will be some who dismiss all this. Intelligence is not always right. For some of the material, there might be innocent explanations. There will be others who say rightly that … it could be several years before Saddam acquires a usable nuclear weapon – though if he were able to purchase fissile material … it would be only a year or two."

181. In the light of the information he had set out, Mr Blair asked whether the world would be wise to trust to the "good faith of the current Iraqi regime". Mr Blair added:

> "Our case is simply this: not that we take military action come what may, but that the case for ensuring Iraqi disarmament, as the UN itself has stipulated, is overwhelming. I defy anyone, on the basis of this evidence, to say that that is an unreasonable demand for the international community to make when, after all, it is only the same demand that we have made for 11 years and that Saddam has rejected."

182. Mr Blair posed, and addressed, three questions: '"Why Saddam?"; "Why now?"; and "Why should Britain care?".

183. On the question "Why Saddam?", Mr Blair said two things about Saddam Hussein stood out: "He had used these weapons in Iraq" and thousands had died, and he had used them during the war with Iran "in which one million people died"; and the regime had "no moderate elements to appeal to".

184. On the question "Why now?'", Mr Blair stated:

"I agree I cannot say that this month or next, even this year or next, Saddam will use his weapons. But I can say that if the international community, having made the call for his disarmament, now, at this moment, at the point of decision, shrugs its shoulders and walks away, he will draw the conclusion dictators faced with a weakening will always draw: that the international community will talk but not act, will use diplomacy but not force. We know, again from our history, that diplomacy not backed by the threat of force has never worked with dictators and never will.

"If we take this course and if we refuse to implement the will of the international community, Saddam will carry on, his efforts will intensify, his confidence will grow and, at some point in the future not too distant, the threat will turn into reality. The threat therefore is not imagined. The history of Saddam and weapons of mass destruction is not American or British propaganda. The history and the present threat are real."

185. Mr Blair said that Britain should care:

"Because there is no way this man, in this region … could begin a conflict using such weapons and the consequences not engulf the whole world, including this country. That … is the reason the UN passed its resolutions. That is why it is right that the UN Security Council again makes its will and its unity clear and lays down a strong new UN resolution and mandate. Then Saddam will have the choice: comply willingly or be forced to comply. That is why alongside the diplomacy, there must be genuine preparedness and planning to take action if diplomacy fails.

"Let me be plain about our purpose. Of course there is no doubt that Iraq, the region and the whole world would be better off without Saddam. Iraq deserves to be led by someone who can abide by international law, not a murderous dictator; by someone who can bring Iraq back into the international community where it belongs, not … languishing as a pariah; by someone who can make the country rich and successful, not impoverished by Saddam's personal greed; and by someone who can lead a government more representative of the country as a whole while maintaining absolutely Iraq's territorial integrity.

"We have no quarrel with the Iraqi people. Indeed, liberated from Saddam they could make Iraq prosperous and a force for good in the Middle East. So the ending of this regime would be the cause of regret for no one other than Saddam. But our purpose is disarmament. No one wants military conflict. The whole purpose of putting this before the UN is to demonstrate the united determination of the international community to resolve this in the way it should have been resolved years ago: through a proper process of disarmament under the UN. Disarmament of all weapons of mass destruction is the demand. One way or another it must be acceded to."

186. Mr Blair also set out the UK's commitment, following regime change in Afghanistan, to "stick with" the Afghan people "until the job of reconstruction" was done. He highlighted the need for "a firm commitment to action and a massive mobilisation of energy" to get the Middle East Peace Process moving again, to address resentment in the Arab world that the international community was not pursuing that issue with the same vigour as addressing the threat from Saddam Hussein.

187. Mr Blair's statement concluded:

> "Finally, there are many acts of this drama still to be played out. I have always said that Parliament should be kept in touch with all developments, in particular those that would lead us to military action. That remains the case, and to those who doubt it I say: look at Kosovo and Afghanistan. We proceeded with care, with full debate in this House, and when we took military action, we did so as a last resort. We shall act in the same way now, but I hope we can do so secure in the knowledge that should Saddam continue to defy the will of the international community, this House, as it has in our history so many times before, will not shrink from doing what is necessary and what is right."

188. Mr Blair's statement was followed by questions from the Leaders of both the main Opposition parties and 24 other MPs.

189. Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, said the "key question" was whether Saddam Hussein had "the means, the mentality and the motive to pose a threat to Britain's national security and the wider international order". Mr Duncan Smith concluded that Saddam Hussein had the means and mentality. He stated:

> "The evidence produced in the Government's report shows clearly that Iraq is still pursuing its weapons of mass destruction programme …
> "The … dossier confirms that Iraq is self sufficient in biological weapons and that the Iraqi military is ready to deploy those, and chemical weapons, at some 45 minutes' notice."

190. Addressing whether Saddam Hussein had the motive to strike against Britain, Mr Duncan Smith stated:

> "… I believe that it is fair to assume that he has …
> "The report shows that Saddam has illegally retained at least 20 Al Hussein missiles, with a range of 650km, capable of carrying the various warheads that he needs, and that he is also developing new ones."

191. Mr Duncan Smith also asked a number of questions, including whether a new Security Council resolution would be needed to take military action. He concluded it was "time to act" and: "The matter is now in Saddam Hussein's hands."

192. Mr Blair responded that:

- There was a need for the new UN Security Council resolution to be "absolutely clear and unambiguous about what is expected from Saddam and about what will follow if he does not comply".
- The UK would "always act in accordance with international law".

193. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, stated that legitimate questions had not been "adequately answered" either by Mr Blair's statement or the dossier, including the role of the House of Commons and "the overriding supremacy of the United Nations". In his view, the "notion of regime change" was "ill-defined" and would "set a dangerous precedent". The UK also had to be "clear about the possible consequences", including the "longer-term need for a rehabilitation strategy".

194. Mr Kennedy asked:

> "Does the Prime Minister truly believe that, on the evidence published today, a sufficient case has now been made that both clarifies Iraq's present capacity, as well as its intent?"

195. Mr Blair responded:

> "… yes I do believe the information we published today shows that there is a continuing chemical and biological weapons programme, and an attempt by Saddam Hussein to acquire a nuclear weapons capability. That is what I believe, and that is the assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee – and frankly I prefer its assessment to the assessment of the Iraqi regime, which, let us say, on the basis of experience, is not one that should carry a lot of credibility."

196. Mr William Hague (Conservative) asked:

> "Does the Prime Minister recollect that, in the half-century history of various states acquiring nuclear capabilities, in almost every case – from the Soviet Union in 1949 to Pakistan in 1998 – their ability to do so had been greatly underestimated and understated by intelligence sources at the time? Estimates today of Iraq taking several years to acquire a nuclear device should be seen in that context … [I]s there not at least a significant risk of the utter catastrophe of Iraq possessing a nuclear device without warning, some time in the next couple of years? In that case, does not the risk of leaving the regime on its course today far outweigh the risk of taking action quite soon?"

197. Mr Blair responded:

> "I entirely agree … For the preparation of the dossier we had a real concern not to exaggerate the intelligence that we had received. For obvious reasons, it is difficult to reflect the credibility of the information, and we rate the credibility of what we have very highly. I say no more than that.

"… I entirely agree that the danger of inaction … far outweighs the danger of action."

198. Mr Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru) asked if Mr Blair had "given the United States any commitment that the United Kingdom would support unilateral action against Iraq".

199. Mr Blair replied that it was:

"… important to recognise that in the event of the UN's will not being complied with we must be prepared to take that action. We are not at the point of decision yet, but no one should be in any doubt that it is important to express very clearly that should the UN's will not be resolved through the weapons inspections and monitoring, it has to be resolved in a different way."

200. Other points made by Mr Blair included:

- There was "no point in the UN taking charge … again unless we are precise and clear about what we expect the Iraqi regime to do".
- A fresh resolution was needed to focus on disarmament and for the "international community to reassert its will very clearly".
- Experience suggested the Americans were "right to be cautious about believing that it [Iraq] intends to comply".
- "In fact, I am sure that the regime does not intend to comply at all, although it may be forced to do so. Therefore, it is important that we make it clear that the pressure is there all the time. The purpose of any new UN resolution should be focused on disarmament because that is where the UN has expressed its will clearly."
- "… it is perfectly natural to look at the history of Saddam Hussein and what he has done and to be sceptical about whether we shall be able to get a weapons inspection regime back in there that will be able to do its job properly."
- "… in my judgement, if we do not deal with the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their retention by highly unstable states, often with dictatorial regimes, then perhaps not this year or next, but in the not too distant future, that problem will explode on to the consciousness of the world. I believe that passionately, which is why, whatever the issues in relation to Iraq … it is important to take a stand now and say that, when we have made determinations on behalf of the international community, we will see them through. If we do not, the message to Saddam and anyone else will be that they can develop these weapons with impunity and that the international community lacks the will to deal with them."
- "I have no doubt that if the weapons inspectors are able to do their job and we are effectively able to disarm Iraq, that will change the whole nature of the regime. Our ability to do so has to depend on the United Nations being prepared to assert its will firmly and to back it by the threat of force, which is the only thing that will work."

- "If we cannot get the UN resolution – I believe that we can – we have to find a way of dealing with this."
- "We should make sure … that the United States and the international community are working to the same agenda, and I believe they are … I believe … very strongly; it is an article of faith with me – the American relationship and our ability to partner America in these difficult issues is of fundamental importance, not just to this country but to the wider world. Those people who want to pull apart the transatlantic relationship … or who can sneer about the American relationship that we have, may get some short-term benefit, but, long-term, that is very dangerous to this country."
- "… the point is that if we know that someone has weapons of mass destruction, if they have used them before and if, as a result, the international community has said they must be disarmed of those weapons, surely the greatest risk is letting them carry on developing those weapons and not doing anything about it."
- "… in the past four or five years the issue of Iraq, weapons inspections and what to do about that regime has come over my desk pretty much week after week … [I]t has been there as an issue the whole time … What we know now from the assessment given by our Joint Intelligence Committee is that the very thing that we feared is the very thing that the Iraqi regime is working on."
- "… the purpose of any action should be the disarmament of Iraq. Whether that involves regime change is in a sense a question for Saddam …"
- "What has happened … is that, whether we like it or not, now is the point of decision …"
- "We have to be clear that the consequences of saying now to Iraq that we are not going to do anything will be really, really serious."
- "… we have to make the decision, and I do not think we can duck the consequences of that decision."

201. Mr Blair did not directly respond to a question from Sir Brian Mawhinney (Conservative) about how long he was prepared to allow the UN to reassert its authority before looking for alternative strategies.

202. Mr Blair concluded that the threat was not that Saddam Hussein was going to launch an attack on the UK "tomorrow":

> "… the threat is that within his own region, or outside it given the missile capability that he is trying to develop, he launches an attack that threatens the stability of that region and then the wider world. All the evidence that we have is that if there is such a conflict in that region, we will not be able to stand apart from it."

203. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had "done the statement pretty much himself".[59]

ADJOURNMENT DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, 24 SEPTEMBER 2002

204. Mr Blair's statement was followed in the House of Commons by a nine-hour debate.

205. In his speech, Mr Straw focused on the risk that, given his past actions, Saddam Hussein might "easily" use weapons of mass destruction in the future and his "deliberate and persistent flouting of the will of the United Nations".

206. Mr Straw stated that only free and unfettered inspections, backed by a Security Council united in its determination to disarm Iraq, offered the prospect of dealing with that threat by peaceful means. The paradox in respect of Iraq was that diplomacy had a chance of success only if it was combined with the clearest possible prospect that force would be used if diplomacy failed.

207. In his speech opening the debate, Mr Straw stated that it was "about the case we make for effective action in respect of the threat posed by Iraq".[60]

208. Mr Straw addressed four issues:

- Is the Iraqi regime the threat that we say it is?
- Are there not other countries that have developed equally dangerous arsenals of weapons of mass destruction?
- Is not the international community guilty of double standards?
- Even if Iraq is the danger that we claim, is the threat of force or its use justified?

209. Before dealing with the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's WMD, Mr Straw said:

> "… I want to detain the House briefly on another aspect of the Iraqi regime – its record on human rights. That record speaks volumes not only about the way in which the regime deals directly with its own people, but with the way in which it would seek to operate in respect of other countries and territories beyond its borders. Taking both the threat from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and its human rights record, Iraq is in a league of its own – uniquely evil and uniquely dangerous.
> "On human rights, no other regime now in power anywhere in the world has Saddam's record for brutality, torture and execution as a routine way of life and as the principal means by which the elite stays in power."

210. In relation to other states which might have amassed stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction and could proliferate those weapons, Mr Straw stated:

> "It is our hard-headed judgement that we can best prevent the use of their weaponry through diplomacy.
> "With Saddam Hussein, the diplomatic route has been constantly and consistently obstructed by his intransigence and duplicity. It has been blocked altogether since December 1998 leaving us no alternative but to consider other options. Iraq not the UN has chosen the path of confrontation."

211. Mr Straw added that Iraq had:

> "… much greater intent to use … [weapons of mass destruction] Saddam's is the only regime in recent history to have used chemical weapons, the only regime to have been declared in breach of the Geneva protocol on chemical weapons and the only regime that sees those weapons of mass destruction as an active tool of regional and internal dominance. As page 19 of the dossier sets out, Saddam is prepared to use these weapons – they are by no means a last resort."

212. Asked why he was convinced that Saddam Hussein would use weapons of mass destruction, except as a suicidal gesture in response to a military invasion when he was desperate and beaten, Mr Straw replied that there was "no need to look in the crystal ball for the reason why". The answer was in Saddam's record: "He has done it once, he has done it twice; he can easily do it again."

213. Addressing the question of whether it would be justifiable to use force to deal with the threat from Iraq, Mr Straw stated:

> "The short answer … is yes, provided force is a last resort and its use is consistent with international law.
>
> "Law … depends for its legitimacy on the values it reflects … But … there will always be some who reject or despise the values on which the law is based. Against them, the law has to be enforced, ultimately by the force of arms. But the force used has to be consistent with the moral and legal framework it seeks to defend."

214. Mr Straw added:

> "The UN declaration of human rights and the UN Charter … recognised that … the ultimate enforcement of the rule of international law had to be by force of arms.
>
> "Diplomacy … should always be tried first, but the paradox of some situations – Iraq is pre-eminently one – is that diplomacy has a chance of success only if it is combined with the clearest possible prospect that force of arms will be used if diplomacy fails … We have used all the diplomatic instruments at the disposal of the United Nations, but, so far, Saddam has rendered them unworkable."

215. Drawing attention to the recent changes in Iraq's position on the admission of inspectors, Mr Straw stated:

"This is a pretence at co-operation, but even this has come about only because Saddam has at last realised that he faces a clear choice …

"Some assert that the policy of containment has worked. My answer is that containment, backed by the potential use of force, was broadly working while the inspectors were able to do their job and the Security Council's resolve remained firm. But all the evidence suggests that Saddam has used the past four years … to break out of his containment and to seek to re-establish his power. Only free and unfettered inspections, backed by a Security Council united in its determination to disarm Iraq, offer the prospect of dealing with the threat by peaceful means."

216. Mr Straw concluded:

"We should all be gravely exercised by the potential use of force … I hope and pray that it will not come to a use of force. It there is military action, any participation … will be strictly in accordance with our obligations in international law, and its purpose would be the disarmament of the Iraqi regime's weapons of mass destruction and an end to its deliberate and persistent flouting of the will of the United Nations.

"The choice is Saddam's … But if Saddam continues to defy the international community … doing nothing – will be much worse …

"We faced difficult choices over Kosovo, Afghanistan and Sierra Leone, but does anyone now say that we should not have taken action in respect of those countries? …

"Abdication of responsibility, and equivocation in the face of evil, led Europe down a desperate path in the late 1930s. From the ashes was born the United Nations … But this international order requires law, and law requires enforcement. That is the issue before us today."

Issues raised in the debate

A wide variety of issues were raised, by MPs of all parties, in the course of the debate, in which 50 backbench MPs spoke. There was a broad consensus about the brutal nature of Saddam Hussein's regime, and the need for inspectors to return to Iraq and complete their task.

The points raised included:

- the level of threat posed by Iraq; and whether that justified military action.
- the importance of a UN resolution for the legal authorisation of military action and the need for compliance with international law;

- whether the real reason for a military conflict was access to oil and oil contracts;
- the desire for a vote in the House of Commons before any commitment of UK forces to Iraq;
- the extent of the UK's influence on the US, and the importance to the UK of maintaining its relationship with the US;
- the implications of Saddam Hussein's human rights record;
- preparations for a post-Saddam Iraq and the need for an "exit strategy";
- implications of a potential conflict for the Middle East as a whole;
- whether the UK had sufficient military manpower for the task, and the protection of those deployed;
- the potential use Diego Garcia;
- Saddam Hussein's willingness to use WMD;
- US and UK roles in supplying arms to Iraq;
- whether the international community should concentrate on Afghanistan where there was still much to do;
- implications of the dossier and of military action for the threat from international terrorism; and
- whether public opinion would support military action.

A number of MPs also protested that the debate should have been held much earlier.

217. In his speech closing the debate, Mr Adam Ingram, the Minister of State for Defence, set out "two critical questions" which Mr Blair and Mr Straw had said had to be addressed:

- Had the threat from Saddam Hussein increased?
- Should action be taken to address that threat and, if so, what action?

218. Mr Ingram stated that the dossier demonstrated:

- There was "significant evidence" that Saddam Hussein had "brazenly flouted" UN resolutions "to which he had agreed to adhere".
- Saddam Hussein had:
  - "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons";
  - "tried covertly to acquire technology and materials that could be used in the production of nuclear weapons";
  - "sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa";
  - "recalled specialists to work on his nuclear programme";
  - "commenced a comprehensive weapons development programme across a range of capabilities to deliver his future and current weapons of mass destruction"; and
  - "already begun to conceal sensitive equipment and documentation in advance of the inspectors' return".

219. Mr Ingram said that there was "unanimity in the House on the brutal nature of Saddam Hussein's regime". In relation to the dossier, he commented:

> "With such evidence, I am surprised that there are hon. Members who continue to argue that Saddam Hussein does not now pose an increased threat both to the stability of the Middle East and on a wider international scale. I fear their opinion is based more on an entrenched position than on a cool analysis of the facts."

220. Mr Ingram concluded that he had:

> "… no doubt that the country at large will recognise why we have to confront this issue … [E]very effort must be made to achieve a diplomatic solution … but … the choice is Saddam's … There is no middle way. The threat has to be removed or it will continue to grow."

221. Mr Michael Martin, Speaker of the House of Commons, described the decision by 64 MPs to vote against a motion to adjourn the House after the debate as demonstrating "the strength of feeling in some quarters of the House on this difficult issue".[61]

222. Mr Cook wrote that he had congratulated Mr Straw on his focus on upholding the UN and commented that he was "thoroughly impaled on the UN route". Mr Cook added that he suspected "some tension between the Foreign Office and Downing Street about the extent to which the UN can be the only route".[62]

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, 24 SEPTEMBER 2002

223. The corresponding debate in the House of Lords also took place on the afternoon of 24 September.[63] It covered much of the same ground as the Commons, including strong support for the UN route and for inspections, questions about legality and what role UK forces might play in military action, concerns about the impact of military action on the Middle East and the need to plan for what would follow in Iraq if Saddam Hussein was removed from power.

224. Closing the debate, Lord Bach said:

> "The inspectors were very useful and they did a wonderful job. But let us not pretend to ourselves that somehow the inspectors managed to achieve all that they wanted. We cannot know all the details of how Saddam Hussein may lash out next time, but one thing is clear and I believe the House is united upon it. Doing nothing now is just not an option."

MR STRAW'S EVIDENCE TO THE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, 25 SEPTEMBER 2002

225. Mr Straw told the Foreign Affairs Committee on 25 September that a new Security Council resolution was desirable but not essential.

226. During his appearance before the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) on 25 September, Mr Straw was asked if existing Security Council resolutions provided a sufficient legal basis for military action without a further resolution.[64]

227. Mr Straw referred to his speech the previous day, adding:

> "It has never been the case that the only basis of international law [for the use of force] is an extant resolution. Sometimes some people think it is and it is actually clear from within the United Nations Charter itself that this is not the case.
>
> "… there are various points in the Charter, which is one of the key bases of international law, where the Charter itself refers to the inherent right of individual members. So as far as this is concerned, the direct answer to your question is no, we do not regard it as absolutely essential that there should be another Security Council resolution. We do regard it as desirable. As to what legal advice we receive if there is not a Security Council resolution, that frankly depends on the circumstances at the time …"

228. Mr Straw added that the UK did "not regard it [existing resolutions] as an inadequate basis" for action, but "a clear, new resolution" was "desirable, not least politically". But there was "ample power" in the existing resolutions and "ample evidence of a material breach".

229. Mr Straw emphasised the extent to which Saddam Hussein's actions "in the last 20 years" posed a unique threat to peace and security.[65] The UK approach in relation to other proliferators was to pursue progress through diplomatic channels for as long as possible, even if progress was slow, but it was impossible to do that with Iraq.

230. When Mr Michael Wood saw the evidence, he reminded Mr Straw that the use of force required express authorisation by the Security Council, which in turn required a further decision from the Council, such as a finding of material breach.[66]

Discussions between the US, the UK, France and Russia

231. Following the agreement between Mr Blair and Mr Straw on 23 September, there were further intensive discussions between the US and the UK in pursuit of agreement on a draft text which the US and UK might co-sponsor. That included further discussions in New York,[67] several telephone calls between Sir David Manning and Dr Rice,[68] advice from Washington,[69] and telephone calls between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell.[70]

232. The UK was adamant that Iraqi non-compliance in relation to the proposed declaration of its holdings should not itself be a trigger for military action:

> "It was essential that inspectors got onto the ground before any irrevocable decisions were made."[71]

233. Mr Blair spoke to Mr Annan after the Parliamentary debates on 24 September, telling him that "a new, strong, clear resolution, focused on disarmament without extraneous issues, was essential".[72] Mr Blair said that it "was a critical moment for the UN and for persuading the US that the UN could deal with these issues". There were concerns that Saddam Hussein would play games and the inspectors would not find any material.

234. Speaking about the Parliamentary debate, Mr Blair stated:

> "People accepted that the threat had to be dealt with. It was important to demonstrate that military action was a last resort."

235. A letter from Mr Straw to Mr Blair on 24 September recorded Sir Jeremy Greenstock's concern that the draft "will not be seen as credible, it will be seen as a pretext".[73]

US/UK draft resolution, 25 September 2002

236. The UK and the US eventually agreed the text of a draft resolution as the basis for discussion with other members of the P5 on 25 September.

237. The detailed text of a draft resolution for discussion with other members of the P5 was finally agreed in a conference call between Mr Straw, Secretary Powell, Dr Rice and officials, including Sir David Manning and Sir Jeremy Greenstock, on 25 September.[74]

238. In the conference call:

- It was agreed to set the timeline for the production of an Iraqi declaration as "prior to the beginning of inspections and not later than 30 days of the date of the resolution".
- Following a discussion of Dr Blix's reservations about interviewing Iraqi officials outside Iraq and concerns that they would be used to seek asylum, Dr Rice stated that conducting interviews outside Iraq was "a red line" for the US.
- It was agreed that the resolution should allow Permanent Members of the Security Council to request representation on the inspection teams. Dr Rice's view was that there was "no need to be sympathetic to Iraqi concerns" that that would be a route for the US and UK to get intelligence for military strikes.
- Dr Rice said that there was no intention to force inspections but the US wanted to "signal that conditions were different". It was "important to have things in the resolution to discard later".
- Reflecting UK concerns about US draft language on provisions for No-Fly or No-Drive Zones, which Mr Straw described as looking like "an attempt to legitimise NFZs" – which was "not necessary for the future and dangerous for the past" – it was agreed that the draft should distinguish zones for the purposes of the resolution from the existing No-Fly Zones.
- Reflecting Sir Jeremy Greenstock's concerns that there were "many things in the text that looked like trip wires", and that it would be "better to judge Iraq by its actions not its words", it was agreed that Iraq should be given a week, not 48 hours, to indicate that it accepted the resolution.
- It was agreed that it would be better to engage Russia and France "at a political level" before the French and Russian Permanent Representatives to the UN "got their hands on the text". As the US and UK got close to agreement, senior officials should be sent to Moscow and Paris "to begin the task of selling the text".

[74] Telegram 498 FCO London to Washington, 25 September 2002, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conference Call with US Administration, 25 September'.

239. The draft resolution focused on WMD.[75] The key elements of the draft and the relevant operative paragraph (OP) are set out in the Box below.

US/UK draft resolution, 25 September 2002

The key elements in the draft resolution agreed by the US and the UK on 25 September 2002 were:

- a decision that Iraq "is still, and has been for a number of years, in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions, including resolution 687 (1991 …)" (OP1);
- a decision that "to begin to comply with its disarmament obligations, the Government of Iraq shall provide … prior to the beginning of inspections and not later than 30 days from the date of this resolution an acceptable and currently accurate, full and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes to develop chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, ballistic missiles and unmanned aerial vehicles …" (OP2);
- detailed provisions setting out an intrusive inspection regime including:
  - interviews outside Iraq;
  - a date to be specified for the resumption of inspections;
  - that members of the P5 could "recommend" sites for inspection and "request" to be represented on inspection teams;
  - UN security forces to protect the inspectors;
  - the right to declare No-Fly and No-Drive Zones "for the purposes of the resolution"; and
  - that Iraq should not "take or threaten hostile acts directed against any representative or personnel of the United Nations or of any member state taking action pursuant to any Security Council resolution" (OPs 3-6);
- a request that the Secretary-General should notify Iraq of the revised procedures for inspections set out in OP5 and a decision that Iraq should accept those and the provisions in OPs 2, 3, 4 and 6 "within 7 days" (OP7);
- a request that all Member States "give full support to UNMOVIC and the IAEA" (OP8);
- a direction to the Executive Director of UNMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA "to report immediately to the Council any interference with or problems with respect to the execution of their mission" (OP9);
- a decision that "false statements or omissions in the declaration submitted by Iraq and failure by Iraq at any time to comply and co-operate fully in accordance with the provisions laid out in this resolution, shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations, and that such breach authorises Member States to use all necessary means to restore international peace and security in the area" (OP10); and
- a decision "to remain seized of the matter" (OP11).

240. Mr Tony Brenton, Chargé d'Affaires at the British Embassy Washington, reported that concerns arising from the vote in the House of Commons the previous day had been a key factor in achieving compromise.[76]

241. President Bush continued to determine the US position.

242. Dr Rice stated in her memoir that during the negotiations, she had "run interference" for the State Department:

> "… taking up practically every controversy directly with the President rather than allowing continued haggling among the various agencies. I know that caused some unhappiness in Defense and within the Office of the Vice President, but the process was taking long enough at the United Nations; we didn't need to slow it down with divisions within our own ranks."[77]

243. Mr Straw wrote in his memoir:

> "It was one thing to have President Bush declare in favour of going to the UN. Turning his twelve words about 'necessary resolutions' into a text that could command a majority in the Security Council, and had teeth, was quite another.
> "The first task was to pin down an acceptable draft. Inevitably parts of the US Government weren't bothered about securing a consensus in the Security Council. If the other members of the Council supported it, fine; if they vetoed it, fine too … The early drafts from the US were unacceptable to us. To resolve this we organised a six-way conference call … We made good progress, but there were still some outstanding issues, which could only be resolved by Tony talking to the President."[78]

244. Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, confirmed that he was satisfied with the arrangements for the exchange of information with FCO Legal Advisers when he and Mr Straw discussed the position on 23 September.

245. A meeting between Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw took place on 23 September.[79]

246. Mr Simon McDonald recorded that:

> "Lord Goldsmith said he admired what the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary had achieved in persuading the US back to the UN route … he would have to see the final shape of any resolution. Too much emphasis on a second resolution would cause him problems (about whether or not the first resolution allowed the use of force …). It seemed to him unarguable that [the threat] of force had got Saddam Hussein to move.

> "Lord Goldsmith stressed the importance of the purpose for which force was used. Although regime change could not be the objective, it could possibly be the means by which an objective was achieved (if the only way to disarm Iraq of its WMD was to change the regime …).
>
> "Lord Goldsmith confirmed that he was satisfied with [the] existing arrangements for the exchange of information with FCO Legal Advisers. The Foreign Secretary stressed that you [Mr Michael Wood, FCO Legal Adviser] had his full authority to talk to Lord Goldsmith."

247. Lord Goldsmith was asked for his advice on the draft US/UK resolution on 24 September. He offered oral views to Mr Wood and Mr Grainger on 27 September.

248. On 24 September, Mr Wood wrote to Ms Cathy Adams, Legal Counsellor in the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, with a copy of the draft resolution which had "now been largely agreed with the US Government".[80] He stated that Lord Goldsmith would be "aware of the context and background".

249. Mr Wood reviewed the provisions of the draft resolution, focusing on the question of whether, if it were not possible to agree the current draft text authorising the use of "all necessary means", the resolution would provide a legal basis for the use of force in the event of a breach which was sufficiently grave to undermine the basis or effective operation of the cease-fire agreed in resolution 687 (1991) "on the ground that it revived the authorisation to use force contained in resolution 678".

250. Mr Wood wrote that the Government had "last relied upon this legal basis" in 1998; and that "The passage of time has not changed the principle". In his view, if a resolution could be achieved which contained "an amended version … with 'serious consequences' language it would be an adequate legal basis for the use of force".

251. Mr Wood qualified that view by reference to advice set out by Mr Grainger in an internal FCO minute, which stated that the military action authorised would be such action as was necessary and proportionate to remedy a particular breach in the circumstances at the time.[81]

252. Mr Wood stated that he "would be grateful for any advice which the Attorney General [might] wish to give on the resolution as currently drafted, or on any of the possible outcomes mentioned".[82]

253. Ms Adams advised Lord Goldsmith that she did not think the letter disclosed any new issues and there was "no particular deadline" for a response. Mr Wood had offered to discuss the issues if Lord Goldsmith wished.[83]

254. Lord Goldsmith met Mr Wood and Mr Grainger on 27 September.[84]

255. There is no record of the meeting but Ms Adams prepared a draft reply to Mr Wood, which did not differ materially from the views expressed in Mr Wood's letter of 24 September. Lord Goldsmith saw it before the meeting, but it was not sent. A manuscript note by Ms Adams recorded that Lord Goldsmith had "indicated agreement with substance" of the draft.[85]

256. In his statement to the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith wrote that he had responded to Mr Wood's request during a meeting on 27 September:

> "I gave him my view of the text and what would be necessary to achieve our objectives in the various different scenarios that he posed. The text at that stage provided that failure by Iraq at any time to comply and co-operate fully with the provisions of the draft resolution would constitute a further material breach and that such a breach authorised member states to use all necessary means to restore international order. I believe I said that if the draft resolution was adopted … it would constitute a clear statement by the Security Council that Member States were authorised to take measures, including the use of force … I believe that I went on to say though that the use of force would have to be directed towards securing compliance with Iraq's disarmament obligations and any force would have to be a necessary and proportionate response to the breach of the resolution."[86]

257. France and Russia immediately raised serious concerns about the approach in the draft resolution and in particular the draft of OP10 and whether it would "trigger" or permit "automatic" military action without a specific decision of the Security Council.

258. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that two resolutions might be needed:

- The primary objective for the first would be "unequivocal powers for inspections and hurdles for Iraq".
- There would be "differing views about what constituted an Iraqi sin of sufficient gravity to trigger a second resolution authorising force".

259. The US and UK began to circulate elements of the draft resolution, which became resolution 1441, to fellow Security Council members on 25 September.[87]

260. Following visits to Paris and Moscow by Mr Ricketts[88] and a conversation between Sir David Manning and Mr Jean-Marc de La Sablière, Diplomatic Adviser to President Chirac,[89] it became clear that France and Russia had serious concerns about the key elements of the draft resolution proposed by the US and UK.

261. A perception that the draft text of OP10 implied automaticity for the use of force was one area of difficulty. As a result, both Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Mr Ricketts began to consider how the UK should react if, as they had predicted, it proved impossible to secure agreement to "all necessary means" in a first resolution.[90]

262. Sir Jeremy advised that there was "a case for not showing too deep a concern about the need to come back to the Council for a decision". In his view, the "primary objective of a first resolution" was to "establish unequivocal powers for the inspectors and hurdles for Iraq".

263. Sir Jeremy wrote that the US and UK should not "walk away" if the first stage failed; that would "almost certainly lead to a critical resolution which we would have to veto". Instead they should "bear with it to a second stage" when:

> "… the chance of persuading the Council to come with us will remain open; and if they eventually do not, we will be seen to have tried harder, our political case … will look more objective, and we shall be less likely … to confront a critical resolution."

264. Sir Jeremy also advised:

> "There will, of course, be differing views about what constitutes an Iraqi sin of sufficient gravity to trigger a second resolution authorising force."

265. Mr Ricketts reported that he had told a US colleague that the UK remained "absolutely firm on the need for an 'all necessary means' authorisation" but it looked as though "we might well not win the argument".[91] While the shared negotiating priority was to take a "hard position" on that point to "line up support for the toughest possible inspection regime", there was a recognition that "we would have to find a middle way between our present position and an explicit two resolution approach". They had agreed work was needed on a formula which would achieve that.

266. Mr Ricketts reported that he had said the UK would consider "a range of formulae which we would pass the Americans very privately". He also drew attention to the likely sensitivities in Washington to a change of approach.

267. Sir David Manning discussed the French and Russian reactions with Dr Rice on 30 September.[92]

268. Sir David reported that he had decided not to get into a detailed discussion about one resolution or two, although he had said that Mr Blair "remained very firm on substance and would want to be convinced that the two resolution route would work".

269. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice also discussed what had happened over Kosovo. Sir David asked for "a note setting out our own views on Kosovo" before he spoke to Dr Rice the next day.

270. Mr Straw discussed French concerns, about "how far a UN resolution should rewrite arrangements for weapons inspections and 'automaticity' of military action", with Mr de Villepin on 30 September.[93]

271. Mr Straw told Mr de Villepin that the "resolution had to be tough enough so Saddam understood this was his last chance"; and that "a peaceful solution was more likely to be found through a strong and clear resolution". The provisions in resolution 1284 were "unsatisfactory, not least on the access to Presidential sites".

272. Mr Straw warned Mr de Villepin that:

> "… we had to ensure that Washington could keep on board those within the Administration who were averse to handling Iraq in the UN. If that required one resolution, France would still have the option of tabling … another if it did not like what the US proposed."

273. In Mr Straw's view, there would be "serious difficulties" without an international consensus. He and Mr de Villepin agreed that should be the aim.

274. In a telegram later that day, Sir John Holmes identified a number of underlying French concerns, including:

- a French conviction that the US were set on a policy of regime change;
- the damage "unilateral(ish) action … would do to the UN's credibility and thus to French influence in the world";
- the "precedents unilateral pre-emptive action could set";
- the "damage it would do to the whole way international relations work";

- the "effects in the region of military action … without reasonable cause and wide international support could be disastrous";
- that "Western, and French, political and economic interests in the Middle East could suffer irreparably"; and
- the impact on Muslims in France and the "potential for further race-related violence".[94]

275. Sir John commented that the UK should:

> "… keep hammering home to the key decision makers [in France] that … a tough resolution now can really avoid military action – indeed it is the only way to do so – and thus avoid the consequences they fear … At the same time we must continue to make the intellectual arguments for action (Why Saddam? Why now? Why does deterrence not work?);
>
> "work … on persuading the French that the Americans:
>
> (a) have a plan capable of quick military success;
> (b) are committed to seeing through the post-military phase of political reconstruction in Iraq;
> (c) have a plan for dealing with the wider repercussions in the region."

276. In a separate telegram, Sir John reported that President Chirac's spokesman had briefed the French press on 27 September about the President's reaction to the UK/US draft text.[95]

277. In a telephone conversation with President Bush, President Chirac had asserted that France "like the majority of the international community" favoured a "two-step approach"; and that France's objective was disarmament of Iraq within the UN framework and therefore the unconditional and immediate return of the inspectors. A simple, firm resolution showing the unity of the Security Council and the international community could help achieve that.

278. Sir John Holmes reported that the spokesman had also said that a telephone call to President Putin the previous day confirmed that France and Russia took the same approach; and that the French spokesman had quoted the Chinese Prime Minister as saying:

> "… if inspections did not take place, and there was no proof of Iraqi WMD and no authority for action from the UN Security Council, there should be no question of launching an attack on Iraq. The consequences of such an attack would be 'incalculable'."

279. Reporting his most recent discussions in New York, Sir Jeremy Greenstock repeated his warning that:

> "Starting publicly with 'all necessary means' and then losing it risks looking like a defeat and undermining any subsequent argument that we have legal cover for military action."[96]

Mr Blair's speech to the Labour Party Conference, 1 October 2002

280. In his speech to the Labour Party Conference on 1 October, Mr Blair briefly set out the arguments for acting in a global partnership, and for the UK to "help shape" the new world through its friendship with the US and its membership of the EU.

281. Mr Blair also stated that in dealing with a dictator, sometimes the only chance for peace was a readiness for war.

282. Mr Blair's speech to the Labour Party Conference on 1 October was mainly about domestic issues, but in his remarks on international relations he focused on:

- The need to build "a new global partnership" that moved "beyond a narrow view of national interest". That was "the antidote to unilateralism".
- The basic values of democracy, freedom, tolerance and justice were shared by the UK, the US and Europe. But they were "human values", not western values and should be used to "build our global partnership" and be applied in an even-handed way.
- Partnership was "statesmanship for the 21st Century".[97]

283. In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair stated:

> "Some say the issue is Iraq. Some say it is the Middle East Peace Process. It is both.
>
> "Some say it's poverty, some say it's terrorism. It's both.
>
> "So the United Nations route. Let us lay down the ultimatum. Let Saddam comply with the will of the UN.
>
> "So far most of you are with me. But here is the hard part. If he doesn't comply, then consider.
>
> "If at this moment having found the collective will to recognise the danger, we lose our collective will to deal with it, then we will destroy not the authority of America or Britain but of the United Nations itself.

[97] BBC News, 1 October 2002, Blair's conference speech in full.

> "Sometimes and in particular dealing with a dictator, the only chance for peace is a readiness for war."

284. Mr Blair also set out his goals for the Middle East Peace Process:

> "By this year's end, we must have revived final status negotiations and they must have explicitly as their aims: an Israeli state free from terror, recognised by the Arab World and a viable Palestinian state based on the boundaries of 1967."

285. Mr Blair added that "to help shape" that new world, the UK needed to be part of it. That meant making the most of both the UK's friendship with the US and its membership of Europe. In five years in government he had learnt that:

- "the radical decision is the right one";
- the "right decision is usually the hardest one"; and
- "the hardest decisions are often the least popular at the time".

The "starting point" was not policy, it was "hope".

286. Public opinion in the US was supportive of President Bush's position.

287. In early October, the US Administration was also negotiating the terms of a bipartisan resolution to be tabled in Congress.

288. Sir Christopher Meyer reported that "the points of disagreement [were] relatively narrow: no one doubts that inspections will fail, the argument is how hard to try for international support for the war that will ensue".[98]

289. A draft circulated by the Chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (Senator Biden) and his Republican counterpart (Senator Lugar) required the President to certify before using force against Iraq that he had attempted to seek UN approval for action, and provided for regular updates to Congress on how far allies were assisting the military effort. It also focused on the WMD threat as the basis for action rather than the wider failings of the Iraqi regime.

290. Sir Christopher reported that the White House was taking an "uncompromising approach" and had rejected that text.

291. Sir Christopher assessed that the Administration was in a strong position, with at least 70 out of 100 votes for military action in the Senate and a Democrat leadership which did not want to fight the November mid-term elections by challenging President Bush on national security.

---

[98] Telegram 1263 Washington to FCO London, 1 October 2002, 'Iraq: US Congressional and Public Opinion'.

292. Recent polls had showed that public support for military action had "eased since mid-September to around 60 percent". That dropped to "40 percent or less" if there was "no UN approval or allied support", but jumped:

> "… into the seventies if action is taken by an international force or with UN backing. Some 50 percent or fewer think that the Bush policy is well thought through, has been fully explained, or sufficiently backed up by evidence, and people want Congress to ask more questions. But while waiting to be convinced, people continue to endorse Bush's leadership, and trust him to get this right by huge margins over the Democrats."

293. The joint resolution was agreed by Congress, and signed by President Bush on 17 October.

Mr Blair's conversations with President Bush, 2 October 2002

294. Mr Straw described getting the inspectors into Iraq to tackle WMD disarmament as his and Mr Blair's "overriding objective".

295. France and Russia's position was that in the event of non-compliance a "second" decision of the Security Council would be required before the use of force would be authorised. In the light of that, Mr Straw advised a two stage approach would be needed for agreement on a first resolution establishing a tough inspections regime and sending a strong signal of the Council's willingness to use force in the event of a clear Iraqi violation.

296. The US and UK might also have to make clear that only a serious violation would trigger further Council action.

297. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that he should try to persuade President Bush to adopt a two resolution approach.

298. In a conversation with Secretary Powell on 1 October, about whether to table OP10 as currently drafted in the Security Council, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that the resolution which had argued against military action in any circumstances, and had been tabled at the Labour Party Conference, had been defeated; but the debate "had confirmed that the Government would be in serious difficulty if a good new [UN] resolution was not agreed".[99]

299. When Sir David Manning subsequently spoke to Dr Rice, they discussed three options for amending OP10:

- Leaving open the possibility of coming back to the Security Council, but not to specify it, and to tone down the language of "all necessary means" to something like “serious consequences”. Any member of the Security Council would be free to bring the issue back to the UN.

- Casting OP10 in terms of a stark warning that the Iraqis must comply with the resolution but without specifying what would follow if they did not.
- Putting the “all necessary means” provision into a second resolution.[100]

300. Sir David stated:

> “There should be no difficulty if Blix [Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC] notified the Council that Saddam was in breach. It might be more difficult if there were a series of low level skirmishes between Blix and the Iraqi authorities that we interpreted as obstruction but that the French or others tried to interpret differently. In that event, we should have to be very clear and very tough.”

301. Mr Blair and President Bush were to discuss the issue the following day. Sir David asked the FCO for advice.

302. Mr Straw spoke to Secretary Powell at 12.30pm on 2 October and talked him through proposed language for “the ‘one and a half’ resolutions” they had discussed.[101]

303. Mr Straw’s Private Office subsequently advised Sir David Manning that:

- The US and UK were focusing in the P5 in New York on the arrangements for inspections in OP5, which would leave “time for the Prime Minister and President Bush to discuss the most politically difficult point, the consequences of non-compliance, in OP10”.
- It was clear that “both the French and the Russians” would “insist that the Council must take a second decision before the use of force is authorised”.
- Mr Straw and Secretary Powell had “therefore agreed to look at an alternative two stage approach”, which Mr Blair and Mr Straw had “always seen … as a possible approach to achieving our overriding objective of getting the inspectors in to tackle the disarmament of Iraqi WMD”.
- That “would involve a first resolution establishing a tough inspections regime and sending a strong signal of the Council’s willingness to authorise the use of force in the event of Iraqi non-co-operation”.
- There “would be a private side agreement committing the French/Russians to agree the adoption of a short second resolution authorising the use of force in the event of clear Iraqi violations”.
- To address French and Russian concerns that OP10 as drafted could authorise the use of force on a trivial pretext, it would be redrafted to “drop the prior determination that any violation constituted a material breach and the prior authorisation” for the use of “all necessary means”.

---

[100] Letter Manning to McDonald, 1 October 2002, ‘Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice’.
[101] Letter McDonald to Manning, 2 October 2002, ‘Iraq’.

- The US and UK "might also have to make clear that only a serious violation would trigger further Council action".[102]

304. The FCO provided a paper on the options, including:

- variants on the language for a "new OP10";
- how these variants were likely to be viewed by France and Russia;
- whether Kosovo provided a precedent; and
- the principles on which a possible side agreement might be based.[103]

305. Mr Straw recommended that Mr Blair should discuss the case for moving to one of those options, with President Bush, "to achieve the goal of a much tougher inspections regime, and putting the onus on the Security Council to pass the necessary second resolution in the case of non-compliance or do huge damage to the credibility of the UN system". Mr Blair should start with an option whereby the Security Council declared its readiness, in the event of non-compliance, to decide whether there had "been a further material breach of Iraq's obligations" and "that such a breach" authorised "member states (or another formula …) to use all necessary means to restore international peace and security".

306. The FCO did not address the precedent of Kosovo for Iraq. The paper stated only that:

> "Several Council resolutions on Kosovo warned of an impending humanitarian catastrophe, and affirmed that the deterioration in the situation constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. But we argued that military action was justified as an exceptional measure to prevent an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe, rather than that it was based on any provisions in a resolution."

307. The FCO suggested that a possible side agreement between the parties on the adoption of a second resolution should be based on the following general principles:

> "… where there is information/evidence [reported by UNMOVIC/IAEA] of any Iraqi:
>
> - action/attempts to conceal information related to weapons programmes;
> - action/attempts to conceal other information which UNMOVIC/IAEA deem necessary to fulfil their mandate;
> - action/attempts to obstruct the work of UNMOVIC/IAEA personnel in a manner likely to impede UNMOVIC/IAEA's effectiveness in fulfilling their mandate;
> - failure to co-operate in the establishment of OMV [ongoing monitoring and verification], or in the destruction of any equipment designated by UNMOVIC/IAEA or in any other way required of them under the terms of relevant resolutions or under terms set out by UNMOVIC/IAEA …

- failure to meet the deadlines set out in the relevant resolutions."

308. Sir David Manning told Mr Blair that the "main issue" for his conversation with President Bush was the provision for the use of "all necessary means" if Saddam Hussein was found to be in breach of his obligations.[104] That "automaticity" went "too far" for France and Russia. President Bush would "ideally like to dispense" with the draft OP10, but accepted that was "a political impossibility". The UK wanted "something like OP10 to give us legal cover if at some stage we take military action".

309. Sir David added that the FCO letter "identified various possible fixes", and he recommended that Mr Blair should persuade President Bush "to go the two resolution route (you warned that this might well be necessary at last month's Camp David meeting)".

310. Sir David proposed language in OP10 that stipulated "in the event of a breach, the Council will decide to authorise all necessary means". That conceded the issue would "have to come back to the Security Council for further decision, so saving Chirac's face".

311. Sir David advised that, "at the same time", the US and UK "should insist on privately pre-negotiating the terms of a second, follow-up resolution [with France and Russia] that would authorise 'all necessary means' once a breach is established"; and that the current draft should not be revised until that had been agreed. That would:

"… not be without difficulties:

– bringing the French and Russians to pre-negotiate a tough second resolution and commit themselves to it; – establishing clearly what would constitute a breach and so trigger action: this will need to be pinned down in advance.

"But there is a chance a deal of this kind can be struck … The French and Russians may well be reluctant: but if this is the price to avoid early US unilateralist action with serious long term damage to the Security Council, they may well pay."

312. Sir David concluded that if Mr Blair and President Bush could agree, "we can get on with the business of trying to sell it in capitals and the UN. We now need to move fast."

313. In a second conversation on 2 October, Mr Straw was informed that President Bush was "very energised" about a single resolution.[105]

[105] Letter Straw to Manning, 2 October 2002, 'Iraq: Conversations with Colin Powell'.

314. In the first of two conversations with President Bush on 2 October, Mr Blair initially focused on achieving a tough regime for inspections as more important than the issue of a two stage approach.

315. Mr Blair spoke twice to President Bush on the afternoon of 2 October.[106]

316. In the first conversation, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed their concerns about the outcome of Dr Blix's talks with Iraqi representatives in Vienna on 1 October and that the burden of proof that he had no WMD must be on Saddam Hussein.

317. Mr Blair told President Bush that the need to ensure a sufficiently strong inspection regime was "more important than the question of one resolution or two". The inspectors should "go in as soon as possible".

318. Mr Blair set out three options in descending order of preference:

- two resolutions (as set out by Sir David Manning);
- a "tough resolution keeping open whether a second resolution would be needed, with others knowing that we would be prepared to act without a second resolution if necessary. We need not rule out a second resolution, but we should not tie ourselves to one"; and
- the "worst outcome" of requiring a second resolution but not being able to get it.

319. In a conversation with Dr Rice between the two discussions between Mr Blair and President Bush, Sir David Manning pursued the argument for two resolutions.[107] He also suggested that Mr Blair and President Bush should confer about the scale of the deceit that would require military action: "We would want to establish a 'pattern of deceit' rather than a specific incident as a trigger."

320. Separately, Mr Straw was informed by Secretary Powell that the White House was interpreting Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush as support for a single resolution and that some in the US were warning the President about the dangers of being mired in the UN.[108] Mr Straw had talked him through the UK proposals for modifying the existing resolution which Sir Jeremy Greenstock thought France would agree. They agreed it was worth trying to get President Bush's agreement.

321. In the subsequent conversation Mr Blair suggested draft language for the resolution implying a second resolution would be sought if Iraq failed to comply with the provisions in the new resolution and indicating that the Security Council would be willing to authorise force in those circumstances.

322. Mr Blair said that any significant obstruction or discovery of WMD would constitute a breach. The inspectors should report the facts and we should make the judgements.

323. Mr Blair told President Bush that if the UN did not authorise force in the event of a breach, the US and UK would still act.

324. The issues of what would constitute a breach and who would decide on the appropriate action were key issues in the negotiation of the resolution and its subsequent interpretation.

325. In the second conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair proposed that OP10 should be amended to read:

> "Decides that false statements and omissions in the declaration submitted by Iraq to the Council and failure by Iraq at any time to comply and co-operate fully in accordance with the provisions laid out in this resolution shall constitute a further flagrant violation of Security Council resolutions, and expresses its readiness to authorise all means necessary to restore international peace and security in the area."[109]

326. In exchange, Mr Blair said the US and UK should "hang tough" on OP5 [the arrangements for intrusive inspections] and on material breach in OP1. When the first resolution was passed the US and UK should make clear that, in the event of non-compliance, "we would expect the Security Council to authorise the use of force". If for any reason it were not to do so, "we would go ahead anyway, on the Kosovo model".

327. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed what would constitute a breach and who would decide.

328. Mr Blair said that if Iraq declared it had no WMD and the inspectors then found a significant amount, it "would be a casus belli"; any significant obstruction or discovery of WMD would constitute a breach. That was not a judgement for Dr Blix; "the inspectors should report the facts, and we should make the judgements".

329. In a subsequent telephone call Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that he and Dr Rice were about to discuss the UK proposal.[110]

330. In a fifth conversation that evening Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that the US "were buying into" Mr Blair's proposal, but "there would need to be a lot of work done on it".[111]

331. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair and Mr Straw had had "a very difficult meeting early on" when Mr Straw had explained that the US was "getting very jittery about the UN route". Mr Straw had also said that France was making clear it would not support war at all, China "didn't care, and Russia was playing hardball".[112]

332. Mr Campbell wrote that the US "wanted one resolution that would allow them to hit Iraq at the first sign of Saddam lying or causing trouble". Mr Blair had described his first conversation with President Bush as "difficult". President Bush was "beginning to wonder whether we are going down the right road". Mr Campbell wrote that the US was "getting more and more impatient".

333. Mr Campbell also wrote that President Clinton's references to Iraq in his speech to the Labour Party Conference were intended to convey the view that Mr Blair "was in a position to influence US policy" and to get President Bush "to side with [Secretary] Powell". But Mr Blair was "less confident we could get the tough resolution we wanted". President Bush had told Mr Blair that he was "having trouble holding on to my horse". Mr Campbell wrote it was clear that President Bush was trying to get Mr Blair "to agree that if Saddam was found to be lying that was a 'casus belli'".

334. Following the second conversation between Mr Blair and President Bush, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair was concerned that rhetoric aimed at managing the Republican right wing would stop President Bush getting to the right policy positions; and that Mr Blair "seemed to be moving to the view that this [the US Administration] was a government that was ruthless about its own power and position".

335. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that in his first conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair's mind was on the Labour Party Conference and he:

> "… simply didn't make the key points. I told him that, however embarrassing, he'd have to make the call again. It was fixed for later that evening."[113]

336. Mr Straw wrote that the second call:

> "… went well. We had a text to broker with the other members of the Security Council.
>
> "There then followed an extraordinary five-week period in which not just every phrase, but every word, and even the punctuation, was the subject of the closest debate and argument. I often spent hours each day in telephone calls with Colin [Powell] and Dominique de Villepin and Igor Ivanov, as well as with the Chinese foreign minister, Tang Jiaxuan and the foreign Ministers of the non-permanent members of the Security Council."

Continuing difficulties in securing agreement on a draft text

Iraq's rebuttal of the UK dossier

337. The Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs published a "detailed rebuttal" on 2 October, which described the UK dossier as "a series of lies and empty propaganda" which was "totally inconsistent" with the facts and reports made by UNSCOM and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).[114]

338. The rebuttal emphasised Iraq's "intensive efforts" and co-operation between 1991 and 1998 in implementing resolution 687 (1991) and other resolutions. It also stated that Iraq had not imported any prohibited material.

339. Detailed comments on Iraq's rebuttal are set out in Section 4.3.

340. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, told Sir David Manning that a review of the rebuttal conducted by the Assessments Staff, the intelligence agencies and the FCO dismissed it as: "In broad terms … very weak; long on rhetoric and short on detail." It did not undermine the UK dossier and in a number of key areas failed to provide a credible response.

341. Mr Miller added that the document presented "a somewhat rosy picture" of Iraq's relationship with UNSCOM. He characterised Iraq's refutation of the UK "claim that its WMD programmes have continued post 1998" as an "attitude of denial".

342. Under the heading "Iraq: Still Playing Games", press lines prepared by the Communications and Information Centre (CIC) focused on:

- Iraq's pre-1998 co-operation with UNSCOM and its failures:
  - to provide full and comprehensive disclosures;
  - to allow the inspectors immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to relevant sites, documents and persons; and
- material for which UNSCOM had been unable account.

343. Mr Miller concluded: "I do not think we need to offer a fuller reply to any of Iraq's claims."

344. Iraq's explicit denials of possession of prohibited weapons, materials and programmes were not addressed, and there was no consideration of the risk which Iraq would have faced by issuing a detailed rebuttal which inspections might show to be untrue.

Discussions between Iraq, UNMOVIC and the IAEA about the return of inspectors

345. Dr Blix told the Security Council on 3 October that, although there was no legal need for a new resolution to authorise the return of inspectors, it would be better, if there was going to be a new resolution, for them to wait to return to Iraq until that was in place.

346. Dr Blix and Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, held separate talks with Iraqi officials about the practical arrangements for inspections in Vienna on 30 September and 1 October.

347. Some officials had identified the practicalities of the timetable for preparing and conducting inspections as "the most difficult area".[115]

348. The UK Mission to the UN in Vienna reported that Dr Blix thought the talks had gone well in most respects, including Iraq's agreement to drop the 1996 arrangements for visits to sensitive sites.[116] The main outstanding issues were:

- arrangements for the safety of inspection flights in the No-Fly Zones;
- interviews, where the Iraqis were still insisting on the presence of an Iraqi official and the right to film; and
- UNMOVIC use of U2 (surveillance) flights.

Access to Presidential sites had not been addressed.

349. Mr Campbell wrote that Dr Blix:

> "… seemed to be making progress and looked like he was trying to do a deal which would not necessarily include palaces. It wasn't good enough for the US but the UN were pushing it and suggested that we didn't need another UNSCR. Powell was very hard line that there could be no new inspections without a new UNSCR."[117]

350. The British Embassy Washington reported that Secretary Powell had responded swiftly to the talks with an impromptu press conference warning that UNMOVIC should not return to Iraq until a new resolution had been adopted; and that the US preference was for a single resolution.[118]

351. The Embassy also reported that:

- The US press was reporting a claim by Secretary Rumsfeld that the No-Fly Zones were the air component of the inspections regime under resolution 687.

He had also stated that, since promising on 16 September to allow the unconditional return of inspectors, Iraq had fired on coalition aircraft 67 times with the clear inference that Iraq was threatening US interests.

- A White House spokesman had stated that "regime change is welcome whatever form it takes"; and that "the cost of one bullet" fired by the Iraqi people would be "substantially less" than the cost of military action.

352. The FCO instructed Sir Jeremy Greenstock to use Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 3 October to emphasise that key issues remained to be resolved and a new resolution was "essential to demonstrate that the UNSC is determined to ensure proper inspections this time, backed up by the will to enforce its decisions if necessary".[119] In an interview for the BBC's Today programme on 1 October, Mr Blair had stated that a tougher resolution was necessary before the inspectors returned.

353. While recognising that Member States could not dictate the inspectors' activities, the UK was concerned that inspectors should not return to Iraq before "new modalities" had been agreed.

354. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Dr Blix's view, as expressed to the Security Council on 3 October, was that, while it would be helpful to reaffirm and strengthen UNMOVIC's rights, there was no legal need for a new resolution before the inspectors returned.[120] His "main concern" was "unanimity and a Council willingness to back inspectors up". If there was going to be a new resolution there would be no point in returning to Iraq only for new arrangements then to be put in place.

355. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Council that a further resolution was necessary to ensure the inspectors were effective. Iraq was continuing to take measures to conceal its WMD facilities and stocks. The Council needed to hear from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei what additional measures were required and it would be prudent to tie up loose ends – "one man's loose end could be another man's casus belli".

356. The agreement reached in Vienna was set out in a letter of 8 October from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to the Government of Iraq.[121] It was subsequently endorsed by the Security Council and resolution 1441 (OP6) made its contents legally binding.

357. Negotiations on the content of the draft resolution between the UK and US and with other members of the P5 continued without agreement being reached on a text which would secure support in the Security Council.

358. The FCO considered that the two stage approach would mean a second resolution would be required to authorise the use of force.

359. On 3 October, the FCO provided a revised text incorporating the amended OP10 and other changes to reflect discussions between the P5.[122] The covering letter explicitly stated:

> "In our view, a text along these lines would require a further Security Council resolution to authorise the use of force."

360. The FCO also stated:

> "There would, of course, be … argument about the extent to which any Iraqi transgression constituted a flagrant violation. It would therefore be important to obtain a clear commitment from the French and Russians in advance. This could either be through a side agreement with them containing an indication of the circumstances in which we would want to seek authorisation on the lines described in the paper enclosed with my letter … of 2 October. It could also be useful to agree on a contingency basis among the P5 the text of a second resolution."

361. Sir David Manning discussed the draft resolution with Dr Rice on 3 October, pointing out that it "did not rule out military action if there were no further Security Council resolution ie it did not pre-empt the 'Kosovo option' … President Bush had yet to take a view on it."[123]

362. Mr Campbell wrote that Sir David Manning was concerned that Saddam Hussein was "probably going to make positive noises about inspections and try to drag things to February because then the 'window of war' would close".[124]

363. Mr Ricketts advised that failure to obtain a second resolution was likely to leave the UK with "no plausible legal basis" for the use of force; the "Kosovo option" would be no help.

364. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that there was "no parallel" between the circumstances of military action in Iraq and in Kosovo.

365. In a minute on 3 October to Mr Straw's Private Office, which was sent to Sir David Manning and Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Mr Ricketts set out his views, "As a mind clearing exercise", on whether: "If the Security Council adopts a resolution with our new version of OP10 … we have conceded the principle that a second resolution is required."[125] He added: "If we do not for some reason get it, it must be very likely that the Attorney would conclude that [the UK] did not have a legal basis for military action."

366. Mr Ricketts did "not think the 'Kosovo option' helps in these circumstances". The UK had not relied on or sought a resolution authorising the use of force; it had relied on

"an alternative legal base i.e. that action was necessary to prevent an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe (by analogy with the 1991 action in Northern Iraq to help the Kurds)". Mr Ricketts commented:

> "… that would not be credible grounds for action this time. So far as I can see, failure to get a second resolution would leave us with no plausible legal basis."

367. In a manuscript comment in the margin of Mr Ricketts' minute, Sir David Manning wrote: "What about the reference in OP1 to 'material breach'?"[126]

368. It is not clear whether Sir David had seen the minute before his conversation with Dr Rice.

369. On 4 October, Sir David Manning reported that the US Administration was not yet willing to discuss detailed draft texts with the French.[127] Secretary Powell would discuss "concepts" with Mr de Villepin. The instinct was to move cautiously and to take time to see if agreement was possible. The US was also considering changes to the proposed text of OP10.

370. In his conversation with Mr de Villepin on 4 October, Mr Straw stated that: we had to find out the extent of the problem with Iraq and its WMD by getting the inspectors back.[128] We had got as far as we had with the Iraqis by threatening force. We would prefer to resolve the problem peacefully. If this was not possible we would use force.

371. Mr Straw and Mr de Villepin agreed officials should discuss.

372. Mr Straw spoke twice to Secretary Powell on 4 October. In the second conversation he told Secretary Powell that there was "no parallel" with the Kosovo model.[129]

373. FCO Legal Advisers continued to voice concerns about the absence of a clear statement from the Security Council reviving the authority for the use of force, and that Lord Goldsmith's views would be needed once the language in the draft resolution on that point had been firmed up.

374. On 4 October, in a minute copied to Sir Jeremy Greenstock among others, Mr John Grainger, FCO Legal Counsellor, expressed concerns that the current draft resolution would allow other Member States to argue that it did not amount to an authorisation of the use of force. He concluded:

> "In the time available I have not been able to consult the Attorney General, whose views would be crucial. In the past his predecessors have emphasised the need for a clear statement that the Council authorises the revival of the use of force, which this draft does not appear to offer. We will need to obtain the Attorney's view on the effect of any language once it firms up."[130]

375. The British Embassy Washington reported on 4 October that Vice President Cheney wanted a resolution that would provide a 'tripwire' for military action.

376. Mr Brenton reported on 4 October that he had been told that Vice President Cheney "simply didn't believe that any achievable inspection regime would give us the cast iron assurance we had to have that Iraqi WMD had been eliminated." He "[supported] the … US approach" of trying to get the UN to endorse a tough inspections regime; but he expected "Saddam would try to play games" and "would be caught out, providing the US with its casus belli".[131] Vice President Cheney would not "sign up to any regime which seemed likely to fail in this tripwire function".

377. Mr Blair saw the minute.[132]

President Bush's speech in Cincinnati, 7 October 2002

378. President Bush set out the case for urgent action to disarm Iraq on 7 October.

379. President Bush stated that Iraq had "an opportunity to avoid conflict" only if it complied with all its obligations. The US hoped it would make that choice but it had "little reason to expect it".

380. On 1 October, in advance of the votes in Congress to authorise the use of force, if it proved necessary to enforce Security Council demands, the Central Intelligence Agency produced its National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on 'Iraq's Continuing Programs for Weapons of Mass Destruction'.[133]

381. An unclassified document based on the NIE was published on 4 October (see Section 4.3).[134]

[134] CIA, 4 October 2002, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction Programs.

382. President Bush used a speech in Cincinnati on 7 October to set out in detail the case for urgent action to disarm Iraq.[135]

383. President Bush described Iraq as "a grave threat to peace" and stated that the US was determined "to lead the world in confronting that threat". Members of Congress and the Security Council agreed that Saddam Hussein was a threat and "must disarm"; the question was how best that could be achieved.

384. President Bush stated that the US Administration had "discussed broadly and fully" the nature of the threat and the urgency of action. The threat from Iraq stood "alone" because it gathered "the most serious dangers of our age in one place". Iraq was "unique" because of its "past and present actions … its technological capabilities … the merciless nature of its regime".

385. President Bush set out the main components of that threat, including the US perception of Iraq's WMD programmes and intent and its ability to deliver such weapons; Saddam Hussein's potential links to international terrorism; and the need for the US to act to protect itself. The points made included:

- The possibility of Iraq acquiring a nuclear weapon.
- Concerns that Iraq was "exploring ways of using UAVs [Unmanned Aerial Vehicles] for missions targeting the United States".
- Iraq and Al Qaida (AQ) had "high level contacts that go back a decade".
- Some AQ leaders who had fled Afghanistan were in Iraq, including "one very senior … leader" who had "been associated with planning for chemical and biological attacks".
- "[C]onfronting the threat posed by Iraq" was "crucial to winning the war against terror". Saddam Hussein was "harboring terrorists and the instruments of terror, the instruments of mass death and destruction". He could not be trusted and the risk that he would "use them, or provide them to a terror network" was "simply too great".
- The enemies of the US would be "eager to use biological or chemical, or a nuclear weapon", and it "must not ignore the threat": "Facing clear evidence of peril, we cannot wait for the final proof – the smoking gun – that could come in the form of a mushroom cloud."

386. President Bush stated that the danger, from Iraq, could not be addressed "by simply resuming the old approach to inspections". After eleven years of trying "containment, sanctions, inspections, even selected military action", Saddam Hussein still had chemical and biological weapons and was "increasing his capabilities to make more"; and he was "moving ever closer to developing a nuclear weapon".

---

[135] The White House, 7 October 2002, President Bush Outlines Iraqi Threat.

387. President Bush warned the Iraqi regime that it had "an opportunity to avoid conflict" only if it took steps to comply with all its obligations [as set out in Security Council resolutions]". The US hoped the regime would make that choice but it had "little reason to expect it".

388. President Bush also warned the Iraqi regime against attempting "cruel and desperate measures" if it were facing its demise. If Saddam Hussein ordered such measures, his generals would be "well advised to refuse"; "they must understand that all war criminals will be pursued and punished".

389. President Bush stated that waiting to act was "the riskiest of all options". There could be "no peace" if the security of the US depended "on the will and whims of a ruthless and aggressive dictator".

390. Addressing concerns that regime change could produce instability in Iraq, President Bush concluded that the situation in Iraq:

> "… could hardly get worse, for world security and for the people of Iraq …
> "Freed from the weight of oppression, Iraq's people will be able to share in the progress and prosperity of our time … the United States and our allies will help the Iraqi people rebuild their economy, and create the institutions of liberty in a unified Iraq …"

JIC Assessment, 10 October 2002

391. The JIC Assessment of 10 October stated that Iraq's ability to conduct effective terrorist attacks was very limited; and it was "inadequate" to carry out terrorist, chemical or biological attacks outside Iraq.

392. The JIC also assessed that Saddam Hussein would use terrorism only in response to a US attack.

393. At the request of the FCO, the JIC produced a specific Assessment on 10 October 2002 of the terrorist threat in the event of US-led military action or imminent action against Iraq.[136] That included an assessment of the relationship between Iraq and members of Al Qaida, and how Al Qaida would "use an attack on Iraq as further 'justification' for terrorist attacks against Western or Israeli interests".

394. The Assessment stated that Saddam Hussein's "overriding objective" was to "avoid a US attack that would threaten his regime", but the JIC judged that in the event of US-led military action against Iraq, Saddam would:

> "… aim to use terrorism or the threat of it. Fearing the US response, he is likely to weigh the costs and benefits carefully in deciding the timing and circumstances in which terrorism is used. But intelligence on Iraq's capabilities and intentions in this field is limited."

395. The Key Judgements of the JIC Assessment of 10 October were:

- Saddam's capability to conduct effective terrorist attacks is very limited, especially outside the Gulf region.
- But Iraq will aim to conduct terrorist attacks against Coalition interests and Israel during a military campaign. Terrorism could be attempted against Coalition forces and Gulf States supporting them during a military build-up if Saddam believes an attack is inevitable.
- Saddam will seek to conduct terrorist attacks against UK interests abroad in the event of military action against him. Iraqi attacks within the UK are unlikely.
- No major terrorist group will conduct attacks on behalf of Iraq. But Al Qaida and other Islamic extremists may initiate attacks in response to Coalition military action. Al Qaida will use an attack on Iraq as further 'justification' for terrorist attacks against Western or Israeli interests.
- Iraq's terrorism capability is inadequate to carry out chemical or biological attacks beyond individual assassination attempts using poisons. But Al Qaida or other terrorist groups could acquire a chemical/biological capability from the dispersal of Iraqi material or expertise during a conflict in Iraq or following the collapse of Saddam's regime."

396. The Assessment stated that during the 1991 Gulf Conflict, Iraq had "sought (with negligible success) to conduct terrorist attacks against Coalition interests" and that Saddam Hussein's "overriding objective" was to "avoid a US attack that would threaten his regime".

397. In the event of US-led military action against Iraq, the JIC judged that Saddam Hussein would:

"… aim to use terrorism or the threat of it. Fearing the US response, he is likely to weigh the costs and benefits carefully in deciding the timing and circumstances in which terrorism is used. But intelligence on Iraq's capabilities and intentions in this field is limited."

398. Other key points in the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 10 October 2002: 'International Terrorism: The Threat from Iraq'

Iraq's capabilities and intentions

The Assessment stated that:

- Diplomatic and economic restrictions since 1991 had "severely degraded Baghdad's already limited overseas terrorism capability".

- The Directorate of General Intelligence (DGI) had "little reach or capability outside Iraq".
- There were indications that Saddam Hussein was "trying to rebuild a terrorist capability", but the willingness of individuals to conduct attacks was "in doubt".
- There were suggestions of individuals being trained in Iraq for terrorism in the event of a Coalition attack, including "uncorroborated reports" of suicide attackers, but "some of this reporting may reflect aspiration rather than reality".
- Iraq had the materials for chemical and biological (CB) terrorism but the JIC judged that the overall terrorist capability was "inadequate to carry out CB terrorist attacks outside Iraq other than individual assassinations using poisons".
- Iraq was "likely to attempt terrorist attacks against military targets during a build up of Coalition Forces" and it was "possible that attacks – or threats – could be directed against regional states affording support to Coalition Forces".
- Even after hostilities commenced, the expectation of diplomatic options might "restrain any attempt to use terrorism until he [Saddam Hussein] believes collapse of his regime is certain".
- "In the event of military action", Saddam Hussein would "seek to conduct terrorist attacks" against the UK's overseas interests, "especially military forces and diplomatic facilities in the Middle East" and possibly Cyprus; but there was "no intelligence" suggesting specific plans for attacks in the UK. The "experience of 1991 and current intelligence" suggested that Iraq might "seek less well-protected targets overseas, for example South East Asia".

Al Qaida

The JIC judged that "the greatest terrorist threat in the event of military action against Iraq will come from Al Qaida and other Islamic extremists"; and they would be "pursuing their own agenda".

The JIC did "not believe that Al Qaida plans to conduct terrorist attacks under Iraqi direction".

The JIC assessed that "US-led military action against Iraq" would "motivate other Islamic extremist groups and individuals to carry out terrorist attacks against Coalition targets".

Al Qaida had:

> "… sought to portray anticipated US-led military operations against Iraq as further confirmation that the US is waging a war on Islam, attracting widespread popular support across the Muslim world and on the Arab 'street'. Al Qaida could also use the opportunity of a military build up to target Coalition forces in the Gulf."

The JIC predicted that:

> "In the longer term, a Coalition attack may radicalise increasing numbers of Muslims, especially Arabs, and boost support and recruitment for terrorist groups."

The JIC concluded:

> "… the terrorist threat from Al Qaida and other Islamic extremists will increase in the event of US-led action against Iraq. Widespread, sporadic, opportunity attacks are most likely. Major, complex operations would be mounted by Al Qaida only if the timing of military action coincides with culmination of their longer-term attack plans."

Iraq's links with Al Qaida

The Assessment stated that:

- There had been "sporadic links between Al Qaida and the Iraqi regime since at least the early 1990s".
- Saddam Hussein's attitude to Al Qaida had "not always been consistent"; he had "generally rejected suggestions of co-operation".
- "Intelligence nonetheless indicates that […] meetings have taken place between senior Iraqi representatives and senior Al Qaida operatives."
- "Some reports also suggest that Iraq may have trained some Al Qaida terrorists since 1998."
- "Al Qaida has shown interest in gaining chemical and biological expertise from Iraq, but we do not know whether any such training was provided."
- There was "no intelligence of current co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida".
- There was intelligence on an Al Qaida presence in Iraq.
- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, "a prominent Al Qaida associated operational planner, was in Baghdad" and appeared "to act with a considerable degree of autonomy". It was "possible that he could be acting independently of the senior Al Qaida leadership".
- In addition, there were "a number of Al Qaida extremists (possibly in the hundreds)", "linked to al-Zarqawi", in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone (KAZ) in northern Iraq. Some were "involved in development and production of CB substances at a facility near Halabjah, within a base run by the Kurdish extremist group Ansar al-Islam (associated with Al Qaida)."
- There was "no evidence of control" by the Iraqi regime over either Ansar al-Islam or the Al Qaida elements in the KAZ.

Iraq's links with other terrorist groups

Senior Iraqi Government officials had "sought to establish contact with Hizballah" in the summer of 2002, but "those approaches were rejected"; Hizballah would "not respond in any way that might be perceived as support for Saddam".

There had also been Iraqi "attempts to increase co-operation" with "major Palestinian terrorist groups". The JIC assessed that they would remain preoccupied with events in Israel and the Occupied Territories; and that they would "be influenced more by Iran and Syria – who want to avoid antagonising the US – than by Saddam". Individual Palestinian terrorists and groups under Saddam Hussein's influence had "limited capabilities, but could mount small scale attacks".

JIC ASSESSMENT, 16 OCTOBER 2002: 'INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM: THE CURRENT THREAT FROM ISLAMIC EXTREMISTS'

399. A further JIC Assessment, 'International Terrorism: The Current Threat from Islamic Extremists', was produced on 16 October 2002.

400. In the light of recent terrorist attacks, including an attack on a French supertanker off Yemen on 6 October, an attack against US Marines in Kuwait on 8 October and the bombings in Bali on 12 October, a JIC Assessment of the current threat from Islamic extremists was produced at short notice on 16 October.[137]

401. Mr Campbell wrote on 15 October that the question of "how can we do terrorism and Iraq" was "growing", and that Mr Blair was "keen to build argument that they were part of the same coin".[138]

402. The minutes of the JIC discussion on 16 October record that the draft Assessment focused "on the areas of greatest current concern and presented a rather sombre picture".[139] The final Assessment could "bring out the changing nature … of the threat to the UK, especially CBW attacks". There was "a huge amount of intelligence and a kaleidoscope of ghastly possibilities, but it was important to balance that with the aspirational nature of much of the planning – not all threats came to fruition".

403. The Assessment addressed the overall threat posed by AQ and other Islamic extremists. In relation to the UK and US interests, the JIC judged that: "Many known threats to Western interests include US interests as a target. Planning and preparation for attacks in the UK itself is probably also in progress. There is a continuing risk of displacement from hardened US targets to the UK, UK interests and other Western interests."[140]

404. The JIC assessed that AQ was "also intent on attacking US allies, especially the UK; and […]. Intelligence on attacks against US interests often includes UK interests as a parallel or secondary target."

405. The Assessment stated that an AQ network based in northern Iraq was interested in the use of toxic chemical and biological materials, based on techniques learned in Afghanistan, but also wished to mount conventional operations.

JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002

406. The JIC assessed on 11 October that Saddam Hussein was determined to retain Iraq's proscribed weapons programme and that he was confident he could prevent the UN inspectors, operating under existing UN resolutions, from finding any evidence before military options started to close in spring 2003.

407. Without specific intelligence, the inspectors would not know where to look.

408. As military pressure increased, Iraq's concealment policy could be undermined by the requirement to prepare hidden "chemical and biological missile systems for military deployment".

409. The JIC had assessed, most recently on 21 August, that Saddam Hussein would permit the return of weapons inspectors if he believed the threat of large scale military action was imminent. The JIC had also assessed that he would seek to frustrate the activities of the inspectors.

410. At the request of the Cabinet Office (OD Sec), the JIC assessed Iraq's attitude and approach to dealing with the return of UN weapons inspectors and its concealment policy.[141]

411. The minutes of the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment on 9 October recorded:

- Iraq was "very confident" about its concealment policy and "had put a lot of effort into ensuring that inspectors would not find anything".
- "UNMOVIC still had no information about suspect sites and without specific intelligence, it would be impossible for them to know where to start looking."
- "A tougher, penetrative [inspections] regime backed by a good intelligence flow from inside Iraq, would therefore be absolutely central to success".
- "… as military pressure increased, the point would come when concealment would make it impossible" for Iraq to "prepare for weaponisation".[142]

412. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- Saddam is determined to retain Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes. He is confident that he can prevent UNMOVIC, operating on the basis of existing UNSCRs, from finding any evidence before military options start to close off in spring 2003.
- Concealment and dispersal of sensitive items are the main elements of Iraq's strategy for dealing with UNMOVIC. The inspectors are hampered by poor preparedness and a lack of intelligence, so far, to guide them.
- Saddam will probably accept a new UN resolution. If inspections are conducted under a tougher regime, and if specific intelligence on WMD locations is forthcoming in response to clear US determination to topple Saddam, UNMOVIC might find evidence of Iraq's WMD programmes.
- In the short-term, we do not expect a repeat of the blatant Iraqi policy of intimidation and obstruction that UNSCOM encountered. Widespread Iraqi obstruction would be seen as too obvious a challenge to the authority of the UN. But if inspectors come close to uncovering evidence of WMD, Iraq will employ a wide range of tactics to delay their work.

[141] JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002, 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors'.
[142] Minutes, 9 October 2002, JIC meeting.

- Iraq will use all diplomatic efforts, backed by its economic leverage on its neighbours, to undermine political support for a continuation of the inspections and sanctions."[143]

413. Details of the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002: 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors'

The Assessment stated that Saddam Hussein's decision to agree to the return of weapons inspectors on 16 September appeared "to have been driven by a serious wish to avoid a new, strong UN Security Council resolution".

Overall strategy

Intelligence indicated that Saddam Hussein was "determined to retain Iraq's weapons of mass destruction", which he considered "to be a key part of Iraq's regional political and military power. He was "adamant that UN weapons inspectors should not be allowed to find and destroy the WMD capability that Iraq has been able to develop further in the four years since UNSCOM left in 1998".

Iraq was "confident" that it could "ensure the inspectors, acting under the terms of existing UNSCRs", would "not be able to find anything when they return and that Iraq will retain its proscribed weapons programmes".

Iraq's tactics would be:

> "… guided principally by the need to avoid military action which would threaten Saddam's regime. Whilst there is a credible military threat, Iraq is likely to co-operate with the inspectors and present them with sanitised sites, the result of a programme of concealment and deception. This will be backed by a political effort to focus the inspection issue on as narrow a programme as possible (in scope, geography and time). Iraq will continue to pursue a 'comprehensive solution' and argue for unwarranted interim 'rewards', such as softening of sanctions or the No-Fly Zones for early reasonable behaviour."

The JIC judged that:

> "Iraq's obstruction may initially be limited, for fear of provoking early US military action, but that Saddam will incrementally test the extent to which the international community retains the political will to enforce Iraqi disarmament. […] Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz is confident that it will be easier to delay the inspectors once they arrive in Iraq."

Practical arrangements for the return of the inspectors

Under the provisions of resolution 1284 (1999), UNMOVIC would submit a work programme for UN approval 60 days after inspections began. It would then have 120 days after being able to establish monitoring and verification to confirm co-operation by Iraq: "Possibly by the end of July/Sept[ember] 2003".

[143] JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002, 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors'.

Discussions with UNMOVIC revealed concerns focused on "the limited technical knowledge of the sites and equipment to be inspected and poor quality of some inspectors". Dr Blix and the IAEA had "also expressed concerns about the lack of reliable information currently available to them". Dr Blix "would prefer to have any new UNSCR agreed before the inspectors return[ed] to Iraq". To be effective "he needed:

- authority (including ability to freeze sites);
- practical arrangements including regional bases;
- a supporting threat (from the UN Security Council rather than forces on the ground);
- information on where to look."

The Assessment stated that, "despite its public statements", Iraq "would reluctantly judge it had to accept" a new Security Council resolution:

> "International pressure to do so would be overwhelming and rejection would trigger military action to overthrow the regime. A further round of technical talks might be required to take account of a new UNSCR. […] Saddam may lose patience at the constant pressures … and refuse to co-operate. A resolution with such stringent conditions that it threatened Iraq's sovereignty or the regime's confidence in its concealment policy would clearly increase the likelihood of such a refusal. On balance, however … Iraq is likely to accept a new resolution, play for time and rely on concealment to deal with inspections.
> "In the short term, we do not expect the same level of intimidation and obstruction that UNSCOM encountered. But a policy of deniable obstruction is likely, where problems at individual inspection sites are blamed on over-zealous local Iraqi officials, avoiding too obvious a challenge to the authority of the UN. However, we cannot rule out a mistake by Saddam that would result in a serious breach of UNMOVIC's mandate and bring about the military attack he seeks to avoid."

Concealment tactics

"A body of intelligence" indicated that "concealment and dispersal of sensitive items" were "the main planks of Iraq's strategy to deal with the return of weapons inspectors". Saddam Hussein had "reportedly taken into account the experience gained during the UNSCOM inspections" and believed he could "exploit weaknesses in the inspections regime" in resolution 1284.

The JIC stated:

> "Iraq's current preparedness to be flexible on access to these sites [presidential palaces as defined in a 1998 MOU [Memorandum of Understanding] between Iraq and the UN] should be seen in the light of this intelligence. Qusay [Saddam Hussein's son] also instructed that the production of sensitive materials be moved to other secret locations. We have little intelligence on these locations and Blix has expressed his concern at this weakness."

Iraq's concealment efforts were "widespread"; Iraq had "had time to prepare"; and stocks of chemical and biological weapons would be "considerably smaller than after the Gulf War". Intelligence showed that:

> "… steps were being taken to prevent weapons inspectors from finding any prohibited weapons, sensitive papers and documents, including by hiding them in residential buildings, schools and private homes. Duplicate and non-essential papers had been destroyed and the remaining archives had been split up and hidden in the homes of trusted officials. In the absence of specific intelligence, the prospects of successfully finding illicit material at such sites is very limited … Iraq will use widespread media coverage to exploit any UNMOVIC failures to find anything of significance at any sites, including presidential palaces, to undermine public opinion in the need for inspections. Iraq is likely to seek to move the onus of responsibility away from it having to prove its compliance onto the inspectors to justify their activity."

Iraq was "exploiting dual-use sites and mobile production facilities" and reporting indicated that it was "confident that any inspection of dual-use facilities" would be "unsuccessful": the equipment could be used for legitimate purposes "and any incriminating raw material or prohibited product would be removed before any inspection". Iraq had:

"… developed transportable biological production facilities with the intention of not only making it harder to target them but also difficult to find them. Iraq may also have dispersed stocks of chemical and biological weapons away from suspect sites to avoid detection. Intelligence indicates that Iraq has explored unorthodox options for delivering chemical and biological weapons which means the weapons inspectors will have difficulty knowing what to look for."

Iraq was "confident in its concealment plans":

"The fact that Saddam is prepared, temporarily, to allow sensitive equipment out of his 'immediate' control, indicates the importance he attaches to retaining chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles."

Commenting on Iraq's repeated statements that it had "nothing to declare and no documents to reveal", the Assessment stated:

"… the longer inspectors remain in Iraq the greater the likely impact on Iraq's development programmes. UNMOVIC are more likely to come up with evidence of proscribed activity at Iraq's missile facilities than those associated with the chemical, biological and nuclear programmes. We judged that production could continue at a much reduced level whilst inspectors were in-country. As the military pressure against Iraq increases, its concealment policy could be undermined by the Iraqi requirement to prepare its hidden stocks of chemical and biological missile systems for military deployment."

Prospects for concealment

The JIC judged that Iraq's "emphasis on concealment and the limited capabilities of UNMOVIC" meant that:

"… without additional guidance to UNMOVIC, there is a serious risk that Iraq could prevent inspectors from finding conclusive evidence of its WMD programmes before military options start to close off in spring 2003. Nonetheless, Iraq's concealment policy will face some challenges. Inspections conducted under a tougher regime than allowed for under UNSCR 1284 could, for example, allow interviews to be conducted without an intimidating Iraqi presence, increasing the prospects for obtaining incriminating evidence. And the changed political context, including the clear determination of the US to bring about regime change, may itself encourage a greater intelligence flow, which could enable UNMOVIC to discover substantive evidence of Iraq's WMD programme."

Differences between the US, the UK, France and Russia remain unresolved

414. Following discussions with Mr Blair, President Putin stated on 11 October that he supported an effective inspections regime but questioned whether there was evidence that Iraq had any weapons of mass destruction.

415. In preparation for Mr Blair's meeting with President Putin, the FCO advised that Russia was negotiating but its position was that there was no need for a new resolution.[144] It was unlikely to agree a resolution which would allow military action without further reference to the Security Council. The FCO suggested Mr Blair would wish to:

- "major on Iraq";
- reassure President Putin that the overriding objective was "to remove WMD from Iraq and therefore to ensure the inspectors have a means of doing so", and that we would "continue to take full account of Russian views"; and
- say that if military action became "inevitable", the long-term stability of Iraq would be "a key consideration".

416. Mr Blair met President Putin on 10 and 11 October.[145]

417. President Putin emphasised that action against Saddam Hussein should be channelled through the UN.

418. Mr Blair and President Putin also discussed the political and economic constraints, including the effect on Russia of a reduction in the price of oil if Saddam Hussein were overthrown and the supply of Iraqi oil on the world market increased.

419. In the subsequent joint press conference President Putin stated that he agreed the "need to take into account the experience of the work done by the UN inspectors" and "to take a decision to ensure the effective operation of the UN inspectors".[146] For the first time, President Putin added:

> "With this purpose we don't exclude … the possibility of adopting a UN resolution."

420. Asked what he thought about the UK dossier, President Putin replied:

> "Russia does not have in its possession any trustworthy data which would support the existence of nuclear weapons or any weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and we have not received from our partners such information as yet.

"This fact has also been supported by the information dispatched by the CIA to the US Congress.

"We do have apprehensions that such weapons might exist on the territory of Iraq and this is precisely why we want to see to it that United Nations inspectors should travel there."

421. France remained opposed to a resolution which permitted military action without an explicit decision by the Security Council.

422. On 5 October, Mr Straw and Mr Blair discussed the need to induce France to move.[147] Mr Blair said that he would speak to President Chirac after President Bush had done so.

423. Following discussions between Sir David Manning and Dr Rice,[148] and his own discussions with Secretary Powell and Mr de Villepin, Mr Straw told Mr de Villepin in a meeting in Paris on 7 October that he had listened to two telephone conversations between Mr Blair and President Bush in which the President had said he wanted to solve the problem peacefully.[149] Mr Straw said he "believed him [President Bush]". Mr Straw encouraged Mr de Villepin to get President Chirac to talk to President Bush.

424. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported on 7 October that:

"… under the pressure of the unmistakeable determination of Washington to resort to force unless Saddam throws in the towel completely, is the growing focus amongst other members of the Council, not on avoiding war, but on preserving the authority of the UN. It is therefore quite possible that a large majority in the Council would go along with a package which (a) adopted a first resolution which did not (not) specifically prefigure a second one to authorise force; and (b) gave the Council a chance to pass an authorising resolution even if the Americans were going to go ahead anyway.

"… This could be done by drafting the two resolutions at the same time …"[150]

425. Sir Jeremy offered some suggestions.

426. In a conversation on 9 October, Sir David Manning told Mr de La Sablière:

"… we did not envisage taking military action if there were one isolated act of stupidity. The test would be whether there was a pattern of obstruction or deceit … Washington realised that the Council would need to review the position and decide > what to do next. And this was the solution to the French worry about automaticity. In practice, we all knew that if Blix were unable to do the job, the Security Council would have to meet to consult. There was thus bound to be a second stage in the UN process …"[151]

427. Sir David suggested that the resolution might say something to the effect that the Security Council "would consult and decide". He told Mr de La Sablière that the "time had come" to "talk seriously about texts … We needed to find a way through quickly. The price of failure would go well beyond the immediate Iraq crisis. It would strike at the viability of the UN itself."

428. Sir David also discussed the points with Dr Rice, who told him that President Bush and President Chirac were due to speak later that day.[152]

429. FCO Legal Advisers considered that the draft resolution would not authorise the use of force.

430. In response to a request from Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, for his views on a further draft of the resolution, which stated that if Iraq failed to comply fully with its obligations it would "bear full responsibility for the serious consequences" that would follow, Mr Grainger advised on 11 October that "even read in the context of the rest of the draft" that provision "would not in itself authorise the use of force".[153]

431. Mr Grainger was concerned that the draft did not use the language of material breach of resolution 687 (1991): "This point is crucial, as it is only a material breach of the cease-fire terms which permits the revival argument."

432. Mr Grainger added: "If our objective is that the resolution itself authorises the use of force", amendments would be needed and even then the resolution would need to be looked at as a whole and in the light of any statements made at the time it was adopted.

433. Mr Grainger also raised a question about whether the finding that Iraq was in material breach of OP1 of the draft resolution could be relied on "in current circumstances" to justify the use of force. That would be "difficult to maintain when the [other] provisions … indicate that the Council is itself taking the responsibility of setting out the steps Iraq must follow to remedy those breaches".

434. Mr Grainger warned that the addition of language suggested by Sir Jeremy Greenstock, to the effect that the Council had decided to "remain fully seized of its responsibility", would in his view have the effect of making it "even clearer that the Council was not authorising the use of force".

435. In conclusion, Mr Grainger wrote:

> "What we say to the French as a tactical ploy is one thing, but we should be under no illusion that the use of force solely on the basis of the first resolution as currently drafted would be unlawful."

436. Reporting major difficulties with the negotiations, Sir Jeremy Greenstock proposed a way of bridging the gap between the US, UK and French positions by making the UK's expectation of a second resolution authorising force implicit rather than explicit.

437. In a telegram to Mr Straw late on 11 October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that Mr Straw's visit to Washington was "an opportunity to get a firm message across to the Americans about UK requirements", and offered "some thoughts about turning our need for UN legal cover into virtue".[154]

438. Sir Jeremy advised: "The French/US standoff is looking unresolvable. It places the UK in a very difficult situation."

439. Sir Jeremy calculated that the US "could not get nine positive votes for a first-stage resolution that appeared to authorise US military force". Norway and Bulgaria would be the only two countries which could be counted on to vote with the US and UK; but "only if some of the excesses" in the draft provisions on the inspections regime were "trimmed". There could be seven abstentions.

440. Sir Jeremy predicted:

> "Even if they [the US] managed to find a text which attracted nine votes, it would leave the inspection regime in a weak position and Iraq somewhat comforted. More to the legal point, many members of the Council … could be expected to make explanations of vote stating that they regarded it as essential for the Council to meet to take a decision on any report of significant Iraqi non-co-operation."

441. Sir Jeremy reported that he was concerned that Secretary Powell thought he had nine votes for a first stage resolution that would satisfy the US. His judgement was that Mr de Villepin's calculation was more accurate. Mr Annan agreed.

442. Addressing the question of where that left the UK, Sir Jeremy wrote:

> "We have to ensure that decisions taken by … [the UK Government] conform with international law, as you [Mr Straw] and the Prime Minister have made clear publicly. A first resolution which falls short of explicit or implicit authorisation of the use of force would, I assume be insufficient as a basis for UK military action, depending of course on the circumstances and the final advice of the Law Officers. I have seen no indication that we have Self-Defence grounds for military action. We need a second resolution if the first does not do the job; or at the very least we need to … point to a clear Council failure to face up to its responsibilities.

"If this is the case, there is a way of making a virtue out of necessity. If the Americans jib at the need for a second resolution, the UK does not have to. If we stated clearly and publicly … that we would expect the Council to meet to discuss any significant Blix report of non-co-operation, and we … would want to hear Council views about that, we would be providing a bridge between the US and French positions."

443. Sir Jeremy explained:

"The US would not have expressed a commitment [to a second resolution], but the rest of the Council would know that a second stage was inevitable, in practice even for the US unless the latter decided, improbably, to go for unilateral military action before Blix had reported …

"If we were to make this signal about future Council action, it would add strength to our approach if it was we who put a second-stage resolution on the table …"

444. Sir Jeremy concluded:

"We should in this way have put our money where our mouth is with the Americans; we would solve a problem for them; we would have found a constructive way of telling them that we could not go with them on a unilateral route; and we should have enhanced our legal cover for the use of force."

445. Sir Jeremy offered to discuss the telegram with Mr Straw on 14 October before he (Mr Straw) left for Washington.

446. There is no record of any discussion.

447. The telegram was also sent to Sir David Manning and British Ambassadors in Washington, Paris and Moscow.

448. Sir Christopher Meyer advised on 11 October that President Bush was the prime mover for US policy on Iraq and he believed war would be necessary to eliminate Saddam Hussein. With Congressional authorisation to use force, he was likely to become "increasingly impatient and tough with the Security Council" and US and UK views on what exhausting the UN process meant could diverge.

449. Sir Christopher also questioned whether there would be an "intolerable contradiction" between the preferred military timetable and that for inspections.

450. If there was no agreement in New York and the US was faced with acting alone, the UK's position might have a decisive effect on President Bush's decision.

451. Sir Christopher Meyer sent a telegram to Mr Straw later on 11 October.[155] He wrote that President Bush wanted:

> "… to be rid of Saddam. He is the prime mover of US policy. He believes that this can be done in the end only by war. To eliminate the danger presented by Iraqi WMD is to eliminate Saddam. Anything short of that, including highly intrusive inspections backed by a new SCR, will not do the trick. Inspections are a tripwire for war."

452. Sir Christopher advised that President Bush was "intensely suspicious of the UN", and in an:

> "… ideal world, he would be on his way now to Baghdad, with a little assistance from the British and a handful of regional helpers. This is why he is eternally susceptible to those like Cheney and Rumsfeld who think coalition-building is of limited utility and inspections a waste of time (thus their attempt to insert in the UNSCR a pre-inspections tripwire in the requirement for Saddam to make a declaration of his WMD holdings)."

453. Sir Christopher wrote that his analysis was "a little different" from his advice before Mr Blair's visit to Camp David in early September: "the forces arguing for more haste, less speed have gathered some strength, sharpening dilemmas for the White House".

454. Sir Christopher reported that President Bush had "bought the argument that it is worth trying to maximise international support by giving the Security Council one last chance". That argument had "got stronger as the Administration started to focus … on 'day after' issues: it is one thing to go to war without … UN cover, quite another to rule Iraq indefinitely without UN backing".

455. The polls were telling the White House that "Americans are far happier about going to war if they do so in company and under UN cover". President Bush was "well aware of the British political debate". Sir Christopher reported that he had been told by Mr Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's Chief of Staff, that "the UK was the only indispensable ally for an attack on Iraq". President Bush's "rhetoric has been less inflammatory and he has soft-pedalled on regime change". That had "helped him get, by large majorities, the Congressional resolutions which as near as dammit give him a free hand in Iraq". With that behind him, the President was likely to become "increasingly impatient and tough with the Security Council".

456. Sir Christopher warned that if there was no progress in discussions with the French, "patience could start to expire next week"; and that:

> "As I have previously warned, the US and UK's views of what exhausting the UN process means could suddenly diverge.

---

[155] Telegram 1326 Washington to FCO London, 11 October 2002, 'US/Iraq: Will the President go to War'.

"Most people in Washington see two scenarios, each leading to war: Security Council discussions collapse without agreement, in which case the UN will – in Bush's eyes – have failed the key test; or Saddam flouts a new UN resolution on WMD declarations/inspections, thereby bringing the full force of the international community to bear.

"The big worry for the hardliners is a third way: that Saddam appears to … take 'yes' for an answer. If Saddam is clever, he will give UNMOVIC and the Security Council no cause for complaint for months to come, until the US becomes enmeshed in the 2004 presidential election campaign."

457. Sir Christopher added:

"Assuming we can get past the current US/French impasse … the next argument will therefore be over the trigger. The White House claims to agree with us that there would have to be a pattern of non-co-operation to provide a casus belli: I do not think … this is bankable. An important point for you to discuss with [Secretary] Powell is whether … mobilisation has reached such a point that there is an intolerable contradiction between the preferred military timetable and Blix scouring Iraq for months on end."

458. Sir Christopher concluded:

"We are not yet at the moment of truth when the irresistible force meets the immovable object … I appear to be in a minority of one in thinking if it all goes wrong in New York, and the US is faced with going it alone, Bush may blink. Or, to put it another way, what the UK decides to do in these circumstances could be the decisive factor in the White House."

459. Sir David Manning showed the telegram to Mr Blair, commenting: "Good tel[egram] on Bush: prejudices and pressures – and continued importance of UK to him."[156]

460. Mr Straw spoke to both Mr de Villepin[157] and Secretary Powell[158] on 12 October. The discussions focused primarily on the difficulties with OP10.

461. Mr Straw also spoke to Mr Tang Jiaxuan on 13 October to discuss progress.[159]

US Congressional authorisation for the use of force

On 10 and 11 October, the House of Representatives and the Senate passed a joint resolution authorising the use of military force against Iraq.[160]

The resolution expressed support for President Bush's efforts:

> "to –
>
> (1) strictly enforce through the United Nations Security Council all relevant … resolutions regarding Iraq and encourages him in those efforts; and
> (2) obtain prompt and decisive action by the Security Council to ensure that Iraq abandons its strategy of delay, evasion and non-compliance and promptly and strictly complies with all relevant … resolutions …"

It also authorised President Bush to:

> "use the Armed Forces of the United States as he determines to be necessary and appropriate to –
>
> (1) defend the national security of the United States against he continuing threat posed by Iraq; and
> (2) enforce all relevant United Nations … resolutions …"

Signing the joint resolution on 16 October, President Bush stated that it symbolised the united purpose of the nation and expressed the considered judgement of Congress.[161] Congress had authorised the use of force but he had not ordered that use, and he hoped that would not become necessary.

President Bush added that confronting the threat from Iraq was:

> "… necessary, by whatever means that requires. Either the Iraqi regime will give up its weapons of mass destruction, or, for the sake of peace, the United States will lead a global coalition to disarm that regime …
> "The Iraqi regime is a serious and growing threat to peace … [T]he regime is armed with biological and chemical weapons, possesses ballistic missiles, promotes international terror and seeks nuclear weapons …
> "If Iraq gains even greater destructive power, nations in the Middle East would face blackmail, intimidation or attack. Chaos in that region would be felt in Europe and beyond. And Iraq's combination of weapons of mass destruction and ties to terrorist groups and ballistic missiles would threaten the peace and security of many nations. Those who choose to live in denial may eventually be forced to live in fear."

President Bush also called on the members of UN to meet the challenge:

> "Every nation that shares in the benefits of peace also shares in the duty of defending the peace. The time has arrived once again for the United Nations to live up to the purposes of its founding to protect our common security …"

President Bush stated that Iraq had an obligation to comply with the world's demands. He added:

- Failure to provide "an accurate and full and complete accounting for all chemical, biological and nuclear materials, as well as missiles and other means of delivery … would be further indication of the regime's bad faith and aggressive intent".
- New and effective rules were needed for inspections which Iraq "must accept … without qualification or negotiation".
- The regime must allow witnesses to be interviewed outside Iraq and take their entire families with them.

President Bush emphasised that the US was seeking to liberate and free Iraq and its people. When it had "a government committed to the freedom and well-being of its people", the US and other nations would "share a responsibility to help Iraq reform and prosper". He pledged that the US would meet those responsibilities.

President Bush concluded:

> "… those risks only increase with time. And the costs would be immeasurably higher in years to come.
>
> "To shrink from that threat would bring a false sense of temporary peace …
>
> "The terrorist attacks of last year put our country on notice … This nation will not live at the mercy of any foreign power or plot. Confronting grave dangers is the surest path to peace and security …
>
> "The broad resolve of our government is now clear to all … We will defend our nation, and lead others in defending peace."

462. On 14 October, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed progress on the draft resolution and the need to find common ground with France.

463. Mr Blair told President Bush that if, in the event of a breach there were no action in the UN, the US and UK should take action.

464. Following a conversation with Dr Rice on 12 October, Sir David Manning reported that discussions between the US and France were continuing but the US Administration was determined to resolve the wording of the resolution the following week.[162] He and Dr Rice also discussed:

- Dr Blix's insistence on independence and legitimacy and the need to ensure he did not underestimate the tricks Saddam Hussein would play and the efforts he would make to obstruct the inspectors.
- Whether Saddam Hussein might refuse to allow the inspections to go ahead which "would be a casus belli". The regime might collapse once rigorous inspections were taking place.

[162] Letter Manning to McDonald, 12 October 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

465. Sir David replied that the last "would be ideal" and reported: "To my surprise, Condi warmly agreed."

466. Sir David commented that he had been left in little doubt that Washington's patience was "wearing very thin". He added that he had been struck by Dr Rice's:

> "… comment on the possible collapse of Saddam's regime. Perhaps, even in the White House there is now a faint sense of disquiet about what a military campaign against Iraq, and its subsequent occupation, would involve. Long shot though it may be, the thought that the Iraqis might do the job themselves may seem increasingly attractive."

467. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that a resolution was needed that week and the UK should:

- insist on material breach language in OP1;
- get the tightest inspection regime it could negotiate in OP5, taking account of Dr Blix's legitimate concerns;
- look for language in OP10 that balanced commitment to consult with commitment to act; and
- consider pre-negotiating a second resolution which committed everyone to action "when Saddam is in breach" as a way through the "current impasse".[163]

468. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 14 October.

469. The conversation on Iraq focused primarily on the progress of the discussions on the draft UN resolution, including the need to find common ground with France and to take action if the UN did not respond.[164]

470. Referring to the "Kosovo model", Mr Blair said that it would allow a return to the Security Council for a further discussion in the event of a breach but it was clear that "if there were no UN action then we would take action ourselves".

471. Mr Blair also underlined the importance of OP5; the key was for Saddam Hussein not only to allow inspectors in but also to co-operate fully with them and tell the truth about Iraq's WMD holdings.

472. Commenting on President Bush's public line that war was his last choice, Mr Blair said that had registered in Europe. They also discussed the possibility that the issue could be resolved peacefully. A tough inspections regime could embolden dissidents "a la Romania". Mr Blair agreed that war was not inevitable but disarmament was; either through UN inspections or through enforcement.

[164] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 14 October 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with Bush'.

473. Following the discussion, Mr Rycroft commissioned further advice on the conditions the US would want to impose on inspections.

474. France continued to pursue an explicit Security Council decision on any measures against Iraq, including military action.

475. France produced revised language in New York on 14 October which proposed that, in the event of a report from UNMOVIC or the IAEA of any serious failure by Iraq to comply with its obligations, the Security Council would meet to decide any measure, including the use of force.[165] Sir Jeremy Greenstock judged that was unlikely to be acceptable to the US.

476. Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw that the French proposal was the first time that they had been willing to engage in textual discussion and that should be encouraged.[166]

477. Mr Ricketts wrote that the US was considering seeking text which would decide that the Council should meet to assess how to meet its responsibility for international peace and security; and that Iraq would bear responsibility for the consequences. If that proved acceptable to the US, Mr Ricketts thought that implied a second Council decision and would "put us in the position of needing a second resolution: and therefore potentially at odds with the US at a later stage. But that is implicit in the Greenstock approach."

478. No.10 officials discussed the position with Lord Goldsmith on 14 October.

479. The advice prepared for Lord Goldsmith focused on the implications of a failure to secure a resolution authorising the use of force.

480. It included the possibility of action in "exceptional circumstances" without a Security Council resolution, if it "was evident to and generally accepted by the international community as a whole" that Iraq had repudiated the cease-fire and military force was the only way to secure compliance.

481. Lord Goldsmith met Sir David Manning and Baroness Morgan to discuss Iraq on 14 October 2002.[167]

482. The briefing note prepared for Lord Goldsmith advised him that the "French and Russians" were "insisting on a two resolution approach" whereas the Americans were "dead against". There appeared to be a "stalemate" in the discussions, "with neither the French nor the US willing to back down on their approach". That left "the UK in a very difficult position":

> "Unlike the French, we are committed (politically) to participating in any military action. But unlike the Americans, the Government needs to be sure that there is a secure legal basis … given that the PM has stated on numerous occasions that any action will be in accordance with international law."

483. Ms Adams told Lord Goldsmith that she had "no indication of precisely what Number 10 would like to discuss with you", but she addressed three points:

- the need for the Council to "make clear that there has been a breach of the cease-fire conditions which is 'sufficiently grave to undermine the basis or effective operation of the cease-fire'";
- "what would be the position if the UK were to propose a second resolution which was then not adopted by the Council?"; and
- what would happen in the event of no resolution.

484. Addressing the second point, Ms Adams wrote that there was:

> "… nothing to prevent us from tabling a draft second resolution authorising the use of force if, as expected, the Iraqis did not comply with the Council's demands in the first resolution. But there is no guarantee that such a resolution would be adopted. The question then would be whether the perverse failure of the Council to adopt the resolution (perhaps because of a single veto) would justify recourse to unilateral action …"

485. Ms Adams advised:

> "This is a question which would have to be considered very carefully in the light of the circumstances at the time. The Law Officers advised in 1997 … that there could be 'exceptional circumstances in which although the Council had not made a determination of material breach it was evident to and generally accepted by the international community as a whole that Iraq had in effect repudiated the cease-fire and that a resort to military force to deal with the consequences of Iraq's conduct was the only way to ensure compliance with the cease-fire conditions."

486. Ms Adams added:

> "I understand this passage was included in the advice to cover the sort of situation where the Council was unable to act. But of course the counter view would be that if the Council has rejected a resolution authorising the use of force, then under the scheme of the Charter, it cannot be said that force is legally justified."

487. Ms Adams recommended that if Lord Goldsmith had "concerns about the lawfulness of military action under any of these scenarios", he should make that "very clear at the meeting, as it is likely to increase the political efforts to achieve a satisfactory resolution".

488. There is no record of the discussion.

489. Mr Straw separately sought urgent advice from Mr Wood on the practical consequences of acting without international legal authority.

490. On 15 October, Mr Straw's Private Office asked Mr Wood for an urgent note about the practical consequences of the UK acting without international legal authority in using force against Iraq for the UK Government or individual Service personnel; whether they would be vulnerable to charges relating to unlawful use of force and therefore whether the legality of the UK's actions would be determined in domestic courts; and whether the International Court of Justice could have any role.[168]

491. Mr Wood replied the same day, outlining a number of potential consequences, including that such action might constitute a breach of the Ministerial Code, and the possible risk of civil litigation.[169] He stated that the advice had been provided "on the basis that we enter into an armed conflict which is clearly unlawful, without respectable legal arguments"; and that it was "therefore in the realm of extremely theoretical speculation".

492. Mr Wood wrote that, while the legality of the conflict would not be directly in issue either in UK courts or the International Criminal Court, "the choice of lawful targets would be difficult if the objectives of the conflict were themselves unlawful". In that context, it was "not inconceivable" that allegations of war crimes could be made on the basis that the objectives of the conflict were unlawful. In addition, it was "just conceivable" that an attempt could be made in the UK "domestic courts to launch a private prosecution for the crime of aggression".

493. Mr Straw and Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that two resolutions would be needed to authorise military action.

494. Mr Straw urged Mr Blair to give President Bush clear messages about the need for a two resolution approach to secure support in the UN and the legal authority required by the UK.

495. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that President Bush had not been clear from the telephone conversation with Mr Blair, on 14 October, that Mr Blair needed two resolutions.[170]

496. Mr Jonathan Powell marked the telegram to Mr Blair with the comment "Important".[171]

497. In a minute to Mr Blair on 16 October, Mr Straw reported discussions with Secretary Powell on 14 and 15 October.[172]

498. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he had spoken to Mr Blair on 13 October, who "had … favoured a two resolution approach". He had also told Secretary Powell:

> "… legally and politically it was almost certain that we would need a second resolution explicitly authorising military action were the UK to be involved in such [military] action against Saddam."

499. Mr Blair wrote alongside that point: "I don't accept this in all circs."[173]

500. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell had also discussed the risks of acting without international backing and the problems of the "day after" which would be the "largest and most hazardous exercise in nation-building"; it would not be as straightforward as some thought.[174]

501. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he felt:

> "… with two resolutions we could close a deal with [President] Chirac, but otherwise Chirac would use every chance he had, of which there would be many, to stift [sic] both us and the US. And right now, the French had the votes and we did not."

502. As he had agreed with Mr Blair, Mr Straw also set out the arguments for two resolutions, including:

- "In the real world, there was bound to be a further discussion in the S[ecurity] C[ouncil] if there was any non-compliance by the Iraqis, and (since we did not control the agenda) a second resolution. On this … the only question was who took the initiative – us (US/UK) or others."
- He "accepted that Blix could not determine whether the US could go to war but we were all bound to rely on Blix's reports as to the facts about non-compliance, on which the US and others would then make their own judgements".

503. In relation to the political environment in the UK, Mr Straw had told Secretary Powell that he was:

> "… as certain as [he] could be that there would be insufficient support in Cabinet and the parliamentary Party to allow us to go to war without clear UN backing. I was completely certain that there would be monumental political controversy: and this ran into the legal problems which were more hazardous for us than the US. I was getting advice on the domestic legal consequences of such military action and would share this with him [Secretary Powell]."

504. Finally, Mr Straw recorded that he had asked whether the military preparations were such that war was inevitable and had been told "emphatically" that they were not. Secretary Powell had told him that, as President Bush got into the issue, he became more nervous of the outcome and he was watching the opinion polls carefully. Those showed a big majority against military action without UN backing.

Security Council open debate, 16 and 17 October 2002

505. An open debate of the Security Council on 16 and 17 October demonstrated the extent of interest amongst Member States about the provisions of a further resolution on Iraq and concerns about its implications.

506. Statements by the five Permanent Members of the Security Council made clear their strongly held and very different perspectives about events since the late 1990s; and the reasons why, in addition to Iraq's position, there had been no progress in implementing the comprehensive approach towards Iraq provided for by resolution 1284 adopted in December 1999.

507. The divergence in their positions on the way ahead remained.

508. The Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) asked on 10 October for an "emergency open debate on the situation in Iraq".[175] In its view, all Members States and Permanent Observers of the UN should be "afforded an opportunity to air their views" on the draft resolution on Iraq because the issues were "of importance to the entire membership … and the future role of the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security". It was "imperative for the Security Council to hear the views of the wider … membership" before it adopted "such an important resolution".

509. An open debate of the Council, attended by more than 50 Member States or Permanent Observers, in addition to the members of the Security Council, took place on 16 and 17 October.[176]

510. In his absence, a statement from Mr Annan was read to the Council by Ms Louise Fréchette, Deputy Secretary-General. In addition to reiterating the points he had made on 12 September (see Section 3.4), Mr Annan also stated that:

- Iraq's "failure to comply fully" with the resolutions of the Council was one of the "gravest and most serious" situations facing the Council.
- The Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, conferred in Article 24 of the UN Charter, was a grave responsibility. It was "essential" for the Council to face up to that responsibility.
- The situation also presented an opportunity to "strengthen international co-operation, the rule of law and the UN".
- Iraq's decision to readmit the inspectors without condition was "an important first step, but only a first step".
- Full compliance remained "indispensable", and had "not yet happened". The Council would expect "unfettered access". A new resolution "strengthening the inspectors' hands" would be "appropriate": "The new measures must be firm, effective, credible and reasonable."
- If Iraq failed "to make use of this last chance, and if its defiance continues", the Council would "have to face its responsibilities". It did that "best and most effectively" when its members worked "in unison".

511. Mr Annan concluded by "urging" the Council:

> "… to make every effort to retain their unity of purpose. If you allow yourselves to be divided, the authority and credibility of the … [UN] will undoubtedly suffer; but if you act in unison, you will have a greater impact and a better chance of achieving your objective, which must be a comprehensive solution that includes the suspension and eventual ending of the sanctions that are causing such hardship for the Iraqi people, as well as the timely implementation of other provisions of your resolutions. If the Council succeeds … it will strengthen the United Nations in a way that will place future generations in its debt."

512. During the debate that followed, a wide range of views and concerns were aired reflecting the positions of the participants.

513. Mr Mohammed Aldouri, Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN, criticised the US Administration's "plans to invade and occupy Iraq, using military force" and argued that it wanted "a blank cheque" from the Security Council to "colonize Iraq … [and] subject the entire region to American hegemony". He stated that there were "no nuclear, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and that Iraq had implemented many years ago the disarmament requirements" in resolution 687 (1991).

514. Following a description of Iraq's position on its implementation of resolution 687 and the conduct of inspectors before their departure in December 1998, "as instructed by the United States", and criticism of the implementation of the sanctions regime,

Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had taken the initiative of opening a dialogue with Mr Annan. That had achieved "some progress" but the US had exerted pressure "which prevented the Council from participating in efforts to seek a comprehensive solution".

515. The Iraqi Government had "agreed, unconditionally, to the return" of inspectors on 16 September and agreed arrangements with Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei in Vienna for the return of inspectors by 19 October. The US had hampered those arrangements by "calling for the imposition of unfair, impossible and arbitrary conditions on Iraq".

516. Mr Aldouri concluded by reiterating that Iraq "had pledged to co-operate with inspectors in every possible way so as to facilitate their task of ascertaining" there were "no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq". There was "absolutely no need for adoption of a new Security Council resolution".

517. Following the statements by non-members of the Security Council, Sir Jeremy Greenstock set out the UK position in his speech on 17 October. He stated that the issues being debated went much wider than Iraq and included:

- "the security of the whole neighbourhood of Iraq";
- "the reinforcement of our collective effort to eliminate terrorism";
- "justice for Palestine and security for Israel within the law";
- "the role of the Security Council when serious matters of national security are before its members"; and
- "the overall effectiveness of the United Nations itself".

518. Sir Jeremy emphasised that the UK's "firm objective" was "the complete disarmament of Iraq in the area of weapons of mass destruction, by peaceful means", and "a peaceful resolution to the current crisis surrounding Iraq". But ensuring that there was such a solution lay "in the hands of Iraq".

519. Addressing Iraq's response to the conditions of the cease-fire in 1991, Sir Jeremy stated that Iraq remained "in material breach of these obligations". He added:

> "We all know of the myriad ways in which Iraq sought, almost immediately after inspections began to frustrate inspections and intimidate inspectors.
>
> "We all know of the succession of allegedly final declarations … We all know that Iraq tried to limit and hinder inspections to the extent that in August 1998 the then head of … UNSCOM said it was impossible for him to do his job. We all know of the outstanding weapons of mass destruction for which UNSCOM was unable to account. We all know of the multiple warnings sent to Iraq …
>
> "No shadow of a doubt remains that Iraq has defied the United Nations …
> "Iraq could have invited inspectors back without conditions at any time … Sanctions could have been lifted … Only Baghdad's insistence on retaining weapons of mass destruction capability has blocked that path …Only under recent intense diplomatic pressure, and particularly the threat of military action, has the Iraqi Government letter of 16 September … emerged."

520. Sir Jeremy stated that Iraq's:

"… words, while necessary, are of themselves not enough. We remain deeply perturbed by evidence that Iraq believes it can hide its weapons of mass destruction rather than declare them, that it can again fool the inspectors and play games with them. The United Kingdom analysis, backed by reliable intelligence, indicates that Iraq still possesses chemical and biological materials, has continued to produce them, has sought to weaponise them, and has active military plans for the deployment of such weapons. The United Kingdom analysis, backed up by reliable intelligence, shows that Iraq has in recent years tried to buy multiple components relevant to the production of a nuclear bomb. The United Kingdom analysis, backed by reliable intelligence, points to the retention of extended-range missiles and to the employment of hundreds of people in projects to develop weapons with a range of over 1,000 kilometres that could carry both weapons of mass destruction and conventional warheads.

"It would be an abdication of responsibility to ignore this challenge to the international community. We cannot afford to bury our heads in the sand and pretend the problem does not exist. We cannot accept the Iraqi Government's word at face value, knowing what we know."

521. Sir Jeremy stated that the UK wished "to see the Security Council … express its will and its unity in a clear strong resolution", which gave the Iraqi regime "an unequivocal choice" to complete WMD "disarmament and normal membership of the international community, or refusal and the inevitable consequences". The offer to Iraq was genuine and represented "a single final chance for Iraq". If that was understood and the Council kept its nerve, there might be:

"… a prospect that Iraq will finally comply with its obligations and that military action can be averted. If we fail to send that tough signal, we shall be ignoring the realities. The weaker we collectively appear, the more probable it is that military action will be the outcome."

522. Sir Jeremy added that effective inspections were an "essential component" of the message and there should be no return to the "ambiguous modalities" and exceptions of the past. He questioned whether the language in recent Iraqi letters about the practical arrangements for inspections was sufficient and called for the arrangements to be made legally binding.

523. Sir Jeremy said he had "heard loud and clear the concerns of many speakers that, on a decision so crucial, we should not rush into a war"; and that "any Iraqi violations must be discussed by the Security Council". If either Dr Blix or Dr ElBaradei reported that Iraq was "not fully co-operating with the inspections process", the UK Government would "expect there to be a detailed Security Council discussion". The UK would "want at that point to hear the views" of the other members of the Council.

524. Addressing the comments by a number of speakers that the non-permanent members of the Council had "been kept in the dark" or even humiliated, Sir Jeremy said he believed the facts had been "misrepresented". None of the permanent members had:

> "… been in a position so far to bring a draft resolution to each other here or to the Council as a whole. The permanent five have done no negotiating on a text in New York. Discussion in capitals has taken place on bilateral channels. Of course our Governments have been working to make a negotiation worthwhile … Once there is a draft with a prospect of broad acceptance in the Council, no Council member will be excluded from discussion …"

525. Sir Jeremy concluded by referring to Iraq's breach of other Security Council obligations and called on Iraq to rectify that position.

526. The description of Iraq's WMD capabilities in Sir Jeremy Greenstock's statement reflected the judgements in the UK dossier on Iraq and the JIC Assessment of 11 October.

527. Setting out China's position, Mr Zhang Yishan, Chinese Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the "absence for so long of a solution to the question of Iraq" had "not served peace and stability in the Gulf region or the authority and credibility of the Security Council". Nor had it "been conducive to improving the humanitarian situation in Iraq". "An early and appropriate settlement" was "the important and urgent task" for the international community and the UN in particular.

528. The Chinese Government had "consistently maintained that Iraq should unconditionally and strictly implement the relevant Security Council [resolutions] … and fully co-operate with the United Nations" on inspections and other issues.

529. Commenting that the number of participants attested to the importance of the issues and the concerns about the implications for international relations, Mr Zhang added:

> "The overwhelming majority of States have emphasised during the debate that the question of Iraq should be settled within the framework of the United Nations, that the Security Council should play a central role in the process and that the unity of the Security Council was of paramount importance.
> "A number of countries, especially the Arab States, have also expressed their strong wish for peace not war. They have pointed out that war can only further exacerbate the already tense situation in the Middle East. The independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq, Kuwait and other countries of the region should be respected. These views and positions are very important, and we agree with them. We hope the Security Council will give them serious consideration."

530. Mr Zhang stated that disarmament was "at the core of the Iraqi question", but: "Only when the … weapons inspectors return to Iraq and conduct effective inspections can the truth ultimately emerge." He welcomed the agreements reached in Vienna for inspections, adding that China hoped Iraq would "honour its commitments and translate them into actual deeds", and it believed weapons inspectors should return:

"… as soon as possible to conduct independent, fair and professional inspections and report truthfully and in a timely manner to the Council the results of such inspections, so that the Council can draw objective, fair and realistic conclusions …

"Under such circumstances, it is not that we cannot consider the adoption by the Council of a new resolution … Such a draft … however, should be practical and feasible, in the interests of an appropriate settlement …"

531. Mr Zhang concluded:

"The Iraqi question has reached a critical juncture. The international community has high hopes of the Security Council. It hopes that the Council will be able to effectively undertake its responsibilities to maintain international peace and security and take action to safeguard the purposes and principles of the Charter. The Chinese Government is ready to join other countries in promoting an appropriate settlement of the Iraqi question within the Security Council."

532. Ambassador Negroponte described President Bush's speech to the General Assembly on 12 September as a "declaration of purpose, not a declaration of war" which had:

"… put the United Nations in the spotlight and challenged the international community to restore the Security Council's relevance on this issue by confronting this threat to international peace and security and 11 years of failure by Iraq to accept the demands made of it after its invasion and destruction of Kuwait."

533. The threat from Iraq was "serious and unique", arising directly from Iraq's "history of aggression and brutality, its defiance of the international community and its drive towards an arsenal of terror and destruction". It was a regime which had:

- "invaded two of its neighbours and tried to annihilate one of them";
- "used chemical weapons on its neighbours and on its very own citizens";
- "lied about its development of weapons of mass destruction"; and
- "signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and then proceeded to develop a major nuclear weapons programme".

534. Since 1991, the Council had "tried in every way to bring Iraq to peaceful fulfilment of the … cease-fire", but the Iraqi regime had "violated all of its obligations".

535. Ambassador Negroponte stated that the Council was meeting "to publicly discuss the message that the Security Council will send to Iraq and … Saddam Hussein". The US view had been clear since 12 September; there could be:

> "… no more business as usual or toothless resolutions that Iraq will continue to ignore. Our intent is that the Council should meet the challenge and stand firm, resolute, and united in adopting a draft resolution that holds Iraq to its commitments, lays out clearly what Iraq must do to comply and states that there will be consequences if Iraq refuses to do so."

536. The US expected the Council to act, and that when it adopted a resolution which sent "a clear and united message to Iraq that it must fulfil its obligations", Iraq would have a choice "whether to take this last chance to comply". The US hoped Iraq would comply, but if it did not, the US would "seek compliance and disarmament by other means".

537. Addressing the role of the UN, Ambassador Negroponte described the world's "united response" to Iraq's aggression in 1990 and 1991 and the resolutions passed by the Security Council as "unique and ground-breaking", which "brought the world body closest to the visions of its founders". But in the ensuing 10 years, Iraq's "failure to implement" the "peace terms" had become "a question of enormous significance". The challenge was whether the UN could "perform the function its founders envisaged".

538. The US hoped the answer would be "Yes". Since 12 September it had "seen signs of emerging Council unity during intensive discussions here and in capitals". But it had "also seen clear signs" that Iraq was "reverting to form", including inviting inspectors to return without conditions, then placing conditions, and responding to UNMOVIC and IAEA requests for clarity with "obfuscation and multiple answers". Iraq had shown it hoped "to return to the word games, ephemeral commitments and misdirection of the past, while continuing to develop the world's deadliest weapons". That was "why a clear, firm message from the Council was so important".

539. The Council and the UN membership would do "no favour" to the people of Iraq, the countries of the region or the credibility of the UN if they created "the impression that an outcome in which Iraq retains its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes is an acceptable or possible outcome". A consensus had been forming in the Council that "the time for denial, deception and delay" had "come to an end and that Iraq must be verifiably disarmed". There was "a growing agreement that there must be immediate, unconditional and unrestricted inspections of all Iraqi facilities that may have a role in the development of weapons of mass destruction".

540. Ambassador Negroponte stated that the US and UK had shared "the elements of our vision of a resolution that will address Iraq's material breach of its obligations … specify the types of access and authorities that UNMOVIC and IAEA must have to be able effectively to verify Iraqi disarmament, make clear Iraq's obligations and articulate to Iraq that there will be consequences to non-compliance" with other members of the Council. The US believed that the "best way to ensure Iraqi compliance" was one resolution which was "firm and unambiguous in its message". A resolution "with clear and immediate requirements … that Iraq would voluntarily meet if it chooses to co-operate" would be placed before the Council "in the near future". Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had "made it clear that they would welcome a new … resolution that strengthens their hands and allows for more effective inspections".

541. Ambassador Negroponte concluded:

> "Now, the spotlight is back on the Security Council. We hope and expect that the Council will act and play its proper role as a safeguard of our common security. If it fails to do so, then we and other States will be forced to act.
>
> "The approach of the United States and United Kingdom aims at clarity … with respect to what Iraq must now do to fulfil its 1991 obligations to restore peace and security in the region … what inspectors must be allowed to do; and our seriousness. Without such clarity there is too high a danger that Iraq will miscalculate. And miscalculation by Iraq will lead to precisely the military action we all hope to avoid.
> "The Security Council faces a defining moment. The Council works best on Iraq when it works together … when the Council is resolute and united, its actions produce results. We must stand together and show Iraq that its failure to comply will no longer be tolerated."

542. Mr Jean-David Levitte, French Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the international community had been unable, since December 1998, to verify whether Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and whether it was "pursuing programmes to that end". By refusing to allow the return of inspectors, Iraq had defied the authority of the Council. "Even though France" did "not possess irrefutable proof", there were "several indications" that Iraq had used the absence (of inspectors) to "pursue or resume its prohibited programmes, notably in the chemical and biological areas". The "behaviour of the Baghdad authorities" had "given rise to strong suspicions". That situation could "not be tolerated"; proliferation of WMD and their delivery systems, "in Iraq or elsewhere", constituted "a serious threat to international security". In the face of that challenge, France considered the objective was the disarmament of Iraq and that implied "the return of the inspectors and the resumption of monitoring on the ground".

543. Iraq had confirmed the practical arrangements for inspections agreed in Vienna, and inspectors "must now return … as soon as possible", but the UN would need to verify the sincerity of Iraq's commitments:

> "In the light of past experience, the international community cannot be satisfied with words alone. Iraq must translate its promises into concrete, verifiable and lasting acts."

544. Mr Levitte observed that the outcome of past UN inspections had been "very positive. UNSCOM had destroyed more WMD between 1991 and 1998 than military operations in 1991", and: "In 1998, the IAEA believed it had succeeded in dismantling the Iraqi nuclear programme. It was not the inspections that failed, but the international community's ability to enforce its decisions in a sufficiently firm and united manner." He added that France was "fully disposed to support measures strengthening the inspection regime, insofar as that proves necessary to facilitate the inspectors' work". But it rejected "measures that would … multiply the risk of incidents without improving the effectiveness" of UNMOVIC and the IAEA. In addition, France "also set store" on the "multinational, independent nature of the inspectors" and any measure which countered that "would be tantamount to repeating past mistakes". The Council should be guided in its choices by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei.

545. Addressing the role of the Council, Mr Levitte stated that France attached "importance to the principle of collective security". That was why it was proposing a two-stage approach. In the first, the Council "should adopt a resolution clearly stating the 'rules of the game'". It would "define the inspection regime with a view to ensuring the inspectors" could "accomplish their mission fully and without any hindrance". It "should also send a clear warning to Iraq" that the Council would "not tolerate new violations".

546. In the second stage, if the inspectors observed that Iraq was "refusing to co-operate fully" with them, the Council "would meet immediately to decide on the appropriate measures to take, without ruling anything out a priori".

547. France's view was that such an approach, which was also the one proposed by Mr Annan in his statement to the Council, was "the only one" that could offer "unity, cohesion, fairness and legitimacy". Unity of the Council was "absolutely vital". In the past Iraq had "taken advantage of divisions … to renege on its obligations and defy the Council's authority":

> "Only a united front will convince it not to repeat this error. Only a two-stage approach will allow us to preserve our Council's unity; any kind of 'automaticity' in the use of force will profoundly divide us.
> "The two-stage approach is, rather, the choice of cohesion. United in sending Iraq a message of firmness in an initial resolution, the Security Council will, we have no doubt, remain united to assume all of its responsibilities during the second stage, should Iraq violate its commitments."

548. Mr Levitte added that the Council "should also demonstrate fairness by showing Iraq that war is not inevitable if it fully and scrupulously fulfils its obligations". That would "open the way to the suspension then lifting of sanctions in accordance with Security Council resolutions". Given the "gravity of the situation", it was "essential for the Security Council to stay in charge of the process every step of the way". That was "fundamental for the legitimacy of our action and essential for maintaining unanimous support for our common objectives".

549. Mr Levitte concluded the Council was discussing:

> "… the future of the international order, relations between North and South, and notably, our relationship with the Arab world. An action of uncertain legitimacy … that does not enjoy the support of the international community, would not be understood and could gravely affect these relations.
>
> "By placing this action within the framework of collective security, the French approach aims to ensure its legitimacy and effectiveness, while respecting the principles defined by the United Nations Charter."

550. In his opening remarks, Mr Sergei Lavrov, Russian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated:

> "For almost 12 years now, the international community has sought a way to settle the Iraqi situation. Throughout that time the Security Council has adopted more than 50 resolutions and endured several severe crises. The current ongoing impasse is rooted not only in the position of the Iraqi side, although we are far from condoning Baghdad's behaviour, while the need for Iraq to meet all its obligations … has been frequently alluded to … We fully support such assessments. At the same time, in a number of instances the Security Council has been unable to hold up its own end with respect to an objective assessment of the situation and to meeting its own obligations to work for a comprehensive settlement …"

551. After making similar remarks to Mr Levitte on the overall achievements of the inspectors, Mr Lavrov stated that it was unfortunate that the Council "was not able to recognise" the opinion of the IAEA in 1998 that its task could be converted into a "long-term monitoring regime". That conclusion had been supported in a letter from Dr ElBaradei to the President of the Council on 14 October, which had "clearly indicated" there were "no outstanding unresolved nuclear issues requiring further clarification". Mr Lavrov added that:

- There was a "virtually complete picture of the missile situation".
- A "significant portion of the stocks of chemical weapons" had been destroyed, "although there were some outstanding issues requiring further clarification".
- The "largest problems persisted in the biological sphere".
- "But on these issues and all the outstanding issues, solutions were possible. At any rate, documents of the former UNSCOM testify that such was the case."
- "In December 1998 the head of the former UNSCOM [Dr Richard Butler] provoked a crisis, arbitrarily withdrawing inspectors from Iraq without the approval of the Security Council. His report came to the Security Council only after [the] United States and the United Kingdom had launched military strikes against Iraq."

- After the strikes, the US Government stated they "had dealt with the issue of eliminating the vestiges of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction programmes, although the relevant information was not given to the Security Council".[177]
- Through its "acts of provocation" the former UNSCOM had "fully discredited itself and simultaneously undermined the pre-December 1998 prospects for reaching a comprehensive settlement".
- The "Council then found itself in a profound crisis not of its own making on the question of Iraq and for a long time was unable to get out of the impasse".
- Resolution 1284 "allowed us to renew the inspections on a new genuinely international basis", but it "contained extremely ambiguous criteria for suspension of the sanctions". That gave individual Council members the opportunity "to maintain the embargo indefinitely". Russia had made proposals to give "concrete substance to the criteria of sanctions suspension in the context of a comprehensive settlement", which remained extant.
- The Security Council had implemented the provisions of resolution 1382 (2001) in respect of the creation of a Goods Review List, but it had not pursued the "commitment to a comprehensive settlement on the basis of existing Council decisions".
- Russia would "do its utmost to prevent a renewal" of Iraq's WMD programmes, and was "prepared to co-operate" on that "with all States". But Russia, "like all unbiased observers", had "not seen any kind of persuasive evidence that there are weapons of mass destruction in Iraq or programmes to develop them". Nor had it "seen any other facts that would situate Iraq in the context of combating terrorism".
- The "immediate redeployment of the international inspectors to Iraq" was the "only way to remove any doubts".

552. Mr Lavrov stated that Iraq had "consented" to an unconditional return of inspectors and the "new, enhanced and very effective parameters for conducting inspections". There was "everything we need to ensure there is no renewal of the proscribed military programmes in Iraq" and for "a political and diplomatic settlement of the crisis". There was "no need to delay deployment" of the inspectors. He added:

> "If the Council has a prevailing desire to give further support to UNMOVIC and the IAEA in the interest of the effective implementation of the existing resolutions … we will be prepared to look at the relevant proposals, including and based on the great importance of maintaining Council unity."

553. In his concluding remarks, Mr Lavrov stated that Russia was "calling for collective steps by the international community" and unilateral actions did "not facilitate the efforts for a settlement". The Council should continue to press for Iraq's compliance with all resolutions. The crux of the matter was:

> "If we are all sincerely interested in the non-renewal of weapons of mass destruction … What are we waiting for? … If we are talking not about the deployment of the inspectors but about an attempt to use the Security Council to create a legal basis for the use of force, or even for a regime change of a United Nations Member State – and this goal has been constantly and publicly alluded to by several officials – then we see no way how the Security Council could give its consent to that …
> "The Charter powers of the Security Council allow it at any time to make decisions about any measures which could be required to eliminate real threats. The important thing now is to achieve a comprehensive settlement based on political and diplomatic methods, with the central role of the Security Council and in strict compliance with Council resolutions on the norms of international law.
>
> "… we are prepared to interact on this platform with other members of the Security Council. This is what we have been called on to do by the vast majority of the international community during the discussions … We are convinced that Security Council members will not be able to ignore this call."

554. In a second intervention, Mr Aldouri made a number of further points, including:

- The Council was "fully aware that the only objectives of the approaching war are oil, wealth and hegemony … the world is now split into two and that the larger part favours peace …" He was in the latter camp.
- The future of the UN had "recently been jeopardised by the statement of one major Power that, if the United Nations failed to take into account the interests of that State, it would go its own way".
- One State had adopted war legislation during the debate, and that was "a virtual declaration of war".
- Iraq's doors were "open" to the inspectors. Iraq had "full trust" in Dr Blix, and "he and his teams will be welcomed in Iraq". Iraq's "hands were now clean" and there were "no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq". It hoped the inspectors would "return soon" so that they "could tell the international community that Iraq" had no WMD. Iraq would not "in any way hinder the work of the inspectors".
- American and British officials had "made clear statements to the effect that sanctions and the embargo will never be lifted until there has been 'regime change' in Iraq".

555. The report of the second day of the debate from the UK Mission in New York stated that the Security Council was "almost unanimously open to a new resolution" that strengthened inspections.[178] There was overwhelming support for two stages "or at least a continued central role for the Council" in authorising military action. There was "an overwhelming dislike of unilateral action and strong desire for [a] diplomatic solution".

556. Sir John Holmes advised that France was likely to stand firm on the need for a two stage approach, which would leave the UK in an uncomfortable dilemma.

557. Sir John Holmes advised that France thought that it was winning the argument and did not think that much would happen until the debate on Iraq in the Security Council on 16 October.[179] France "remained convinced of the need for the international community to stay united to avoid an explosion of unrest and terrorism". It was concerned about "the catastrophic consequences of a war on Iraq without clear proof of Saddam's WMD ambitions and full international, including Arab, support". France would "nevertheless" be:

> "… ready to support military action if the full cycle of inspections/renewed (serious) Iraqi misbehaviour/international agreement can be gone through, and have confirmed that someone else's veto of a second resolution would not deter them if they were convinced of the need for action. But they are uncomfortably aware that there may … not be time available for this full cycle to be gone through before the presumed climatic window … for military action closes."

558. That led to two reflections which were "mutually contradictory": that the US was "bent on war come what may … and are only looking for the UN to endorse a casus belli" or that "even the US are not mad enough to embark on military action … without significant international support". Both led "the French to think that they should stand firm".

559. Sir John concluded that, if the deadlock was not broken, the UK risked "being left in the most uncomfortable position of all, choosing whether to follow the US without UN cover, with all that entails, domestically and internationally". He understood the UK's "reluctance to get squeezed between the Americans and the French", but suggested that Mr Blair might have a "crucial" role.

The US offers compromise language for OP10

560. The US tabled compromise language on 16 October intended to bridge the difference between the US and French positions, deliberately creating ambiguity by stating that the Security Council would "consider" reports of a breach, not "decide" if a breach existed.

561. That language remained virtually unchanged in the final resolution.

562. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that US "understood and accepted" the UK's need for a second resolution but did not want this "spelt out" in the resolution.

563. Reporting on discussions in New York on 16 October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that the latest US draft was intended to show that the US had taken French concerns seriously and made an effort to meet them halfway.[180] The reference to "all necessary means" had been removed and the draft provided for a Security Council meeting. The US would not agree to the Council "explicitly taking the decision to approve force; but that did not mean that the Council would not take it". Sir Jeremy reported that President Bush had personally approved the draft text in OP10.

564. Sir Jeremy also reported that he had told Ambassador Negroponte that Mr Straw had made clear to Secretary Powell that the UK "needed a second resolution. It was extremely unlikely we could find a legal basis without it." The US "understood and accepted" the UK need for a second resolution; "but it didn't have to be spelt out in the resolution". Sir Jeremy had agreed but warned that, if the formulation in the draft "made it through the Council, the explanations of vote were likely to make it unequivocally clear there needed to be a second resolution".

565. In relation to a discussion about the political importance of interviews to the US, Sir Jeremy reported that the language on interviews would be unchanged. In response to his concerns that the draft language would make it harder to secure interviews and that Dr Blix was likely to oppose it, Ambassador Negroponte had said the arrangements were discretionary.

566. Sir Jeremy also reported that the French Mission had been pleased with the indications of US movement, but were likely to suggest France should "push for an amendment saying that the Council would convene immediately to 'consider any measures'". He had warned Mr Levitte that there would be "a very big reaction" if the compromise was rejected.

567. Sir Jeremy concluded that the new text had a "good chance of being a basis for progress so long as the French are not foolish enough to reject it". It was clear the US had "no appetite to give more ground".

[180] Telegram 1983 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 16 October 2002, 'Iraq: US Compromises and UK Intervention'.

568. Sir Michael Wood drew the Inquiry's attention to the "American compromise language" handed over in New York by Ambassador Negroponte to Sir Jeremy Greenstock.[181] It stated that the Security Council would:

> "… convene immediately, upon receipt of a report … [of a breach] in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all the relevant Security Council resolutions in order to restore international peace and security."

569. That paragraph remained virtually unchanged throughout the rest of the negotiation and became OP12 of resolution 1441.

570. Before a meeting planned for 17 October, Mr Straw sent a handwritten letter to Mr Blair addressing the differences of view within the US Administration.[182]

571. Mr Straw wrote that Mr Blair should read the record of his conversation with Secretary Powell, which would give him a "flavour of the intense and dangerous arguments in the Administration".

572. In response to Mr Blair's question about whether Secretary Powell was "winning", Mr Straw wrote that "he should win in the end", but Mr Blair had a critical role to play. Mr Straw advised that Mr Blair now needed "to give some clear messages" to President Bush that:

> "… we'll have to settle for a two resolution approach; that it is safe to do so; and that the non-UN approach being pushed by Cheney et al would be a catastrophe for the US, and whatever your personal sentiment, not something where you would get support, still less obtain legal authority. In other words, you need to tell him that you have politics too. At present, partly because they are mesmerised with your standing in British politics, they (White House) take your support for any US position for granted. This (a) is to misread your position (b) weakens people like Powell."

573. Mr Straw concluded:

> "David and I can work up a good case for two resolutions to put to Bush – not a climb-down or a wimp-out, but a way of squaring – and then cornering Chirac – by a private deal with him on the second resolution."

574. Sir David Manning spoke twice to Dr Rice on 16 October.

575. In the first conversation they discussed possible wording for the draft resolution which avoided conceding that the Security Council would "decide" on the action to be taken in the event of a report of a serious breach by Iraq and leave the question of a decision ambiguous.[183]

[183] Letter Manning to McDonald, 16 October 2002, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

576. Sir David and Dr Rice agreed that everyone knew that the Security Council would have to meet if Dr Blix reported that the Iraqis were in breach; and that everyone knew that the French could table another resolution at that point if they wanted to. Sir David told Dr Rice that "it was important to signal, through the new resolution, that the Security Council was united in its determination to support Blix and bring the maximum pressure to bear on Saddam to disarm. We had to go through this process."

577. Mr Powell asked, "Where does this leave us with the AG [Attorney General]?"[184]

578. Sir David responded:

> "Can't say at this stage.
>
> (i) Will almost certainly be the beginning not the end of the negotiation with the French.
> (ii) If we have a material breach in OP1 with an open OP10 (ie consultations) we shall still be in the same place with the AG as before – at least I presume so. Still better for us to get a pre-cooked second resolution."[185]

579. In the second conversation, Dr Rice told Sir David that the US had agreed to put new language "in play" while ensuring that it remained clear to everyone that the US would insist on safeguarding its freedom to act if the UN would not.[186]

580. Sir David Manning also wrote to Mr Powell, pursuing the idea that Mr Blair could suggest a private agreement to President Bush on the text of a second resolution authorising "all necessary means", which the UK would table at the UN Security Council "if and when appropriate".[187] Sir David thought it "could be a tough sell" but Sir Jeremy Greenstock thought it was "possible". Sir David added: "This would give us legal cover."

581. Mr Powell marked the minute to Mr Blair "to see".[188]

582. Mr Straw clearly expected that in response to a breach, a second resolution would be tabled.

583. In a conversation with Mr de Villepin on 17 October, Mr Straw encouraged France to accept the US language, including by pointing out that France could set out its interpretation in an explanation of its vote, "consider" was an active verb implying a subsequent decision, and a two stage approach would be required.

584. Mr de Villepin made clear that the decision would be made by President Chirac.

585. In the conversation with Mr de Villepin on 17 October, Mr Straw reminded him of his "undertaking not to veto" a second resolution "if Iraq were obviously in breach, and of his suggestion that France might participate in military action even if someone else had vetoed (following the Kosovo precedent)". Mr de Villepin had not demurred.[189]

586. Mr Straw told Mr de Villepin that Secretary Powell had "moved mountains to accommodate French concerns" and that the draft resolution "referred explicitly to a further meeting of the Council":

> "The US could not accept language requiring a further SCR, but they accepted that a further meeting implied a second SCR whether moved by them or other members of the Council. There was no need to spell this out …"

587. Mr de Villepin:

> "… described the new text as very good and a basis for final agreement. He accepted the need for some ambiguity, so was prepared to agree the verb 'consider' rather than 'decide', which he recognised was too much for the US. But … [h]e would like language along the lines of: '… consider the situation and any necessary measures to ensure full compliance …'."

588. Mr Straw warned Mr de Villepin that:

> "… pressing the US for more … risked making the best the enemy of the good … Levitte could use his EOV [Explanation of Vote] to explain the French interpretation, even if it were not possible to get the exact language they wanted. He explained at some length that, in English political language, 'consider' was an active verb implying a subsequent decision. It was a stronger concept than the French equivalent. He also explained that 'need' should be read as embracing 'measures'."

589. Mr de Villepin warned Mr Straw that:

> "… although he entirely took the point about the debate within the US Administration, he would have to persuade Chirac, who would probably want the text strengthened. For Chirac the second step had to have credibility."

590. In their further conversation, Mr Straw:

- Urged Mr de Villepin "to take Yes for an answer", which Mr de Villepin was reported to have "agreed; as soon as he got an answer from Chirac on 'measures'".

---

[189] Telegram 223 FCO London to Paris and Washington, 17 October 2002, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conversation with French Foreign Minister, 17 October'.

- Warned Mr de Villepin not to make an issue of the "material breach" language in OP1. That was "a matter of historical fact and, with the new OP10, no longer permitted the one stage approach France had feared".
- Told Mr de Villepin that the French position was "a matter of trust for the UK as well as the US. Villepin's reassurances about France's willingness to support and participate in military action if justified had empowered Powell to get the changes made in OP10. If France tried to get 'material breach' language out of OP1, those in the [US] Administration who opposed the UN route would argue that France could not be trusted on a second SCR."

591. Mr de Villepin was reported to have responded "somewhat half-heartedly" that "others in the Council opposed 'material breach' language … and that the SCR should focus on the need for inspections rather than looking back". He had not suggested it was a French "red line".

592. Mr Straw concluded that, if President Chirac "were willing to sign up to the new OP10 language, he would have more negotiating room … should he want to reach a private agreement on how to move forward".

593. In a statement for the Inquiry, Sir Michael Wood wrote:

> "Early the next morning (17 October) the Foreign Secretary ran through the new OP10 with the French Foreign Minister, saying in this context that the US could not accept any language requiring a further Security Council resolution but that they accepted that a further meeting implied a second SCR whether moved by them or other members of the Council."[190]

Mr Blair's meeting with Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, 17 October 2002

594. Mr Blair discussed the latest developments on the UN negotiations and the military options with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce on 17 October.[191] Mr Powell, Mr Campbell, Baroness Morgan, Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft were also present.

595. Mr Blair continued to take the position that a further resolution explicitly authorising military action would not be needed in all circumstances.

596. Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon concluded on 17 October that the only way to keep the US on the UN route was if there was a clear understanding that, in the event of a reported breach of the new UN resolution, action would be taken even if a second resolution could not be agreed.

---

[190] Statement, 15 March 2011, page 8.
[191] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 17 October 2002, 'Iraq: UN Route'.

597. The record of the discussion on the UN negotiations stated that the meeting had:

> "… concluded that the only way to keep the US on the UN route was for there to be a clear understanding that if [Dr] Blix reported an Iraqi breach of the first resolution, then Saddam would not have a second chance. In other words, if for some reason (such as a French or Russian veto) there were no second resolution agreed in those circumstances, we and the US would take action."[192]

598. The meeting also agreed that, "at the time the first resolution was passed", the UK:

> "would make three public points:
>
> (a) When the Inspectors returned, Iraq's obligation was not only to co-operate with them on access to sites etc, but also to provide accurate and full information about WMD.
> (b) If Iraq breached this resolution, action would follow.
> (c) In the meantime we could not assume a peaceful solution to the problem of Iraq's WMD, so we would outline the military preparations we were making. (It was important to do this only once the resolution was passed, and not before.)"

599. Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting was sent to the FCO. It was also sent to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the MOD, the Cabinet Office and various diplomatic posts.

600. Mr Campbell wrote that at the meeting, Mr Blair had felt that Mr Straw was "too close to caving in on the two-resolution route".[193]

601. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the meeting had:

> "… agreed … that there were clear objectives for the resolution, and those objectives were … the ultimatum goes into 1441. If he [Saddam Hussein] breaches the ultimatum action follows. So this was the instruction given."[194]

602. In response to Mr Hoon's request to tell the US that it could plan on the assumption the UK would make a land contribution, Mr Blair concluded that, while he wanted to keep the option of Package 3 open, the UK must not commit itself at that stage.

603. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 15 October, seeking a decision that week on whether to tell the US it could assume a UK land contribution in addition to the air, maritime and Special Forces package already offered for planning purposes.[195]

[195] Minute Hoon to Prime Minister, 15 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Military Options'.

604. Mr Hoon also sent his minute to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull.

605. The background to that request, the detailed arguments set out by Mr Hoon, the advice for Mr Straw and the immediate reaction in No.10, are addressed in Section 6.1.

606. In relation to the discussion of military options, Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce had:

> "… set out the options, as in the Defence Secretary's minute … of 15 October. CDS [Adm Boyce] put the military arguments for agreeing to Package 3. But if we were to end up agreeing on Package 2, it would be better to tell the US now. The Foreign Secretary said that the international case for Package 3 was strong."[196]

607. Mr Blair took "these points" but:

> "… remained concerned about the costs. He concluded that he wanted to keep open the option of Package 3. But we must not commit to it at this stage."

608. The meeting also "agreed that there must be no leaks and no public announcements (for instance any notices to Reserves) until after the first UN resolution had passed and after a further discussion" with Mr Blair.

609. Copies of Mr Rycroft's record of the discussion on military options were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Mr Straw, Mr Brown and Sir Andrew Turnbull, and to Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of OD Sec.

Cabinet, 17 October 2002

610. The discussion on Iraq recorded at Cabinet on 17 October, which focused on other foreign policy concerns, was brief.

611. The minutes record that Cabinet on 17 October was informed that discussions continued amongst the Permanent Members of the UN Security Council on a resolution on Iraq. The right balance had to be struck and progress was being made.[197]

612. Mr Campbell wrote that the discussion at Cabinet "was almost all foreign", including on the Middle East Peace Process, India and Pakistan, the bombings in Bali and the risk of further attacks.[198] There had also been a discussion of the firefighters' strike.

Legal views on the draft resolution

613. Mr Wood remained concerned about the references to the "Kosovo model" providing a precedent and that the draft resolution then under discussion did not have the effect of reviving the authority to use force.

614. Mr Wood wrote to Mr Chaplin on 17 October to express concerns about Mr Blair's statement, reported in the record of a conversation with President Bush on 14 October, that:

> "… the Kosovo model would allow a return to the Security Council for a further discussion in the event of a further breach by Iraq; but if there were UN inaction (i.e. no second UN resolution authorising the use of force) we would take action."[199]

615. Mr Wood was "concerned that the conversation does not take full account of legal advice". The legal justification for action in Kosovo was an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe which could not be prevented by any other means. That was not the position in Iraq. The "Kosovo model" was "no authority for a proposition that action would be legally justified if authority from the Security Council had been sought but without success". The facts available to Mr Wood did "not justify action in self-defence". "The use of force would, therefore, be unlawful unless authorised by the Security Council."

616. Mr Wood added:

> "There is currently no express authorisation to use force against Iraq, nor would a resolution on the lines discussed … give an implied authorisation based on the revival of the authority to use force contained in resolution 678 (1990). Subject to consideration of a final text (and the circumstances of its adoption), a finding of material breach in OP1 of the current text, followed by a long list of provisions detailing the action which the Council expects Iraq to take, together with a final paragraph which indicates that the Council would need to meet in the case of a further breach by Iraq, or some such, would not permit the revival argument. Rather, it would point to further action to be taken by Iraq, and then by the Council if Iraq were not to co-operate.
> "In my view, we need to write urgently to No.10 recalling the legal position."

617. When Mr Wood saw Mr Rycroft's record of Mr Blair's meeting on 17 October, he sent an "urgent and personal" minute to Mr Ricketts, stating:

> "The concerns in my minute to Edward Chaplin earlier today are reinforced by [the] record of the Prime Minister's meeting this morning, suggesting that 'if for some reason [such as a French or Russian veto] there were no second resolution … we and the US would take action'.

---

[199] Minute Wood to Chaplin, 17 October 2002, 'Prime Minister's Phone Call with Bush, 14 October'.

> "I have spoken briefly to the Foreign Secretary, who assured me that the Prime Minister understood that action could not be taken if the Attorney advised that it was unlawful …
> "The Foreign Secretary saw no point in writing again to No.10. The … record was … abbreviated … The Foreign Secretary had made clear to the Prime Minister the legal advice.
> "I think it is important, even if we do not write, that we ask David Manning to draw the Prime Minister's attention to your [Mr Ricketts'] minute of 2 [sic] October."[200]

618. Mr Chaplin sent Mr Wood's minute of 17 October to Mr Straw's Private Secretary, stating that he and Mr Wood had discussed the minute and, given the advice already offered to No.10, thought "it would be sufficient for you [the Private Secretary] to remind Sir David Manning" of previous advice, saying that it was strongly endorsed by FCO Legal Advisers and asking him to make that clear to the Prime Minister.[201]

619. A copy of Mr Wood's minute to Mr Chaplin of 17 October, with Mr Chaplin's comments to Mr Straw's Private Secretary, is in the Attorney General's files, with a manuscript note stating that Mr Wood had "handed over" a copy of his minute to Mr Ricketts to Mr David Brummell, Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, on the evening of 17 October.[202]

620. On 18 October, Mr Wood sought Lord Goldsmith's views on whether the draft resolution could have the effect of reviving the authorisation to use force.

621. Mr Wood wrote to Ms Adams with the most recent text of the draft resolution on Iraq on 18 October.[203] He drew attention to the key elements of the draft which were "particularly relevant to the issue of whether it could be regarded as authorising the use of force" against Iraq. Mr Wood stated that, as the Attorney General would be aware, a finding by the Council that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations under the cease-fire resolution 687, together with a warning that Iraq would face serious consequences in the event of continued non-compliance, "can have the effect of reviving the authorisation to use force". The draft, however, had to be "read as a whole" and other paragraphs gave "a clear indication that further action would be for the Council". Mr Wood's view was that: "Accordingly … this resolution cannot be read as permitting the revival argument."

622. Mr Wood concluded:

> "We would be grateful for any advice which the Attorney General may wish to give on the resolution as currently drafted and would, as ever, be happy to come over and discuss the matter."

LORD GOLDSMITH'S CONVERSATIONS WITH MR POWELL AND MR STRAW, 17 AND 18 OCTOBER 2002

623. Lord Goldsmith raised his concerns with Mr Straw on 18 October.

624. Mr Straw persuaded Lord Goldsmith not to put his views in writing until he had spoken to Mr Blair.

625. Mr Straw told Lord Goldsmith that he accepted a second resolution would be needed "unless circumstances changed", but he argued that could not be acknowledged publicly for tactical reasons.

626. Mr Straw subsequently advised Mr Blair that they should camp on the position they had both taken publicly not to rule out involvement in military action if circumstances required that and, for example, a second resolution were to be vetoed.

627. Lord Goldsmith spoke to Mr Jonathan Powell on 17 October to register his concerns about what Mr Blair was reported to have told President Bush on 14 October. Mr Powell suggested that he should speak to Mr Blair.[204]

628. Asked how Mr Powell had responded, Lord Goldsmith was unable to recall any further details of his conversation with Mr Powell than the details in the record of his discussion with Mr Straw the following day.[205]

629. Lord Goldsmith spoke to Mr Straw on 18 October.

630. Both Ms Adams and Mr Straw's Private Office made records of the conversation. There is a considerable difference in emphasis between the two documents.

631. Ms Adams recorded that Lord Goldsmith had told Mr Straw that "he was concerned by reports he had received" that Mr Blair had indicated to President Bush that "he would join the US in acting without a second Security Council decision if Iraq did not comply with the terms of a resolution in the terms of the latest US draft".[206]

[206] Note Adams, 21 October 2002, 'Iraq: Record of Attorney General's Telephone Conversation with the Foreign Secretary, 18 October'.

632. In Lord Goldsmith's view, the "draft would not be sufficient to authorise the use of force without a second resolution". He had made that clear the previous day to Mr Powell, who had suggested that he should speak to the Prime Minister.

633. Discussing the detail of the draft, Lord Goldsmith reiterated that he was "very troubled by the way things appeared to be going".

634. Ms Adams reported that Mr Straw had "explained the political dimension", his conviction that the "strategy of standing shoulder to shoulder with the US was right politically", and the importance of obtaining a "decent Security Council resolution". Mr Blair had said that the UK would act in accordance with international law:

> "That remained the position. The consequences of acting unlawfully were clearly unacceptable. But it was important not to suggest publicly that we had doubts about the proposed resolution. It would make the prospects of reaching agreement remote."

635. Mr Straw told Lord Goldsmith that he had made Lord Goldsmith's views on the legal position clear to Mr Blair.

636. Lord Goldsmith responded that he understood the politics and the importance of getting President Bush "behind" a UN resolution. He was:

> "… not concerned about what Ministers said externally, up to a point. The Government must, however, not fall into the trap of believing it was in a position to take action which it could not take. Nor must HMG promise the US Government that it can do things which the Attorney considers to be unlawful."

637. Ms Adams recorded that Mr Straw commented that he believed Secretary Powell "understood the legal position".

638. Recalling his advice to Mr Blair of 30 July, Lord Goldsmith told Mr Straw that he might "now need to send a further note". Lord Goldsmith:

> "… recognised that circumstances may change, but he wished to make clear to the Foreign Secretary that his firm view was that if a resolution was adopted in the terms of the present US draft, and if Blix subsequently reported to the Council that there had been a breach by Iraq, the resolution as it stands would not be sufficient to authorise the use of force without another Security Council resolution."

639. Mr Straw was recorded as suggesting that Lord Goldsmith might:

> "… not wish to commit himself on paper until he had seen the Prime Minister. There might be circumstances, for example, if Russia vetoed a second resolution in the face of clear evidence that Iraq was flouting the Council's demands, in which force would be justified on the basis of existing resolutions. The French had indicated that they would support such an interpretation."

640. Lord Goldsmith had agreed but "stressed that he wished to ensure that his advice was clearly on the record". Mr Straw had "assured" Lord Goldsmith that Mr Blair was fully aware of Lord Goldsmith's views.

641. Finally, Ms Adams recorded that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… hoped that, if there were any further meetings … at which decisions on the use of force were to be made, the Foreign Secretary would make clear that the Attorney ought to be present. The Foreign Secretary agreed."

642. The note of the conversation produced by Mr Straw's Private Office records that Lord Goldsmith told Mr Straw that the latest draft of the resolution "did not provide legal authorisation for the use of force".[207] In a discussion of the tactics necessary to persuade the US to take the UN route, Lord Goldsmith said he was:

> "… comfortable with what had been said publicly so far. He noted the Prime Minister's assurance to Bush that we would participate in military action should the Security Council route fail, but he took the Foreign Secretary's point that to maintain influence over the American approach, we had to demonstrate that we stood shoulder to shoulder. The Foreign Secretary reassured the Attorney that both he and the Prime Minister had explained our legal position to Powell and Bush who understood the constraints."

643. Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw agreed that discussions within Government "should take full account of the legal issues". Mr Straw "accepted" that "unless circumstances changed … we would need a second resolution to authorise the use of force" but "tactically, we should not commit ourselves to this externally yet". Mr Straw also pointed out that he "could envisage circumstances in which it might be possible to take action without specific Security Council authority", but "obviously the Government would need the Attorney's advice". Lord Goldsmith would be seeing Mr Blair the following week and he and Mr Straw would keep in touch.

644. The FCO record of Lord Goldsmith's conversation with Mr Straw was sent to Mr Ricketts. It was also sent to the Private Secretaries of Mr Straw and Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), Mr Wood, Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of FCO United Nations Department and other senior officials.

645. No record of the conversation between Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw appears to have been sent to UKMIS New York.

646. In his statement to the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith wrote that he had not had the opportunity to consider the draft resolution in detail before his telephone call to Mr Straw, but his view was that the draft was not sufficient to authorise the use of force.[208]

[208] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraph 2.2.

647. Lord Goldsmith explained that his telephone call to Mr Straw had been "prompted" when he had learned of Mr Blair's statement to President Bush (on 14 October) that he would join the US in acting without a second Security Council resolution:

> "I thought that such action by the UK would be unlawful and I felt strongly that there had to be recognition within government of the constraints under which we were acting, and we should not lead the US to believe that we would take action … I knew too that if we boxed ourselves into a corner that would make my task when I came to advise on the effect of the resolution more difficult."[209]

648. Lord Goldsmith confirmed that Mr Straw had persuaded him not to provide a note of advice until he (Lord Goldsmith) had seen Mr Blair.[210] Mr Straw had said that there might be circumstances in which the UK could proceed without a second resolution, for example if Russia exercised a veto unreasonably. Lord Goldsmith wrote that although he "was not persuaded by that example … it did make sense to him to have a discussion with the Prime Minister … before putting his advice in writing".

649. Intense discussions on the elements of a draft resolution continued.

650. Reporting a discussion on 16 October, Sir Christopher Meyer wrote that Mr Sandy Berger, President Clinton's National Security Advisor, thought that an attack on Iraq would be "very risky" and might destabilise a number of countries in the region. In addition, he "thought that, whatever the scenario, the British Government has got itself into the position where it would go with the US whatever the circumstances. 'The die is cast for the UK.'"[211]

651. Sir Christopher also reported that Mr Berger could envisage a situation where UNMOVIC might find "something nasty" and the US "would want to go to war", but others on the Security Council would say that it "showed inspections were working and that they should continue".

652. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell that that was "an inherent risk in the UN route"; and that: "Other routes were even riskier."[212]

653. Mr Blair and Mr Annan discussed the need to bring the discussions on a new resolution to a successful conclusion for all concerned on 17 October.[213] They agreed that: "If the UN handled this well, it would emerge stronger, and reinforce the international rule of law."

654. Mr Blair emphasised that the US and UK wanted to see the UN's will enforced. They did not want to see action on the slightest pretext but they were worried that in the event of a breach the UN might fail to act and lead us into another round of negotiation. We could not end up where we were before – ie Saddam Hussein ignoring the process.

655. In a letter to Sir Christopher Meyer on 19 October reporting two of Mr Straw's conversations with Secretary Powell, Mr Straw's Private Office recorded that he had:

> "… touched base with the Prime Minister, Jonathan Powell and David Manning … As well as running through this morning's exchanges they had a brief discussion of the implications should it not prove possible to secure a second resolution in the event of Iraqi defiance, which the Foreign Secretary noted that he had also talked over with the Attorney General."[214]

656. A copy of the letter was sent to Sir Jeremy Greenstock.

657. The FCO instructions to the UK permanent Mission in New York, issued on 21 October, stated that the latest draft of the resolution could not be "read as authorising the use of force, taking into account the draft resolution as a whole, including OP10, which gives a clear indication that further action will be for the Council".[215] The UK was keen that the full text of the draft resolution being discussed with the US should be shown to other P5 members "as soon as possible".

LORD GOLDSMITH'S MEETING WITH MR BLAIR, 22 OCTOBER 2002

658. Lord Goldsmith informed Mr Blair on 22 October that, although he would not be able to give a final view until the resolution was adopted, the 19 October draft resolution would not on its own authorise military action.

659. In response to a question from Mr Blair, Lord Goldsmith agreed to give "further consideration" to the implications of an "unreasonable veto".

660. The meeting between Lord Goldsmith and Mr Blair took place on 22 October.

661. Ms Adams advised Lord Goldsmith that Mr Straw's comments recorded in Mr McDonald's letter to Sir David Manning of 21 October made it "all the more important" for Lord Goldsmith to "place" his views "clearly on the record in writing".[216]

662. Ms Adams also provided suggested "Lines to Take" for Lord Goldsmith.[217] They:

- explained why the draft resolution did not amount to an authorisation to use force;
- dismissed the Kosovo "precedent" as: "Simply not relevant"; and
- reminded Lord Goldsmith of the 1997 advice, set out in her minute of 14 October, which identified the possibility of "exceptional cases" where military action might be taken without a determination by the Security Council.

663. On the last point, Ms Adams wrote:

> "It is impossible to give a firm view on this now. We should certainly not plan on being able to rely on such a justification. There does not seem to [be] wide support for military action among the wider international community at present."

664. Lord Goldsmith's aide memoire of the points he wished to make stated:

> "1. Anxious you know my legal advice
>
> 2. Note statements – political imperative
>
> 3. As it stands – will need a 2nd resolution (says so in Op10)
>
> 4. Need to express my view in writing?
> 5. [a reference to correspondence with an MP]."[218]

665. In his statement to the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith confirmed that the manuscript notes were an aide memoire made by him before the meeting of the points he wished to make.[219]

666. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "As it happened, we also discussed the legal effect of one of the other P5 members exercising a veto unreasonably."

667. No.10 did not produce a record of the meeting, but Lord Goldsmith's account was reported in a letter from Mr Brummell to Sir David Manning.[220] Mr Brummell wrote:

> "The Attorney expressed the view … that, as things stand at present and viewing the text as a whole, a resolution in the form of the latest draft seen by him (dated 19 October) would not on its own authorise military action … However, it will not > be possible to give a final view on the legal effect of the resolution until it has been adopted. Unless the Council's intent is crystal clear from the text (which seems unlikely), it will have to be assessed in light of all the circumstances, in particular any statements concerning the effect of the resolution made by Council members at the time of its adoption."

668. Mr Blair asked about the position "if, following a flagrant violation by Iraq, one of the other P5 Members perversely or unreasonably vetoed a second resolution intended to authorise the use of force". Mr Brummell's note records that Lord Goldsmith replied that it was "not easy to see how there is room for arguing that a condition of reasonableness can be implied as a precondition for the lawful exercise of a veto"; but he agreed to give the issue further consideration.

669. Mr Brummell wrote that it would "be important for the Attorney to be kept closely informed of developments"; and that: "The attitude of other Council members (and the wider international community) in response to any breach by Iraq will also be critical, i.e. whether there is general support within the Council and the wider community for military action to enforce the terms of the 1991 cease-fire arrangements as amended by the new resolution."

670. Mr Brummell concluded by stating that he had been asked "to make clear" that Lord Goldsmith would be "available for a further meeting at any time the Prime Minister would find this helpful".

671. Mr Brummell's letter was not sent to anyone other than Sir David Manning.

672. Mr Brummell's letter provoked concern from No.10. In a note for the No.10 file, Mr Powell recorded:

> "I spoke to the AG to make it clear that we do not expect records of meetings from other departments, especially from people not even at the meeting. We produce records should they be needed. Furthermore, this was a commentary on a draft UNSCR that no longer exists."[221]

673. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that, although the draft resolution he had discussed with Mr Blair on 22 October had, as Mr Powell had pointed out, been replaced, "none of these immediate changes affected the concerns" he had raised.[222]

674. Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "… I can't remember exactly what I said after 22 October [the meeting with Lord Goldsmith], but I should imagine I said, 'Well, you [Lord Goldsmith] had better make sure it does meet our objectives.'"[223]

The UK's draft strategic objectives

The preliminary objective for UK policy in Iraq agreed by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon in May, and recorded in Mr Hoon's minute to Mr Blair of 31 May 2002 (see Section 3.3), was revised in October 2002.

Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under Secretary Defence and Intelligence, told the first FCO co-ordination meeting on 6 September that, following a conversation with the Chiefs of Staff, he thought more work needed to be done on strategic campaign objectives.[224]

Mr Bowen sent a draft to Sir David Manning on 4 October, explaining that "Whitehall would find it helpful" to agree objectives "for the present phase of activity" and, "in particular, it would help us in formulating an information strategy".[225]

The draft stated that the UK's prime objective was:

> "… to rid Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and their associated programmes and means of delivery, including prohibited ballistic missiles (BM) … in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions … an expression of the will of the international community, with which Iraq has persistently failed to comply, thereby perpetuating the threat to international peace and security."

Other objectives included the desired end-state for Iraq,[226] to which "and providing effective and representative government for its own people" had been added; and restoring the authority of the UN. The draft also stated that: "Success in achieving our prime objective should help deter the proliferation of WMD and B[allistic] M[issiles] more generally."

The Cabinet Office draft identified the immediate priorities as:

- achieving "a tough new UNSCR";
- the return of inspectors to Iraq "under conditions which enable them to identify and eliminate prohibited WMD/BM material, associated equipment and activity";
- enabling UNMOVIC and the IAEA to institute a regime of long-term monitoring and verification measures to ensure compliance;
- maintaining "international solidarity behind the UN Security Council and support for effective … action" by UNMOVIC and the IAEA;
- preserving regional stability; and
- continuing to "make military plans and preparations in case military action" was required to "force compliance with UNSCRs".[227]

Mr Bowen advised that some had argued that the aspirations for the future of Iraq should be translated into the main objective. He had resisted:

> "… on the grounds that our purpose has been plainly stated by the Prime Minister as disarmament and because the effective implementation of that policy does not necessarily deliver our wider aspirations".

[227] Minute Bowen to Manning, 4 October 2002, 'Iraq: Strategic Policy Objectives'.

The objectives would also need to "evolve with changing circumstances".

Mr Bowen stated that the paper was not intended for publication: if Mr Blair was content, Sir David would "no doubt … arrange for it to be sent to DOP [Defence and Overseas Policy Sub-Committee of Cabinet] colleagues" (see Section 2).

Mr Bowen's advice was also sent to Sir David Omand, Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary and Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator, Mr Scarlett, and to officials in the FCO, the MOD and the Home Office.

Mr Ian Lee, MOD, Director General Operational Policy, sent a copy of the draft to Mr Hoon's Private Office, commenting that while the text was "helpful" it did not "go far enough in providing direction for current military activity and an information strategy".[228] Mr Lee did not expect the draft to move forward until there was a clear UN position.

Pointing out that there was "a good deal of contingency planning work going on in Whitehall to support action in the United Nations on Iraq", Sir David Manning wrote on 22 October to Mr McDonald and the Private Secretaries of DOP members to inform them that Mr Blair had approved the objectives enclosed with his letter, which "should help guide work in Departments for current phase of activity".[229]

The letter was also sent to the Private Secretaries to Mr David Blunkett (the Home Secretary), Mr John Prescott and Mrs Margaret Beckett (the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Secretary).

The objectives were unchanged from those proposed by Mr Bowen on 4 October.

The draft objectives underpinned subsequent policy statements both to explain the UK's position and to maintain the pressure on Saddam Hussein to comply with the demands of the international community.

Mr Straw formally announced the UK's objectives on 7 January 2003 (see Section 3.6).[230]

Discussion of the US/UK draft resolution of 23 October 2002

675. A telegram from the British Embassy Paris on 21 October, recorded that there was "universally positive" coverage in the French media of President Chirac's firm stance on Iraq, including a threat of the "first use of France's veto since Suez" and suggestions that he had forced US concessions over a two-step approach.[231] The media also reported some details of the textual negotiations.

676. President Chirac's stance was cited as the main reason for the jump in his popularity in the latest opinion poll from 52 percent in September to 57 percent. President Chirac was also given credit for the paragraph on Iraq in the Francophone Summit conclusions "defending multilateralism, the primacy of international law and the pivotal role of the UN".

677. On 22 October, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed French and Russian concerns that the draft text had reintroduced "automaticity" in the preambular paragraphs (PPs) and in OPs 1-3.[232]

678. Mr Powell suggested to Sir David Manning that it was "Worth bringing to the AG's attention. Shows Russians and French think OPs 1-3 [?] automaticity."[233]

679. Following the conversation between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell, the FCO told UKMIS New York on 22 October that it could confirm that the UK would act as co-sponsor of the resolution if that was what the US wanted.[234]

680. In the face of signs of mounting US impatience with the UN process, Mr Blair sought to persuade President Bush to continue to negotiate a resolution.

681. Mr Blair continued to assert that the UK would take action in the event of a further material breach by Iraq.

682. Mr Blair did not offer any caveats to reflect the views Lord Goldsmith had expressed.

683. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that, after the "difficult" discussions of the draft text between the P5 in New York on 22 October, Mr Blair thought the time had come to engage Foreign Ministers directly in the debate.[235] He had asked Mr Straw to talk to Secretary Powell "about a meeting at Foreign Minister level" early the following week. Dr Rice thought that was an attractive idea which she would discuss with Secretary Powell.

684. Mr Blair also thought "we should revisit the possibility of agreeing the wording of a short second resolution that the P5 would table if Saddam violated the terms of the first resolution". Sir David added:

> "If we could secure this, the French and the Russians would have acknowledged, in writing, that they would be ready to use 'all necessary means' if Saddam were again in material breach."

685. Sir David reported that Dr Rice had doubts:

> "… the difficulty would be that the French or the Russians would quibble over whether Saddam had committed a violation serious enough to trigger the follow up action required for the second resolution."

686. Dr Rice told Sir David that the objections raised by France in relation:

> "… to the language dealing with: 'material breach'; 'serious consequences'; and OP5 … were unacceptable to Washington. The US had gone a long way in meeting French and Russian difficulties. The earlier reference to 'all necessary means' had been dropped … there was agreement to go back to the Council to assess any Blix report of violations; and it was clear to everyone that a second resolution could be tabled by the French whatever the US and UK might prefer. The Administration could not give any more ground … on the substance. There had been lots of publicity about US concessions already. Today there were two editorials in major US newspapers … saying it was time for Washington to put down its draft resolution … either the UN backed the resolution; or the US went to war."

687. Sir David told Dr Rice that he "understood the political pressures" but the effect of tabling a resolution "on a take-it or leave-it basis would not necessarily be clear cut". France and Russia might table a resolution which might attract more support. In response to a comment from Dr Rice that the US and UK "would have to veto the counter-draft just as the French and Russians would no doubt veto ours", Sir David replied that was possible, "but deeply unattractive". That was why the UK had proposed discussion at Foreign Minister level.

688. Dr Rice told Sir David that the:

> "Essential elements for the US were:
>
> - Maintaining the references to 'material breach' and 'serious consequences'
> - Retaining the wording '… false statements or omissions … and failure by Iraq at any time to comply …'
> - Standing firm on the terms of the inspections regime
> - No further weakening of OP12."

689. Sir David stated that the UK's willingness to co-sponsor the resolution demonstrated that it was "in firm agreement on the elements" of the resolution, but he "accepted that there might be differences on where to compromise if there was a serious negotiation". That would be a matter "for the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary" whom he would consult. Dr Rice also said she would try to set up a conference call between herself, Sir David, Secretary Powell and Mr Straw.

690. Dr Rice concluded that France still seemed to misunderstand the US position, and its apparent belief that the US would, if pushed, concede was "mistaken". "Washington was ready to go it alone if it had to; and the consequence would be that the UN would be marginalised for a long time to come."

691. Sir David suggested that he was not sure President Chirac understood. It "seemed to him" that President Chirac's "grasp of the issue" was "uncertain, and sometimes emotional". Dr Rice should talk to the Élysée.

692. Sir David wrote that he had told Mr Straw there were "signs of mounting impatience in the White House with the whole UN process". He added:

> "Apparent evidence, too, that this is pushing the White House to consider putting the resolution down, and challenging the French (and Russians) to block it. Condi's mood this morning was that the US had made enough concessions. If the UN process failed, Paris and Moscow would be responsible for the broken UN china …"

693. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that he should tell President Bush to persist with the UN route despite the frustrations and that "real negotiations" were "just beginning". The domestic pressures on President Bush to do so were considerable. There was nervousness in Middle America about war on Iraq without UN cover, or without UK company. That gave the UK "leverage in the UN context".

694. In his conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair accepted that the negotiations in New York were in pretty good shape: the three vital elements in the resolution were material breach, the declaration of Iraqi WMD, and the tough inspection regime.[236]

695. Mr Blair's view was that those provisions should not be weakened. If they were agreed, the UK could accept a further Security Council discussion in the event of a breach, but "on the understanding that either this discussion would then authorise action or if it did not we would go ahead anyway".

696. To ensure that President Bush understood the UK position, Mr Blair underlined the importance for the UK of securing the first resolution.

697. Mr Blair also stated that he continued to think that tough inspections just might lead to the collapse of Saddam Hussein's regime.

698. A draft resolution agreed by the US and UK was tabled in the Security Council on 23 October 2002.

699. The US/UK draft resolution was presented to the full Security Council on 23 October.[237]

700. Delegations were invited to refer the text, "which remained a working document", to capitals.[238]

701. The key changes to the text agreed by the US and UK at the end of September are set out in the Box below.[239]

US/UK draft resolution, 23 October 2002

Key revisions in the text tabled in the Security Council by the US and UK on 23 October were:

- a new OP2 recalling that the Council had repeatedly warned Iraq that it would face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its objectives, replacing the reference to all necessary means in the initial OP10;
- a new OP4 deciding that false statements and omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq (pursuant to this resolution - the original OP2 provisions) and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of this resolution shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations;
- a new OP11, a revision of the previous OP9, directing Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to report immediately to the Council any interference by Iraq with inspection activities, as well as any failure by Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations, including its obligations regarding inspections under this resolution; and
- a new OP12, a revision of the previous OP10, deciding that the Council would convene immediately upon receipt of a report (in accordance with OP11) to consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all the relevant Security Council resolutions in order to restore international peace and security.

702. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that he had stated:

> "In terms of process this was the first time we … had a text worth putting down as [the] basis for discussion. The text gave Iraq a clear warning that it had a last chance to comply with strengthened UN inspections. This was a genuine offer … the co-sponsors were proposing two clear stages. No decisions on further action would be taken until inspections had been tested by UNMOVIC/IAEA, professional and independent bodies. If [they] reported problems, the text made clear that the Council would immediately meet to discuss the way forward – this was something the UK had wanted and which had not figured in previous drafts. The rest of the draft dealt with two main priorities: strengthening inspections so Iraq understood it had no escape but to comply; and underlining the serious consequences if Iraq did not comply, subject to OPs 11 and 12."[240]

703. Sir Jeremy added that he "hoped this was something the whole Council could support".

704. Sir Jeremy reported that while the French delegation had welcomed the progress since the initial draft to identify two, well-defined stages, there were still concerns that it contained "hidden triggers" for automatic military action. France also wanted the mandate for the inspectors to be checked with Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei. France had proposals for alternative text.

705. Russia had supported France and drawn attention to the importance of the practical arrangements set out in the letter from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 8 October.

706. China had also sympathised with the French position and stated that the Council should look for a solution by peaceful means, not authorising force in the resolution.

707. The Council agreed to discuss the draft on 25 October and to meet on 28 October to discuss the draft with Dr Blix.

708. Cabinet was informed on 24 October that negotiations on the UN resolution continued and progress was "slow".

709. Mr Blair said that Iraq would continue to be discussed at Cabinet, "including in due time the military options".

710. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 24 October that discussions with the Permanent Members of the Security Council and with others continued on a resolution on Iraq.[241] It was a long drawn out process and progress was slow.

711. In discussion a number of points were made:

- A strong resolution was required so that Saddam Hussein would understand that the disarmament of Iraq would be achieved.
- In the event of a breach of that resolution, the Security Council's response would determine its future reputation.
- If there was military action and Iraq responded with chemical or biological weapons, a humanitarian disaster could ensue.
- Effective disarmament of Iraq through inspection remained a possibility, as did the Iraqi regime cracking under the pressure applied.

712. Mr Blair stated that Iraq would continue to be discussed in Cabinet, "including in due time the military options". The Government must "keep its options open in responding to future developments" after a resolution was achieved.

713. Other members of the P5 continued to express concerns about key elements of the new US and UK draft resolution, primarily that it should not contain any triggers permitting automatic military action.

714. Mr Blair and President Chirac discussed Iraq during a meeting in Brussels on 24 October. The record of the meeting concluded that there was "no meeting of minds".[242]

[241] Cabinet Conclusions, 24 October 2002.
[242] Letter Rycroft to Sedwill, 24 October 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting with Chirac, 24 October'.

715. The following day there was a major disagreement between President Chirac and Mr Blair over reform of the Common Agricultural Policy. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

> "They had also had some pretty fiery exchanges on Iraq, TB telling him [President Chirac] that the US were going to do it so it depended [on whether] he wanted to be part of the equation or not."[243]

716. Discussions between Mr Straw and other Foreign Ministers and between Sir David Manning and Dr Rice, including on French ideas on the detailed text, continued.

717. Reporting discussions with a wide range of colleagues in New York, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said he had told Ambassador Negroponte that there was a case for putting the US/UK text into near final form ("into the blue") on 25 October, to pre-empt possible alternative texts being tabled by France or Russia. "Doing so would show that we were serious about not wasting time."[244]

718. Ambassador Negroponte agreed. The three compromise changes discussed with the UK on 23 October "were getting nowhere in Washington": "The main stumbling block was State Department lawyers."

719. Sir Jeremy stated that, as he saw the UK's position, "we had no fear of a second stage Council discussion. We would not be bound if, at that stage, the Council funked its responsibilities." He "did not understand why the US lawyers were frightened. This would simply mean taking the process to that point." Sir Jeremy "asked if UK pressure would help". He also suggested amending OP11 to require Dr Blix to report "any systematic interference", rather than "any interference".

720. Sir Jeremy reported that Ambassador Negroponte had also said Mr Lavrov had told him he had been instructed to make clear that the draft resolution was "unacceptable" and "Russia would veto".

721. Sir Jeremy commented:

> "The tactical manoeuvring is now getting sharp. Lavrov's veto threat is presumably agreed by Putin. My instinct is to regard this as hard negotiating … they [the Russians] would not veto on their own. But it makes clear that, whatever further concessions are squeezed out of the Washington system, the Russians will not vote positively.
>
> "The French text … is actually not bad from a UK point of view. We shall have to see what Washington makes of it. My guess is that there is probably one more round of > significant concessions, in the 'material breach' area to be had out of the Americans. I see our role tomorrow as being primarily a listening one … But I would like to see the Americans showing more teeth."

722. On 25 October, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the need to deal with views amongst other P5 members, that the reference to material breach in OP4 was a potential trigger for military action.[245] They agreed that the issue needed to be addressed.

723. During the discussion in the Security Council on 25 October Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that the draft:

> "… was a text about disarmament and nothing else. It was not, and would not be, a text that established a casus belli. The whole point was to make clear that Iraq had not complied, but … we were giving it a last chance to get this right through peaceful disarmament. OP4 did not establish that a false declaration or omission was, on its own, a casus belli. There were no triggers except as set out in OPs 11 and 12, ie requiring a second stage of Council business."[246]

724. Discussions also focused on whether the finding of material breach in OP1 would be framed in the past or present tense, and the need to make clear that it did not constitute a trigger for action.

725. Reporting informal consultations between Security Council members and Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 28 October, the UK Mission in New York advised that there was support for most provisions in the UK/US draft resolution. Both Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had emphasised:

- the importance of clear and unified support for inspections from the Council;
- UNMOVIC and the IAEA should choose their staff; and
- the modalities for the conduct of interviews should be left to the inspectors.[247]

726. There were foreseeable practical difficulties with interviews outside Iraq. Dr Blix was aware of the large responsibility placed on UNMOVIC in reporting Iraqi interference and failure to comply. Its reports would have to be accurate. But that would not mean war and peace were in the inspectors' hands – they would simply report to the Security Council, which would decide on the consequences.

727. FCO Legal Advisers continued to warn that the resolution might not deliver legal authority for military action and that the revival of the authority for the use of force was not a judgement which could be made by individual Member States of the Security Council.

728. The final amendments to the draft resolution were seen by FCO Legal Advisers and by Lord Goldsmith and his officials.

729. Lord Goldsmith also asked FCO Legal Advisers for information on the use and effect of a veto.

730. Mr Wood reminded Lord Goldsmith that the Law Officers had not excluded the possibility of action in the event of a failure to act by the Council, in "exceptional circumstances" where "the international community as a whole favoured action"; but they had reached no firm conclusion on the point.

731. Mr Grainger drew Sir Jeremy's remarks to Ambassador Negroponte to the attention of Ms Elizabeth Wilmshurst, FCO Deputy Legal Adviser.[248]

732. Mr Grainger wrote to Mr Chaplin on 31 October, stating that:

> "The effect of this resolution will be that it does not authorise the use of force, either now or in the event of further Iraqi non-compliance, and that it envisages further Council action if force is to be authorised (as recognised in OP12). Equally, the Council failing to take its responsibilities (i.e. not authorising the use of force when we believe that politically it ought to do so) would not provide a legal basis for the use of force."[249]

733. Echoing Lord Goldsmith's advice to Mr Straw on 18 October, Mr Grainger cautioned that "we must be careful not to give the US (or … others in Whitehall) a false impression of our understanding of the legal position".

734. Mr Grainger sent copies of his minute to Mr Pattison and others within the FCO, but not to the UK Mission in New York.

CIG Assessment, 28 October 2002

A global survey of chemical and biological weapons, produced at the request of the MOD, was issued by the JIC on 28 October.[250] It provided a general assessment of the practicalities involved in producing and using chemical and biological agents and an assessment of the capabilities of several countries. Its judgements in relation to Iraq are addressed in Section 4.3.

Decision to offer a land contribution to the US for planning purposes

735. The MOD advised Mr Blair on 29 October that its influence on US planning was reducing and the option to deploy UK ground forces was at risk of being excluded by default. The only way to avoid that was to offer Package 3 to the US for planning on the same basis as Package 2.

736. Package 3 could also significantly reduce the UK's vulnerability to US requests to provide a substantial and costly contribution to post-conflict operations.

737. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 29 October, to report that "US military planning [was] continuing, but increasingly assuming no UK Land contribution"; and that an option for a "significant land contribution" could be "sensibly kept open only by placing it on a similar basis" to Package 2.[251]

738. The MOD stated that Package 3 was:

> "… for practical purposes being excluded by default. If we are to keep the option open, and continue to have the strongest military cards to underpin our political influence, the Defence Secretary believes that we should indicate to the US that they should plan on the assumption that the land contribution would be available, subject to final political approval … It is also worth noting that, while Package 3 is significantly more expensive in itself than Package 2, making it available could significantly reduce our vulnerability to US requests to provide a substantial (and costly) contribution to post-conflict stabilisation operations."

739. The MOD letter and the advice for Mr Blair from Sir David Manning are addressed in Section 6.1.

740. On 31 October, Mr Blair agreed that the MOD could offer Package 3 to the US on the same basis as Package 2.

741. The decision to offer ground forces (Package 3) to the US for planning purposes was a significant step. Once the offer had been made, it would have been difficult to withdraw and constrained the UK's subsequent policy choices.

742. Mr Blair, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce discussed the MOD wish to offer Package 3 to the US for planning purposes again on 31 October.[252]

743. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair concluded that the MOD should tell the US that the UK was "prepared to put Package 3 on the same basis as Package 2 for planning purposes, in order to keep the option open; but that no warning should be issued to the Reservists at this stage". Mr Blair "should be consulted again before any such warning was issued".

744. Copies of the record of the meeting were sent to Adm Boyce, the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Mr Straw and Mr Brown, and to Mr Bowen.

745. The reasons for the decision to offer ground forces are considered in Section 6.1.

746. Sir David Manning raised the possibility with Dr Rice of delaying action until winter 2003 in view of the potential mismatch between the timetable for inspections and the US military plan, but there was no substantive discussion of that option.

747. Sir David Manning flew to Washington on 31 October for talks with Dr Rice, Secretary Powell and Mr Richard Armitage, US Deputy Secretary of State.

748. The record of the discussions sent to Whitehall stated that Sir David had "underlined the importance for the UK of a UNSCR" and had discussed the prospects for reaching agreement. The US was working on a revised text. Sir David had "a strong impression that the gap between [the US and France] had widened again".[253]

749. A separate private minute from Sir David to Mr Blair reported concern about whether the potential difficulties in reaching agreement with the French had been underestimated, and an assurance that President Bush understood the UK's political constraints.[254]

750. The other major issue discussed was whether a UK military force would be permitted to transit through Turkey.

751. Sir David Manning reported that he and Dr Rice had discussed the fact that "the UN inspection timetable was now out of sync with the timetable for possible military action beginning in early January". He had asked "whether we might now be looking at the second of the original 'windows' ie a campaign next winter rather than this". That had not been ruled out but the conversation had shifted to the prospects for internal regime change sparing the need for military action. The best chance of securing that was "a very tough UN resolution accompanied by threatening military preparations, in the hope that Saddam's system would implode under the strain".

752. Sir David reported that Dr Rice had been focused on events developing in a way which meant military action might not be necessary. He speculated whether that might indicate a shift in the US attitude. They had also discussed the possibility of issuing an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein and his sons to leave Iraq if he was in breach of the resolution.

753. In conclusion, Sir David reported that there had been a "pretty sharp change of mood over the past three months, perhaps fuelled by polls which show growing doubts among the US public, and a growing appreciation of the huge difficulties we shall face if we have to occupy … Iraq". He did not "want to make too much of this" but wondered if it suggested "a new wariness at the heart of the [US] Administration".

Final stages of the negotiation of resolution 1441

754. Cabinet was informed on 31 October that a UN resolution was likely to be agreed the following week.

755. On 31 October, Mr Straw told the Cabinet that the Security Council was in the final stages of the negotiation of a resolution on Iraq.[255] The text would need to meet French concerns that it would not provide a pretext for war and UK and US concerns to avoid too restrictive a formulation on what would follow an Iraqi breach of the resolution. The most likely outcome was a resolution the following week. The pressure to reach closure was "growing".

756. In discussion the need for the inspection regime to be tough and for existing defects to be rectified, and for the resolution to provide for further discussion in the Security Council, were raised.

757. Mr Blair concluded that a "robust resolution was required which would send a clear message to Saddam Hussein. If Iraq did not comply there would be further discussion in the … Security Council of the next steps."

758. Mr Straw told Mr Ivanov on 1 November that if Iraq did not comply, the draft resolution meant the issue would "have to go back to the Security Council to decide what action was required".

759. In a conversation with Mr Straw on 1 November, Mr Ivanov stated that efforts should be concentrated on two sets of questions:

- The provisions in the resolution on inspection procedures should reflect the views of Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei. In his view, that would be "difficult, but feasible".
- What happened in the event that a resolution was violated.[256]

760. Mr Ivanov was reported to be content for the resolution to contain references to previous material breaches:

> "But the resolution had to be careful about future material breaches. He did not want a situation where military action could be automatically sanctioned without further reference to the Security Council."

---

[255] Cabinet Conclusions, 31 October 2002.
[256] Telegram 583 from FCO London to Washington, 1 November 2002, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conversation with Russian Foreign Minister, 1 November'.

761. Mr Straw told Mr Ivanov that his "strong hope was that negotiations in New York would lead to a resolution that all sides could vote for", and:

> "… underlined that the resolution could not be used as a pretext for unjustified military action … the reference to 'all necessary means' had now gone. In its place stood OP11 and OP12. The issue would now have to go back to the Security Council to decide what action was required."

762. Citing the differences in view about the legal basis for the No-Fly Zones in Iraq, Mr Ivanov said he wanted to "avoid situations of ambiguity" and "repeated that he did not want to see the resolution … used unilaterally for military action".

763. Mr Straw responded that:

> "… there was no intention of using force unless it was absolutely essential. If the UK sought the use of force, then it was likely that Russia, France and China would want it too."

764. Following a warning from Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 1 November that there was a risk that China, France and Russia would veto the resolution, intense negotiations on the precise wording of the draft resolution continued between P5 capitals and in New York.

765. Reporting his discussions in New York on 1 November, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said that he had told the US delegation: "We could be close to a Russian/French/Chinese deal to exercise a triple veto because of OP4." (They were concerned that OP4 could be a trigger for military action.)[257]

766. Sir Jeremy questioned whether OP4 was useful given that: "With any negotiable OP4, the Council would have to 'establish' or 'assess' any material breach leading to potential argument and constraining our flexibility." He had suggested losing the OP and moving the reference "to false statements or omissions in the declaration" to OP11.

767. Mr Grainger sent a copy of the text of the US draft resolution of 1 November to Mr Brummell on 4 November, saying that Mr Wood would be in touch.[258]

768. The draft text of OP4 included text additional to the draft resolution of 23 October, stating that in the event of a further material breach, "the Council shall convene in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12" of the draft resolution.

769. The reference to the Council's warnings "that Iraq will face serious consequences as a result of continued violations of its obligations", OP2 in the draft of 23 October, had been moved to the end of the resolution, and became OP13 in resolution 1441.

---

[257] Telegram 2097 UKMIS New York to FCO London, [01] November 2002, 'Iraq Resolution: 1 November'.
[258] Note (handwritten), Grainger to Brummell, 4 November 2002, attaching text of US draft resolution.

770. The draft text also included a new provision deciding that "notwithstanding" the finding in OP1 that Iraq "remains" in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions, Iraq would be afforded "a final opportunity to comply" with its obligations.

771. That provision, which was designed to provide a 'firebreak' between the finding of material breach in OP1 and the rest of the provisions in the resolution, became, after further amendment, OP2 in resolution 1441.

772. Intense discussions on the precise wording of those and other provisions in the draft resolution continued between capitals and in New York.

773. A document setting out "a further update of the compendium of proposals on key paragraphs", reflecting discussions over the preceding weekend, was circulated with an email from Mr Pattison's office on the morning of 4 November.[259] That included an option for alternative additional text in OP4 to the proposal in the 1 November draft which stated: "and will be reported to the Security Council for assessment in accordance with OP12".

774. Mr Grainger immediately sent Mr Pattison's email of 4 November to Mr Wood and Ms Wilmshurst.[260]

775. A minute from Mr Ricketts to Mr Straw's Private Office on 5 November reported that the French were concerned about the omission of a reference to OP11 – as well as to OP12 – in OP4. That could be read as opening the door "further" to a report to the Council from a Member State for assessment in accordance with OP12.[261]

776. Mr Ricketts' advice was sent to Mr Grainger, amongst others.

777. Lord Goldsmith met Mr Wood and Mr Grainger on 5 November.

778. A letter from Mr Grainger to Mr Brummell later that day makes clear that Lord Goldsmith asked for further information on the use and effect of the veto by the Permanent Members of the Security Council.[262] The letter indicated that the discussion centred on the question of the legal effect of a veto of a resolution by a Permanent Member of the Security Council.

779. One of the questions on which Lord Goldsmith had sought further information was whether it would be possible to argue that a P5 veto had been cast on unreasonable grounds and therefore would not prevent a resolution being adopted. Mr Grainger's clear advice was that there was nothing in the practice of the Council or in the UN Charter to support that argument.

781. Lord Goldsmith drew the Inquiry's attention to a copy of Mr Grainger's note of 4 November in the files of the Attorney General's Office, which had "a manuscript reference" in the margin of OP4 which read: "and will be reported to SC [Security Council] for assessment in acc with para [11+]12".[263]

782. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that:

> "… it is not clear when that manuscript note was made. In any event I do not believe that I saw it and there was no request to advise on the effect of the words. I feel reasonably confident that if I had been asked about those words I would have said that they were problematic and would have argued for their removal. In the event, when I came to advise on the text after it was adopted, the words became of central importance and caused me much difficulty."[264]

783. In a conversation with President Bush on 6 November, Mr Blair reiterated his view that the clear message to Saddam Hussein must be that, if there were a further breach by Iraq, action should follow.

784. Mr Blair telephoned President Bush on 6 November primarily to discuss Iraq.[265]

785. The UK/US draft resolution was to be circulated later that day and Mr Blair welcomed its provisions for a tough inspections regime. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed making statements after the resolution had been adopted and the messages that would send to Saddam Hussein.

786. Mr Blair told President Bush that there was a chance, albeit a small one, that under the pressure and humiliation of inspections the regime might crumble. They "must play into that" and "be very tough, to encourage regime members to split off". A psychological profile would be useful.

787. Mr Blair said that:

> "… there must be a clear understanding that if there were a further breach action must follow; we should imply, without spelling it out, that if there were a veto in those circumstances, there would still be action."

788. In his subsequent conversation with Dr Rice, Sir David Manning reported that Mr Blair had told the President that he would point to the commitment in the resolution to consult if there were a violation, and underline that he would then expect the Security Council to act.[266]

789. In a discussion with Secretary Powell on 6 November, Mr Straw commented that the UK and US had got what they wanted, including "serious consequences".[267]

790. On 2 November, France proposed that the following words should be added to the paragraph:

> "shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations when assessed by the Security Council."[268]

791. The US then proposed:

> "… shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations and will be reported to the Security Council for assessment in accordance with OP12."

792. The resolution was finally tabled in the Security Council on 6 November.

793. The revised US/UK draft resolution was presented to the Security Council on 6 November.[269]

794. Lord Goldsmith saw the draft text.[270]

795. The omission of a reference to OP11 in the US proposal was a matter of concern to both France and Russia. Russia expressed concern that its omission created a casus belli before a reported breach reached the Security Council; France was concerned that OP4 should refer to OPs 11 "and" 12 lest it might be taken to imply that a meeting of the Security Council could take place, not on a report from UNMOVIC or the IAEA, but from a Council member.[271]

796. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that points raised in discussions between P5 Ambassadors included:

- Ambassador Negroponte said the draft resolution "was a genuine US effort to go through the UN and strengthen inspections – not to find hidden triggers". A resolution with P5 support "would give the clearest possible signal to Iraq".

- Mr Lavrov was disappointed that the draft did not take on board comments on a number of issues, but he had been instructed to focus on four:
  - "… 30 days was unrealistic for a declaration covering non-WMD chemical and biological programmes." That was "important given omissions … could trigger a material breach".
  - The draft language in OP4 "created a casus belli before the report reached the Council". He had been instructed to insist on the earlier French formulation, referring to a material breach being reported to the Council, "in accordance with Ops 11 and 12".
  - A preference for French language on Presidential sites in OP7.
  - The reference to restoring international peace and security in the draft of OP12 was not appropriate "(it was not clear it would need restoring)". He could compromise on "secure".
- Mr Wang Yingfan, Chinese Permanent Representative to the UN, shared Mr Lavrov's view on OP4 and was not clear what "assessment" meant in Chinese.
- Mr Levitte said that unanimity was essential. OP4 "had to refer to OPs 11 'and' 12, not 11 'or' 12": "'Or' could mean a meeting taking place, not on a report from Blix, but from a Council member. If this was the intention, the result would be conflicting reports from different Members. If reports were not sent through Blix or ElBaradei we would end up with a very ambiguous situation … He expected Powell and Villepin to address the issue."

797. In subsequent discussion, the US said OP4 created a distinction between an "automatic casus belli" and "automaticity for the use of force": "further failures to comply would constitute a material breach, but that material breach would result in a Council discussion". Ambassador Negroponte "clarified" that an omission in the declaration (required by OP3) "on its own would not constitute a material breach".

798. In a bilateral discussion with Ambassador Negroponte, Sir Jeremy suggested that "and" could be reinstated in OP4 but the use of "or" should be retained in OP12 (which provided for the Council to convene immediately upon receipt of a report in accordance with OP4 or OP11).[272]

CABINET, 7 NOVEMBER 2002

799. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 7 November that after the return of inspectors to Iraq, "tricky questions would arise about whether Iraq had breached its obligations and what steps should be taken".

---

[272] Telegram 2119 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 7 November 2002, 'Iraq: P5 Meeting and Contacts with Negroponte'.

800. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 7 November that the vote on the resolution on Iraq was likely to take place the following day and described its provisions.[273] The aim was to achieve unanimity, which would be a triumph for UK and American diplomacy.

801. In discussion, it was suggested that:

- public opinion in the US, which had in the past not been supportive of the UN, was now supportive of the multilateral approach;
- inspections had to be done properly and would need to be backed by a sufficient level of military threat to ensure Iraq's compliance;
- the facts of any breach would be reported by the inspectors, with the Security Council having to judge what the facts meant; and
- media speculation that pressure on Iraq was about access to oil supplies and that British companies would be disadvantaged was not helpful.

802. Mr Blair concluded that "after the return of inspectors tricky questions would arise about whether Iraq had breached its obligations and what steps should be taken". The resolution "should send a clear message to Iraq in terms of what the international community required and the consequences of non-compliance". The "need to move forward on the Middle East Peace Process had not been overlooked".

MR STRAW'S CONVERSATION WITH LORD GOLDSMITH, 7 NOVEMBER 2002

803. In preparation for a discussion between Mr Straw and Lord Goldsmith, Mr Wood wrote to Mr Straw on 6 November offering his view of the legal considerations.[274] Mr Wood emphasised that it was important that anything said by the Government, either publicly or to the US or others, was not incompatible with the position under international law. All statements, including Explanations of Vote and Parliamentary Statements, should be seen by the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers.

804. Mr Wood identified "the most difficult question on which doubtless we shall be pressed, is what the legal position would be if [in the event of a further material breach by Iraq] the Council 'fails to act' at a second stage". He wrote:

> "The first resolution [what became 1441] … does not itself authorise the use of force, or revive the authorisation to use force given in SCR 678. Although OP1 decides that Iraq has been and remains in material breach of the cease-fire resolution, the remaining paragraphs (and in particular OPs 11 and 12) indicate that the Council has decided to take action itself if the breach continues or if there are further violations. This is the case even though OP4 remains in the resolution.

---

[273] Cabinet Conclusions, 7 November 2002.
[274] Minute Wood to PS [FCO], 6 November 2002, 'Iraq: Legal Basis for the Possible Use of Force'.

> "If at a second stage the Council authorises the use of force, or uses language which revives the authorisation given by SCR 678 … the position will be relatively straightforward.
> "If, however, the Council is unable to take a decision at the second stage, whether because there are insufficient votes for another resolution, or a resolution is vetoed, there will be nothing to point to by way of revival of the authorisation to use force given in SCR 678. We have previously noted that this is not a judgment to be made unilaterally by individual Member States."

805. Mr Wood also addressed the position if the Security Council failed to act in response to a further material breach by Iraq:

> "The position that could arise if the Council 'fails to act' was … addressed, in hypothetical terms, by the then Law Officers in November 1997. After concluding that in circumstances then prevailing an essential precondition for the use of force was appropriate action by the Council, the Law Officers went on to say that they 'did not exclude the possibility' (though they reached no firm conclusion) that exceptional circumstances could arise in which it was generally accepted by the international community as a whole that Iraq had in effect repudiated the cease-fire and that a resort to military force to deal with the consequences of Iraq's conduct was the only way to ensure compliance.
> "Too much should not be read into this … The possibility raised in 1997 has not been relied upon and is not based on authority or precedent. In any event, the situation envisaged was a very narrow one where the international community as a whole favoured action but the Council decided not to act."

806. Copies of Mr Wood's letter were sent to FCO officials and to Mr Iain Macleod, Legal Counsellor, in the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York.

807. Lord Goldsmith saw the letter.[275]

808. Lord Goldsmith addressed the issue of an "unreasonable" veto in his advice to Mr Blair of 14 January 2003 (see Section 5).

809. There is no record of Lord Goldsmith's conversation with Mr Straw on 7 November.

810. In preparation for the conversation, Ms Adams advised Lord Goldsmith:

> "… the main purpose … was to make clear to the Foreign Secretary that he should not take it for granted that 'it will be alright on the night'."[276]

811. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that was the main purpose of the conversation with Mr Straw on 7 November; and he had meant that "they shouldn't take it for granted that, when it came to it and definitive legal advice was given, that it was going to be that we are in a position to take military action".[277]

812. Ms Adams also wrote:

> "A vote is expected at the end of the week. The draft … may change further … so you are still not in a position to give a definitive view of what it means (and of course we will need to wait and see what statements are made on adoption)."[278]

MR STRAW'S STATEMENT TO PARLIAMENT, 7 NOVEMBER 2002

813. Mr Straw told Parliament that the UK's objective was consensus on a tough resolution that left Iraq under no illusions about the need for disarmament.

814. The UK wanted a peaceful resolution to the crisis, and the best chance of achieving that was a clear and credible threat of the use of force.

815. If Saddam Hussein failed to comply, it was open to any member of the Security Council to table a further resolution seeking UN support for the use of force and the UK reserved the right to do so. But Mr Straw could not anticipate what could happen.

816. Whether military action was justified would depend on the circumstances. The UK reserved its "right" within international law to take military action if that was required.

817. Mr Straw made a statement to the House of Commons on 7 November.[279]

818. Mr Straw stated:

> "… our overriding objective is to disarm Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction through an effective inspections regime …
> "As one of the five Permanent Members of the Security Council, the UK has been determined to ensure that the UN emerges from this crisis with its credibility enhanced. During the negotiations, our aim has been to secure consensus on a tough resolution that leaves Iraq under no illusions about the need for disarmament …"

819. Mr Straw stated that the resolution used the full powers of the UN under Chapter VII of its Charter and that the "key points" included the finding in OP1 that Iraq had been and remained in material breach of its obligations, and that OP2 offered Iraq a final opportunity to comply.

820. Mr Straw also stated:

> "The text sets out the procedure to be followed in the case of failure by Iraq to comply; it requires in operative paragraph 4 that any further material breach … should be reported to the Security Council. It directs in operative paragraph 11 the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA to report immediately to the Council any interference by Iraq with their inspection activities of failure to comply with its disarmament obligations. It provides in operative paragraph 12 that the Council will convene immediately on receipt of a report of non-compliance in order to consider the situation."

821. Mr Straw stated:

> "Britain wants a peaceful resolution to this crisis, and the United States has shown by its engagement in the long negotiation over the past weeks that it too is committed to using the UN route in order to resolve this problem."

822. Quoting Mr Annan's remarks (on 16 October), Mr Straw stated that in relation to Iraq, diplomacy had to be backed by military force to succeed and that:

> "The more credible the threat, the more likely it is that Iraq will respond to the demands of the UN … The choice for Saddam Hussein is to comply with the UN or face the serious consequences."

823. Mr Michael Ancram, the Opposition Front Bench Spokesman on Foreign Affairs, asked for clarification on whether OP2 of the resolution meant that:

> "… in the event of non-compliance, no further resolutions will be required? Is it implicit in the resolution that action is already justified by the existing and continuing breach of Iraq's obligations?"

824. In response, Mr Straw referred to the provisions of OPs 1, 2 and 3-10, adding:

> "… under operative paragraph 11, the inspectors are under a duty to report to the Security Council if they come across any breach; and under operative paragraphs 4 and 11, the Security Council can – and will – resume its meetings to consider the circumstances if there is a breach.
> "I do not want to anticipate what will happen if there is a breach, except to say that although we would much prefer decisions to be taken within the Security Council, we have always made it clear that within international law we have to reserve our right to take military action, if that is required, within the existing charter and the existing body of UN Security Council resolutions, if, for example, a subsequent resolution were to be vetoed … I do not believe it will come to that."

825. Asked by Mr George Osborne (Conservative) if UN-authorised military action would require a new resolution if Iraq was in material breach of the resolution, Mr Straw replied:

> "The processes set out in the Security Council resolution are complicated … False statements or omissions or failure to comply, as set out in operative paragraph 4, will amount to a material breach, and any reporting by the inspectors may turn out to show a material breach. Then, under operative paragraph 12, the Security Council will meet to discuss the matter. Any member of the Council can table a resolution, and it remains to be seen whether the Security Council or individual members judge that a further resolution is necessary to deal with the material breach that is presented to them. It is complicated, but it is clear."

826. Asked if the British Government intended to table a resolution seeking UN support for the use of force in the event that Saddam Hussein failed to comply, Mr Straw replied that it was "open to any member of the Security Council … to put forward a resolution or resolutions" and that the UK reserved the right to do so. But he could not "at this stage anticipate what could happen".

827. Asked by Ms Ann Clwyd (Labour) about progress using international law to set up a war crimes tribunal on Iraq, Mr Straw replied:

> "We have been making as much progress as we can in respect of indicting war criminals in Iraq. I recognise my hon. Friend's feeling that is not sufficient and I will continue to pursue indictment in the United Kingdom … I speak to … Attorney General about this from time to time. I shall be seeing him again this afternoon for a further discussion. We certainly do not rule out an international tribunal trying Saddam Hussein and others in his Government for war crimes."

828. In response to other points raised by MPs, Mr Straw stated:

- "… any decisions that we make in respect of military action will be made within the context of the body of international law, of which Security Council resolutions form part, but not the whole."
- The "best chance of a peaceful solution to the crises" was "through unanimity of the international community and a clear and credible threat of the use of force" if Iraq did not comply. He remained "quite optimistic" that the process could work.
- The text did not define "material breach" because it was "a term of art familiar in international law".
- In relation to who was to decide if there was a material breach, it would "become patent [sic] whether there has been a material breach", and what followed would "in the first instance be a matter for discussion within the Security Council".
- If the resolution was passed unanimously, there would be "clear deadlines for compliance".

- Whether military action was justified in law "with or without a second resolution" would depend on the circumstances, which he could not predict.
- There was "now a great emerging consensus" which recognised that Saddam Hussein had "been in the most terrible breach of international obligations … and that the time had come to require that awful, terrible regime to put right those breaches".
- There were "no trip wires in the resolution"; the UK had "been extremely careful to ensure" that there were none.
- The UK was working on the basis that Saddam Hussein was "a liar and a cheat".
- He and Mr Blair were aware "of the anxieties of the public … about the prospect of military action", and: "Military action should never be used except as a last resort when all other possibilities have been exhausted."
- The UK "would prefer to stay with the UN Security Council route" but "must reserve the right, within our obligations under international law, to take military action if we deem that necessary, outwith a specific Security Council resolution being passed in the future". The UN Charter, Security Council resolutions and customary international law were the basis of international law, and judgements about whether military action was "necessary and justified" had to be made on "that totality".
- The prospect of military action was seen "very much as a last resort"; if the resolution was passed, the prospect of military action would recede.

Resolution 1441 (2002)

829. Following a series of discussions in New York on 7 November, the US and UK tabled a revised draft resolution.

830. An instruction to the UK Mission in New York agreeing amendments to the draft text was cleared with No.10 on the morning of 7 November.[280] That included an amendment to the text of OP4 to refer to OP11 "and" OP12, "while keeping 'or' in OP12" to "leave open the possibility of a member state, as well as Blix, making a report to the Council".

831. Mr Blair discussed the resolution with President Putin on 7 November.[281]

832. Mr Blair said that he "hoped that, through this resolution and the inspection regime, the issue of Iraq's WMD could be resolved without conflict". Mr Blair and President Putin also discussed the issue of who under OP4 would establish the material breach. Mr Blair told President Putin that if there were a breach by Iraq then we would come back for a further discussion in the Security Council. Our expectation would be that if there were a significant breach, the Security Council would authorise action.

[281] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 7 November 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Conversation with Putin, 7 November'.

833. Mr Putin proposed a joint EOV by the P5. Mr Blair was prepared to agree that, provided that the undertaking to consult was tied to an undertaking to act.

834. Following a series of discussions in New York on 7 November, which focused on Security Council unity and the need for a balance between safeguards on Council involvement, a clear warning of the consequences of non-compliance and the powers needed by the inspectors to secure the objective of Iraq's disarmament, the US and UK agreed the final changes to the draft resolution.[282]

835. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Mr Lavrov had sought an addition to OP4 providing for a material breach to be "reported [to] and assessed by the Council", and had also expressed concern that the "US wanted the whole Council to accept some unpredictable future event would constitute a material breach".

836. Sir Jeremy Greenstock subsequently stated that the purpose of the resolution was:

> "(i) to clarify and strengthen the inspections regime so that the disarmament of Iraq's WMD, in accordance with its obligations … could be brought to full and verified completion through this enhanced inspections regime; and (ii) to deliver the clear-cut warning, one final time, that failure to comply with its disarmament obligations would, in accordance with this resolution, including the procedures specified in OPs 4, 11 and 12, mean that Iraq will face serious consequences."

837. The US and UK also made clear that the resolution provided for a two stage process with the Council at its centre.

838. Following discussion with Washington and agreement with the UK, the US delegation introduced a revised text. The decision that a further material breach would be "reported to the Council in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12", not "11 or 12", in OP4 was described as a "substantial change". At the request of Russia, "secure" replaced "restore" in OP12.

839. Mr Lavrov had also asked the US and UK for confirmation that the "failures" referred to in OP4 related to WMD programmes, and to clarify whether they understood OP4 to require a report by UNMOVIC and the IAEA to the Security Council and then Council discussion.

840. On the last point, Sir Jeremy had responded that:

> "If there was a further Iraqi breach … the matter would return to the Council for discussion as required under OP12. We would then expect the Security Council to meet its responsibilities."

841. Resolution 1441 was adopted on 8 November by a unanimous vote of the members of the Security Council.

---

[282] Telegram 2128 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 8 November 2002, 'Iraq Resolution: 7 November'.

842. The preambular paragraphs (PPs 1-18) set out the relevant Security Council resolutions and the obligations they imposed on Iraq.[283] The resolution:

- recognised that Iraq's non-compliance with existing obligations imposed by the Security Council, in relation to WMD and long range missiles, posed a threat to international peace and security (PP3);
- recalled that resolution 678 (1990) had authorised Member States to use all necessary means to uphold and implement the relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area (PP4);
- expressed the Council's determination to secure full compliance with its decisions (PP17); and
- stated that it was acting under Chapter VII of the Charter (PP18).

843. A summary of the key operative paragraphs is in the Box below.

Resolution 1441 (2002): summary of key operative paragraphs

- Iraq "has been and remains in material breach of … relevant resolutions, including Resolution 687 (1991)", the "cease-fire" resolution (OP1).
- Iraq had "a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations". The Security Council had decided to set up "an enhanced inspection regime with the aim of bringing to full and verified completion the disarmament process established by … resolutions of the Council" (OP2).
- Iraq "shall provide … not later than 30 days from the date of this resolution, a currently accurate, full and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes to develop chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, ballistic missiles and other delivery systems … including any holdings and precise locations of such weapons, components, sub-components, stocks of agents, and related material and equipment, the locations and work of its research, development and production facilities, as well as all other chemical, biological, and nuclear programmes, including any which it claims are for purposes not related to weapon production or material" (OP3).
- "[F]alse statement or omissions in the declarations … and failure by Iraq … to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution shall constitute a further material breach" which would be "reported to the Council for assessment in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12" (OP4).
- Iraq "shall provide UNMOVIC and the IAEA with immediate, unimpeded, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all, including underground, areas, facilities, buildings, equipment, records, and means of transport which they wish to inspect, as well as immediate, unimpeded, unrestricted and private access to all officials and other persons whom … wish to interview in the mode or location of UNMOVIC's or the IAEA's choice … inside or outside of Iraq … without the presence of observers from the Iraqi Government". UNMOVIC was instructed, and the IAEA requested, "to resume inspections no later than 45 days" following adoption of the resolution and "to update the Council 60 days thereafter" (OP5).

- The contents of the letter of 8 October 2002, from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to General Amir al-Sa'adi, the Scientific Adviser to the Iraqi Presidency, setting out the rights of the inspectors agreed in talks in Vienna [1 October], would be "binding" (OP6).
- UNMOVIC and the IAEA were given specified "revised or additional authorities … to facilitate their work in Iraq" which were "binding upon the Iraq" (OP7).
- Iraq was prohibited from taking or threatening hostile acts against any representative of the UN, IAEA or Member State taking action to uphold any Council resolution (OP8).
- Iraq was given seven days to confirm "its intention to comply fully" with the resolution and to co-operate "immediately, unconditionally, and actively with UNMOVIC and the IAEA" (OP9).
- Member States were requested to "give full support to UNMOVIC and the IAEA in the discharge of their mandates" (OP10).
- Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei were directed to "report immediately to the Council any interference … with inspection activities, as well as any failure by Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations" (OP11).
- The Council would "convene immediately upon receipt of a report" of any failure by Iraq to comply with its obligations under OP4 or OP11 "in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all of the relevant … resolutions in order to secure international peace and security" (OP12).
- Iraq would "face serious consequences" as a result of its continued violations of its obligations (OP13).
- The Security Council would "remain seized of the matter" (OP14).

844. After the vote, Mr Annan stated that the resolution had "strengthened the cause of peace and given renewed impetus to the search for security in an increasingly dangerous world".[284] He urged the Iraqi leadership to "seize this opportunity" provided by the resolution and reiterated his statement of 12 September 2002 that: "If Iraq's defiance continues, however, the Security Council must face its responsibilities."

845. Mr Annan stated that the road ahead would be "difficult and dangerous". For the inspectors to succeed, they would "require full and unconditional co-operation on the part of Iraq and the continued determination of the international community to pursue its common aim in a united and effective manner". The goal was to "ensure the peaceful disarmament of Iraq in compliance with Security Council resolutions" and "a better, more secure future for its people".

846. Mr Annan concluded: "How this crisis is resolved will affect greatly the cause of peace and security in the coming years, in the region and in the world."

[284] UN Security Council, '4644th Meeting Friday 8 November 2002' (S/PV.4644).

Explanations of Vote

847. Reflecting the need for ambiguity to secure consensus, the UK's Explanation of Vote did not directly address the issue of whether there should be a further resolution and decision by the Security Council, stating only that, in the event of a report of a further breach, the UK "would expect the Security Council to meet its responsibilities".

848. As Sir Jeremy Greenstock had predicted, each member of the Security Council made a statement explaining the basis for its vote, and in a number of cases its interpretation of the provisions of the resolution.[285] Many Member States, including the US and the UK, stressed that resolution 1441 did not provide "automaticity" for the use of force.

849. Referring to his statement on 17 October, during the Security Council's open debate on Iraq, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that there was "no shadow of doubt" that Iraq had defied the UN and had sought to hinder and frustrate inspections since 1991.

850. Sir Jeremy also stated:

- "With the adoption of this resolution the Security Council has clearly stated that the United Nations will no longer tolerate this [Iraq's] defiance." Iraq was "being given a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations; a final opportunity to remedy its material breach of resolution 687". The regime in Baghdad faced "an unequivocal choice: between complete disarmament and the serious consequences indicated in paragraph 13" of the resolution.
- The unanimous support of Council members sent the most powerful signal that Iraq could no longer evade its obligations.
- Because of the strength of that signal there was "at last a chance" that Iraq would "finally comply … and that military action can be averted".
- The provisions agreed in the resolution made the practical arrangements set out by the inspectors legally binding. That would "reinforce international confidence in the inspectors". It would also, he hoped, "lead Iraq away from a fatal decision to conceal weapons of mass destruction".
- The Council had "heard loud and clear … the concerns about 'automaticity' and 'hidden triggers' – the concern that on a decision so crucial we should not rush into military action; that on a decision so crucial any Iraqi violations should be discussed by the Council".
- As a co-sponsor of the resolution, the UK would be "equally clear in response". There was: "… no 'automaticity' in this resolution. If there is a further Iraqi breach of its disarmament obligations, the matter will return to the Council for discussion as required in paragraph 12." The UK "would [then] expect the Security Council to meet its responsibilities".

[285] UN Security Council, '4644th Meeting Friday 8 November 2002' (S/PV.4644).

- "Ultimately" the choice lay with Iraq "whether to take the peaceful route to disarmament". The UK hoped it would do so: disarmament "by peaceful means" remained "the UK's firm preference".
- If Iraq chose "defiance and concealment, rejecting the final opportunity" it had been given, the UK "together, we trust with other Members of the Security Council" would "ensure that the task of disarmament required by the resolutions" was "completed".

851. Key points made by other members of the Security Council in their EOV are set out in Table 1 in the order in which they were made.

USA	"By this resolution we are now united in trying a different course … to send a clear message to Iraq insisting on disarmament … or face the consequences. "… This resolution is designed to test Iraq's intentions … Every act of Iraqi non-compliance will be a serious matter, because it would tell us that Iraq has no intention of disarming. "… this resolution contains no 'hidden triggers' and no 'automaticity' with respect to the use of force. If there is a further Iraqi breach, reported to the Council by UNMOVIC, the IAEA or a Member State, the matter will return to the Council for discussions as required in paragraph 12. The resolution makes clear that any Iraqi failure to comply is unacceptable and that Iraq must be disarmed … If the Security Council fails to act decisively in the event of further Iraqi violations, this resolution does not constrain any Member State from acting to defend itself against the threat posed by Iraq or to enforce relevant United Nations resolutions and protect world peace and security."
France	"The Resolution strengthens the role and authority of the Security Council. That was the main and constant objective of France … reflected in our request that a two-stage approach be established and complied with, ensuring that the Security Council would maintain control of the process at each stage. "That objective has been attained: in the event that … UNMOVIC or the … IAEA reports to the Security Council that Iraq has not complied with its obligations, the Council would meet immediately to evaluate the seriousness of the violations and draw the appropriate conclusions. France welcomes the fact that all ambiguity on this point and all elements of automaticity have disappeared from the resolution. … "This resolution represents a success for the Security Council and the United Nations …

Country	Extracts from Explanations of Vote (EOV)
France (continued)	"It is against that backdrop, and through collective responsibility, that the efforts of the international community to disarm Iraq should be carried out. War can only be the last recourse. The rules of the game spelled out by the Security Council are clear and demanding and require the unfailing co-operation of Iraqi leaders. If Iraq wants to avoid confrontation it must understand that this is its last opportunity."
Mexico	"The resolution just adopted is the result of negotiations in which those who called for automatic recourse to the use of force agreed to give Iraq one last chance to voluntarily, immediately and unconditionally comply with Security Council resolutions … [T]his resolution also constitutes progress, as it eliminates the concept of automaticity in the use of force in response to a serious violation without the explicit agreement of the Council. "We welcome the fact that the two-stage approach has been accepted … [A]ny decision in response to possible material breach by Iraq … will have to be taken on the basis of two prerequisites. "… The first stage would entail a credible process to evaluate Iraq's true military capability and its intentions to use its weapons or the ability of terrorist groups to have access to them. The second … would entail the agreement of the Security Council and other States involved on the measures to be adopted if the evaluation process detects a threat to international peace and security. … "… We emphasise the importance that the Security Council decisions taken in this connection must continue to comply with the principles of the Charter and international law on the basis of objectively verifiable facts. "We reiterate the belief reflected in the agreed text that the possibility of the use of force is valid only as a last resort, with prior explicit authorisation required from the Security Council. "… the resolution stipulates that should Iraq fail to comply, it will be the inspectors who will report to the Council. This multilateral body will then determine the nature of the failure to comply, judge whether international peace and security have been imperilled, and then decide what is appropriate under the … Charter."
Ireland	"… we welcome the assurances given by the sponsors that their purpose in presenting this resolution was to achieve disarmament through inspections and not to establish a basis for the use of military force … … "… the resolution … offers the most likely means of securing Iraq's voluntary compliance … avoiding a military conflict and preserving the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security … "The resolution provides for a clear, sequential process whereby … UNMOVIC or the … IAEA will give the Council its assessment of any material breach or alleged material breach of Iraq's obligations … The matter will then be fully examined by the Security Council itself.

Country	Extracts from Explanations of Vote (EOV)
Ireland (continued)	"As far as Ireland is concerned, it is for the Council to decide on any ensuing action … we are confident that, should it be necessary, the Council will … face its responsibilities. "… As the concept of material breach is a key element of this resolution … Ireland's understanding of this concept is in accordance with the definition contained in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: 'the violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object or purpose of the treaty … We fully expect this same definition to be applied in determining whether any further material breach has occurred, should it become necessary to do so."
Russia	"… our delegation participated constructively in work on additional procedures for inspections that would ensure there would be no resumption of Iraqi programmes for weapons of mass destruction and at the same time would create the conditions for a comprehensive settlement of the situation around Iraq, including the lifting of sanctions. "At all stages … we were guided by the need to direct the process of a settlement onto a diplomatic and political path and not to allow a military scenario … the resolution … contains no provisions for the automatic use of force. It is important that the resolution's sponsors today officially confirmed … that that is their understanding and that they provided an assurance that the resolution's objective is the implementation of existing Security Council decisions concerning Iraq through inspections … "… it is of fundamental importance that the resolution clearly confirms that all Members of the United Nations respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq … It also confirms the need for full implementation of resolution 1382 (2001), whereby all members of the Security Council undertook to seek a comprehensive settlement … which assumes the lifting of sanctions. … "The … wording is not ideal … but that reflects the very complicated nature of the compromise that was reached. The Russian Federation made a choice … What is most important is that the resolution deflects the direct threat of war and that it opens the road towards further work in the interests of a political diplomatic settlement. "It is particularly important that … in the event of any kind of disagreement over disarmament matters, it is the heads of UNMOVIC and of the IAEA who will report … to the Security Council, and that it is the Council that will consider the situation … … "Implementation … will require goodwill … the willingness to concentrate on moving forward towards the declared common goals, not yielding to the temptation of unilateral interpretation of the resolution's provisions and preserving the consensus and unity of all members of the … Council."
Bulgaria	"This Resolution is not a pretext for automatic recourse to the use of force … "My country welcomes the fact that the resolution categorically reaffirms the centrality of the Security Council in our decision-making process."

Country	Extracts from Explanations of Vote (EOV)
Syria	"Syria voted in favour … having received reassurances … that it would not be used as a pretext for striking against Iraq and does not constitute a basis for any automatic strikes against Iraq. The resolution should not be interpreted … as authorising any State to use force. It reaffirms the central role of the Security Council in addressing all the phases of the Iraqi issue. "Syria has also received reassurances from the Permanent Members of the … Council that the resolution strengthens the mandate of the international inspectors; that it serves the objective of preserving Iraq's sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability and that it will lead to a comprehensive solution of the Iraqi issue."
Norway	"… we commit ourselves to using the Security Council to resolve a serious crisis and thus signal our determination to uphold the authority of the Organisation and respect for international law. "… In case of Iraqi non-compliance, the resolution sets out a procedure whereby the Security Council will convene immediately in order to secure international peace and security."
Singapore	"It makes clear that Iraq will be given a full and final opportunity to comply with its obligations under the relevant resolutions … "The difference between successful and unsuccessful inspections may be the difference between peace and war …"
Colombia	"We insisted on preserving the central role of the Security Council … This resolution is not, nor could it be at this time, a resolution to authorize the use of force."
Cameroon	"My country welcomes the clear statements … by the sponsors spelling out the fact that the resolution … does not contain traps or automaticity … they are working, and will always work, for the centrality of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security."
Guinea	"My country … reaffirms the unity and the role of the Security Council as the guarantor of international peace and security."
Mauritius	"We are pleased to see the clear and unambiguous role of the Security Council and the maintenance and promotion of international peace and security through peaceful means."
China	"China stands firmly for a peaceful solution to the question of Iraq, through political and diplomatic means and within the framework of the United Nations. "China has consistently held that, in seeking a comprehensive settlement of the question of Iraq, the sovereignty and territorial integrity as well as the legitimate concerns of Iraq should be respected … … "China supports the two-stage approach … the sponsors of the draft resolution accommodated our concerns, and the Council members have finally reached consensus.

Country	Extracts from Explanations of Vote (EOV)
China (continued)	"… the purpose of the resolution is to achieve the disarmament of Iraq through effective inspections. The text no longer includes automaticity for authorising the use of force … only upon receipt of a report by UNMOVIC and the IAEA on Iraq's non-compliance and failure to co-operate fully in the implementation of the resolution, will the Security Council consider the situation and take a position. … "The Security Council bears the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security – a responsibility that is entrusted to it by the Charter. Now the … Council has adopted this important resolution … we hope it will contribute to preserving the authority of the Council, facilitate a political settlement … and enable an early return of the … inspectors to Iraq. … "We would also like to point out that the … inspectors should draw lessons from the United Nations Special Commission. We trust that UNMOVIC and the IAEA will strictly abide by the mandate provided by the … Council … and faithfully fulfil its duties."

Statements by the Permanent Members of the Security Council

852. China, France and Russia made a joint statement that, in the event of a report of a further material breach, it would "be for the Security Council to take a position on the basis of that report".

853. China, France and Russia also issued a joint statement outlining their interpretation of the resolution:

> "Resolution 1441 (2002) adopted today by the Security Council excludes any automaticity in the use of force. In this regard, we register with satisfaction the declarations of the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom confirming this understanding in their explanations of vote, and assuring that the goal of the resolution is the full implementation of the existing Security Council resolutions on disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. All Security Council members share this goal.
> "In case of failure by Iraq to comply with its obligations, the provisions of paragraphs 4, 11 and 12 will apply. Such failure will be reported to the Security Council by the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC or the Director General of the IAEA. It will then be for the Council to take a position on the basis of that report.

> "Therefore, the Resolution fully respects the competences of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations."[286]

854. Sir John Holmes told the Inquiry that President Chirac's "overriding objective throughout this period … was to prevent war with Iraq because he did not believe that it was justified".[287]

855. Sir John added that the wider French objectives were:

> "… to get the inspectors back in, to make sure that there was going to be no automaticity … [there] had to be a subsequent decision by the Security Council, and there should be no hidden triggers in 1441, which would allow the Americans and the British to claim that somehow they had legitimised military action when they hadn't."[288]

856. Sir John was very clear that France had deliberately accepted ambiguity about the need for a further decision by the Security Council:

> "… if the language could have been more explicit about that they would have liked that, but they accepted weaker language in the interests in the end of getting a result, and I think the other objective they did share at that point was getting the international community united about something, which of course 1441 did, however temporarily, because everybody was on board and, therefore, they thought that was a difficult negotiation, but a successful one, from their point of view, at the end of the day."[289]

857. Sir John stated:

> "Well of course they [the French] knew what they were agreeing to, that there was no actual decision to have a second resolution … their preference always was, because the main concern was to avoid automaticity, therefore, the main concern was to be sure that you had to go back to the Security Council. Now, what that meant, whether it meant a resolution or not was perhaps less important to them, which is why they conceded the language at the end of the day, than the fact that you had to go back there and the fact that 1441 could not be considered of itself as a sufficient legitimisation by the Security Council of military action … everybody knew that this was ambiguous. This was the best language that could be achieved in the circumstances … [but] it did leave a central area of doubt about what exactly would happen should Saddam Hussein be determined to be in a further material breach … they knew what they meant in their heads by that, and we knew what we meant in our heads by that, but that's the nature of a negotiation like that. You come up with some language that can encapsulate both those things simultaneously, but it doesn't remove the ambiguity."[290]

858. Asked whether the French position had remained that the use of force could only be authorised by a decision of the Security Council, Sir John replied that was essentially the French position, but:

"They were a little bit wary about articulating that as clearly as they might have done, and I think that's because, like us, they had always had this concern, a broader concern, not related to any particular situation, that they didn't want to be in a position where military action in the modern world could only be authorised by the Security Council."[291]

859. Mr Blair's statement of 8 November focused on the decision made by the UN that Iraq must comply with its obligations, and the choice for Saddam Hussein of whether to disarm willingly.

860. Mr Blair also stated that he hoped that disarmament would be achieved peacefully.

861. In a statement issued on 8 November, Mr Blair expressed delight that the Security Council had risen to the challenge and, by unanimously adopting resolution 1441, it had "made clear beyond doubt" that Iraq had to comply with its obligations to the UN.[292]

862. Mr Blair stated:

- Iraq's obligation was to co-operate with the weapons inspectors. It was "not a game of hide and seek, where the inspectors try their best to find the weapons and Saddam does his best to conceal them".
- The "duty of co-operation" meant "not just access but information. Failure to be open and honest in helping the inspectors … is every bit as much a breach as failure to allow access to sites."
- The survival of Saddam Hussein's regime was "in his hands". Conflict was "not inevitable". Disarmament was.
- In the event of Saddam refusing to co-operate or a breach, there would be "a further UN discussion". There was no "automatic trigger" in the resolution.
- "But everyone now accepts that if there is a default … the international community must act to enforce its will. Failure to do so would mean, having stated our clear demand, we lacked the will to enforce it."

- He hoped the issue could be "resolved peacefully". "From the outset" he had wanted the issue "resolved through the UN with the international community acting together": "We have made our choice: disarmament through the United Nations, with force as a last resort."
- The message to Saddam Hussein was "disarm or you face force. There must be no more games, no more deceit, no more prevarication, obstruction or defiance."

863. Mr Blair also stated that there was no quarrel with the Iraqi people; and that: "Whatever happens, the territorial integrity of Iraq will be absolute."

864. Mr Blair concluded that he hoped "an Iraq free of WMD" and a "Government unable to use them to oppress its people and its neighbours" was "a symbol of change … and hope for the future".

865. President Bush emphasised that Iraq's co-operation would need to be "prompt and unconditional" or it would "face the severest consequences". "Any act of delay or defiance" would be "a clear signal" that the Iraqi regime had "abandoned the path of voluntary compliance".

866. The US had "agreed to discuss any material breach with the Security Council, but without jeopardising" its "freedom of action to defend our country".

867. The US was determined not to allow anything in a new resolution which would detract from the authorities to use force it believed it had.

868. Reporting conversations with senior officials in the US Administration on 7 November, Mr Brenton wrote that the hawks in Washington saw the resolution as a defeat and warned that they would be "looking for the least breach of its terms as a justification for resuming the countdown to war".[293] They had also discussed the issue of the supervision of the oil sector "post occupation".

869. In remarks to the press on the adoption of resolution 1441, President Bush stated that Saddam Hussein had been "given clear and fair notice" that:

- he "must fully disclose and destroy his weapons of mass destruction";
- he "must submit to any and all methods to verify his compliance"; and
- co-operation "must be prompt and unconditional or he will face the severest consequences".[294]

870. President Bush added that the Iraqi regime had "treated its own pledge" to disarm "with contempt" since 1991. Iraq was already in material breach of its obligations and had "aggressively pursued weapons of mass destruction, even while inspectors were inside the country". The world had learned "an essential lesson" from that experience:

> "… inspections will not result in a disarmed Iraq unless the Iraqi regime fully co-operates. Inspectors do not have the power to disarm an unwilling regime. They can only confirm that a government has decided to disarm itself. History has shown that when Iraqi leaders stall inspections and impede the progress, it means they have something to hide."

871. President Bush warned Iraq that "the old game of cheat and retreat" would "no longer be tolerated"; and:

> "Any act of delay or defiance will be an additional breach of Iraq's international obligations, and a clear signal that the Iraqi regime has once again abandoned the path of voluntary compliance."

872. Setting out the US standpoint, President Bush stated:

> "With the passage of this resolution, the world must not lapse into unproductive debates over whether specific instances of Iraqi non-compliance are serious. Any Iraqi non-compliance is serious, because such bad faith will show that Iraq has no intention of disarming …
> "America will be making only one determination: is Iraq meeting the terms of the Security Council resolution or not? The United States has agreed to discuss any material breach with the Security Council, but without jeopardising our freedom of action to defend our country. If Iraq fails to comply, the United States and other nations will disarm Saddam Hussein."

873. President Bush stated that the US would support the UN inspections teams, including with "information that can help identify illegal activities and materials in Iraq", and called on other nations and "patriotic Iraqis" to do the same. Saddam Hussein could not "hide his weapons of mass destruction … without the co-operation of hundreds and thousands of Iraqis – those who work in the weapons programmes and those who are responsible for concealing the weapons".

874. Framing action on Iraq squarely in the context of the threat from international terrorism, President Bush stated:

> "Americans recognise what is at stake. In fighting a war on terror, we are determined to oppose every source of catastrophic harm that threatens our country, our friends, and our allies … And we oppose a uniquely dangerous regime – a regime that has harboured terrorists and can supply terrorists with weapons of mass destruction; a regime that has built such terrible weapons and has used them to kill thousands; a brutal regime with a history of both reckless ambition and reckless miscalculation.

> "The United States of America will not live at the mercy of any group or regime that has the motive and seeks the power to murder Americans on a massive scale. The threat to America also threatens peace and security in the Middle East and far beyond. If Iraq's dictator is permitted to acquire nuclear weapons, he could resume his pattern of intimidation and conquest and dictate the future of a vital region.
> "In confronting this threat, America seeks the support of the world. If action becomes necessary, we will act in the interests of the world. And America expects Iraqi compliance with all UN resolutions."

875. President Bush concluded that the UN Security Council "must maintain its unity and sense of purpose so that the Iraq regime cannot revert to the strategies of obstruction and deception it used so successfully in the past". The question for Iraq was whether to meet its obligations voluntarily. If it did not, the US was "prepared for the alternative" and the "just demands of the world" would be met.

876. Secretary Rumsfeld wrote:

> "President Bush wanted to rally the United Nations to support a US-led effort to enforce the Security Council's resolutions. The British Prime Minister, a persuasive advocate, buttressed Bush's efforts. Bush and Blair, Powell and … Straw coaxed and cajoled the members of the Security Council on the matter. Finally … the Security Council voted 15-0 to support resolution 1441."[295]

877. Mr Blair used a speech on 11 November to emphasise the importance of dealing with WMD and terrorism as part of a wider agenda and the importance of US leadership for success.

878. Commenting on a draft of his speech to the Lord Mayor's Banquet at the Mansion House on 11 November 2002, Mr Blair set out the elements of the argument he wanted to make about the importance of a shared agenda in international politics.[296]

879. In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair stated that fighting the new threats, which crossed all national boundaries and were linked to extremism and failed states, needed a unified international community and that depended on a shared agenda:

> "The real reason people worry about Iraq is that they think the US is solely concerned with their issues but no-one else's. A shared agenda can only be based on a sense of fair play and justice and of one standard for all. Hence the importance of the MEPP."

880. Mr Blair also commented: "helping failed states recover ie Afghanistan or, potentially Iraq, can't just be invaded and left".

[295] Rumsfeld D. Known and Unknown: A Memoir. Sentinel, 2011.
[296] Note Blair [to No.10 officials], 3 November 2002, [extract 'Lord Mayor's Speech'].

881. Mr Blair began his speech:

> "Last Friday was an important day for the world. After months of debate, the United Nations came together and made its will plain. Saddam now has to decide: he can either disarm voluntarily … or he can defy the world, in which case he will be disarmed by force."[297]

882. Most of the speech focused on the broader threat posed by WMD and terrorism, stating that they were linked, and the need to counter them by moving forward the Middle East Peace Process, being prepared to help failed or failing nations to recover, and creating "bridges of understanding" between religions, and coalitions of force buttressed by a coalition of common ideas and a shared agenda.

883. Drawing together the capabilities of Iraq and North Korea, Mr Blair warned:

> "States which are failed, which repress their people brutally, in which notions of democracy and the rule of law are alien, share the same absence of rational boundaries to their actions as the terrorist. Iraq has used WMD. North Korea's admission that it has a programme to produce Highly Enriched Uranium was an important confession. We know that North Korea has traded ballistic missile technology. We know there are other highly unstable states who want to get their hands on Highly Enriched Uranium. With it a nuclear weapon could be a step away. Just reflect on that and the danger is clear.
>
> "And terrorism and WMD have the potential, at least, to be directly linked …"

884. Mr Blair added that Al Qaida could and would buy and use WMD:

> "So these are new and different dangers …
> "… above all the international community needs to be unified in its response."

885. Mr Blair concluded that it would be "irresponsible to ignore the threat" posed by terrorism and WMD. President Bush recognised that "full US engagement and leadership" was needed, as the "decision to go through the UN on Iraq" showed.

886. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "We were also having to get the balance right re Bush. There was no point him [TB] just getting up there and putting the US line but he did not want to be seen as anything other than supportive. The question was how you weave in the argument about maximising influence without being explicit."[298]

What was resolution 1441 intended to achieve?

887. The Inquiry was given a range of views about the UK's policy objectives for resolution 1441, the relative priority of those objectives, and what had been achieved.

888. Some witnesses emphasised the objective of disarming Iraq through a policy of coercive diplomacy and agreement on an effective inspections regime without military action.

889. Other witnesses emphasised the purpose of providing a legal base for military action without the need for a further decision by the Security Council.

890. Resolution 1441 decided (OP1) that Iraq "has been and remains in material breach" of its obligations under relevant resolutions adopted by the Security Council, in particular its failure to co-operate with UNMOVIC and the IAEA and to complete the actions for disarmament required by resolution 687 (1991), and decided to set up an enhanced inspection regime.

891. In his advice of 7 March 2003, Lord Goldsmith wrote that:

> "… while the US objective was to ensure the resolution did not constrain the right of action which they believed they already had, our objective was to secure a sufficient authorisation from the Council in the absence of which we would have had no right to act."[299]

892. Lord Goldsmith's consideration of the legal effect of the resolution and whether it achieved that objective is addressed in Section 5.

893. Mr Blair was asked to provide a statement setting out:

- his understanding of President Bush's objectives in relation to the UN;
- his objectives and strategy in the negotiation of [resolution] 1441;
- whether he was aware of differences between the UK's position and prevailing American objectives for 1441; and
- the implications of those differences for his strategy.[300]

894. In response, Mr Blair wrote:

> "The objectives for both President Bush and myself in trying to secure a fresh resolution were clear: to give Saddam one final chance to comply; and to make it clear if he didn't, then we would act, if necessary by force. In other words: change of heart or change of regime. Because he had so frequently broken his word, disregarded UN resolutions and refused to comply with the inspectors, we knew the wording of the resolution had to be unequivocal: he had to co-operate fully and unconditionally. The stress on co-operation was deliberate. His concealment activity was again very clear and had been further demonstrated by his treatment of his son-in-law who had revealed his intentions, been lured back to Iraq and executed.

"So we had to insert language in the resolution that made this plain; and in particular resist language that meant that the words 'final opportunity' were diluted by requiring another UNSC decision. So we also sought to ensure that in the resolution itself, we specifically had a provision that a failure to comply would be itself a material breach.

"I was kept closely in touch with the negotiation, as was Jack Straw. We were very satisfied with the outcome. It achieved our objectives. We resisted attempts by France to insert language that would have required an additional decision. We never had a problem with another discussion in the UNSC. What we could not tolerate was a situation where Saddam continued to refuse to comply fully and unconditionally and yet we were powerless to act."[301]

895. Mr Blair concluded:

"Then, but even more in retrospect, UNSCR 1441 was a pivotal moment. If Saddam at that point had genuinely changed; had he welcomed inspectors and fully co-operated, action would have been avoided. I made this clear to President Bush and he agreed. I also think at the time those more sympathetic to Saddam thought he would. The fact is he did not and the Iraq Survey Group reports show why he did not."

896. Asked for a statement about what he thought would be achieved by inspections and his expectations about Iraqi co-operation with UNMOVIC, Mr Blair wrote:

"It is fair to say that I did not think that Saddam would change his behaviour. His record was clear. On the other hand he might have."[302]

897. Mr Blair cited Libya's response to the events of 9/11, which had condemned the attack and co-operated in pursuing Al Qaida, as evidence of a country which had demonstrated "a genuine change of heart, a strategic decision to alter" its position in the world. Saddam Hussein's actions and behaviour, including payments to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers, had shown "a completely different attitude". Inspections were "necessary", but they could only be successful with genuine co-operation."

898. Asked at what point he had asked for and received advice about what would happen if the inspectors did get back into Iraq, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that "the view of our system was, and certainly the intelligence services, was the likelihood that Saddam would play around, but I always thought it was possible that he would realise that this was the moment of choice".[303]

[301] Statement, 14 January 2011, pages 5-6.
[302] Statement, 14 January 2011, page 7.

899. In the context of advice from officials in the 19 July Cabinet Office paper, 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action', that the inspectors would "need at least six months", Mr Blair added:

> "For me it was never a matter of time but a matter of attitude. You could have given him [Saddam Hussein] longer than six months if he was co-operating but if he was not it wouldn't really matter … I do not accept that if Blix had carried on doing his inspections we would have found out the truth."[304]

900. In his first statement for the Inquiry, Mr Straw wrote that the UK objective was to secure agreement to:

> "… a robust text which provided terms for the readmission of inspectors to Iraq, and their unfettered operation, which was tough but not so tough that the Saddam Hussein regime could plausibly reject them altogether."[305]

901. Asked whether the purpose of 1441 was to ensure the return of the weapons inspectors to Iraq, or to create the conditions necessary to justify military action, Mr Straw replied:

> "The purpose of 1441 was as it stated. It was to secure compliance by Saddam Hussein with the obligations imposed on him by the Security Council. As I have said probably to the point of tedium, had Saddam complied with the resolution, he would have stayed in post. At the very minimum it would have been impossible for any British Government to have taken part in any military action, but I don't believe military action would have taken place, because the casus belli would have gone … It was not there as an excuse for military action. Certainly not … sometimes diplomacy has to be backed by the threat and, if necessary, the use of force … It was, to use the jargon, based on the idea of coercive diplomacy, but its purpose was to secure compliance, essentially the disarmament of Iraq, and that's what we set about achieving."[306]

902. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote:

> "The resolution provided the best hope there was of resolving the crisis through peaceful means. The obligations that it imposed on the Iraqi government were easy to meet. Iraq had to make a full declaration of all its WMD programmes, and allow the IAEA and UNMOVIC inspectors unrestricted access. I often said that 'we would take yes for an answer'. There would have been no possibility whatever of war if the inspectors had reported in unequivocal terms that Iraq was complying with 1441. Resolution 1441 was the means of enabling Saddam to say 'yes'. But we could only resolve this peacefully with the threat of military action."[307]

903. In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

"The UK … was interested in ending the threat from Iraq of the use of WMD against UK interests. If this could be done by a successful and effective UN regime of intrusive inspections, this was preferable to a war."[308]

904. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

"UK strategy was influenced by two principal factors: the need to research every possible angle for the disarmament of Iraq through means short of the use of actual force; and the need to establish with the greatest international consensus the justification for the use of force, if force in the end proved necessary. This meant … that the UN inspectors had to return to Iraq to establish in detail whether or not Saddam Hussein was complying with UN resolutions, under conditions that both attracted support within the Security Council and gave the inspectors a real chance of achieving something useful."[309]

905. In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

"The US … was keen to impose terms on Saddam Hussein which made the case for military measures unquestionable if he did not fulfil them. There was therefore an American interest in setting the bar very high for Iraq."[310]

906. Sir Jeremy added:

"The UK, on the other hand, was interested in ending the threat from Iraq from the use of WMD against UK interests. This could be done by a successful and effective UN regime of intrusive inspections, this was preferable to a war."

907. Sir Jeremy wrote that it was the expectation of many Member States that there would be a Security Council decision before force was used:

"Most members of the Council, however, made an assumption that further discussion in the Security Council about Iraqi compliance would itself lead to a decision for or against the use of force. In public explanations of vote after 1441 was adopted, only Mexico was absolutely explicit that this was their expectation. France and Russia were not so explicit, which implied to me that they recognised that 1441 did not amount unambiguously to such a condition."[311]

908. Sir Jeremy also wrote:

> "… the UK was not specific in saying that a new decision would not be necessary. Nor in fact was the United States. We left it that SCR 1441 would have to speak for itself.
>
> "The UK's actual position was that the whole corpus of resolutions, from SCR 678 and 687 onwards, substantiated the case for the use of force against Iraq, through the termination of the 1991 ceasefire, if Iraq was shown not to have complied with relevant resolutions. In taking this position, we were using exactly the same approach as in justifying the bombing of Iraq in December 1998, which up to this time had never been contested on a legal basis by another Member State."[312]

909. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry that, in negotiating resolution 1441, the UK had:

> "… had to scale Washington's more unilateral ambitions back down to something that was negotiable within the Security Council."[313]

910. Subsequently, Sir Jeremy said: "it was an important objective of our diplomacy that we should have as large a consensus in the Security Council as possible for those reasons of legitimacy".[314]

911. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

> "We found language to express a consensus that meant that the inspectors would normally be expected to declare whether or not Saddam Hussein was in compliance, but there could also be a report from other sources that there was non-co-operation or non-compliance … Secondly, that if there was a report that there was non-compliance, the Security Council would meet to assess what that meant, and that was the only requirement of the resolution. It was not expressly stated in any operative paragraph of 1441 that the Security Council should meet and decide what to do in the case of non-compliance, and that was where the French and the Americans met, that there should be a further stage of consideration but that further stage of consideration should not necessarily mean that there would be a further decision of the Security Council if force had to be used under the terms of the whole corpus of resolutions up to that point."[315]

912. Sir Jeremy added:

> "It was my instructions that we should not concede … that it would be necessary to have a specific decision of the Security Council before force was used under the cover of the previous resolutions."[316]

913. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry:

> "The French and Russians and some others were absolutely determined to establish that there should be no use of force without a specific decision of the UN Security Council. The United States was absolutely determined to resist the need for a specific decision by the United Nations Security Council on the use of force. Those two positions were irreconcilable."[317]

914. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry:

> "It was actually quite surprising to me that only the Mexican delegation said unequivocally that they expected that, if it came to the use of force, it would be solely the Security Council that had the authority to take that decision. The Irish delegate said something similar … but not as unequivocally as the Mexicans. Strangely, the French and the Russians, who were, as it were, our antagonists in this operation in the Security Council, were equivocal in what they said in their explanations of vote, which they had to be, because they had tried to negotiate specific language in 1441 and they had failed to negotiate that."[318]

915. Summing up the position following adoption of Resolution 1441, Sir Jeremy said:

> "This is where diplomacy gets clever and, as you can see from the outcome, from 1441, too clever for its own good, but diplomacy got clever and it produced a text in 1441 that was equivocal on two issues: one, what should happen if Saddam Hussein and his regime did not comply with the terms of 1441; and who should be the judge of whether or not Iraq was complying with the terms of 1441."[319]

916. Sir Jeremy also told the Inquiry:

> "It was not expressly stated in any operative paragraph of 1441 that the Security Council should meet and decide what to do in the case of non-compliance, and that was where the French and the Americans met, that there should be a further stage of consideration but that further stage of consideration should not necessarily mean that there would be a further decision of the Security Council if force had to be used under the terms of the whole corpus of resolutions up to that point."[320]

917. Mr Chaplin told the Inquiry:

> "… there was a surge of hope after 1441. 1441 was quite a remarkable achievement and if the Security Council could once more come together, as it had before, and we could see a track record going way back into the 90s, that, when the Security Council were united, Saddam Hussein took notice, as indeed he did on this occasion by letting the inspectors back in, that there might, after all, be a route to resolving this problem through the inspection route and without military action."[321]

918. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Pattison offered his perspective "on how FCO policy officials understood" resolution 1441 "at the time of its drafting".[322]

919. Mr Pattison wrote that the "objectives in negotiating the text were clear by early September 2002". The FCO wanted "if possible to secure a resolution which:

(i) brought the UN back into the process by putting the focus on the disarmament process (rather than follow the perceived US agenda of regime change);

(ii) made clear that Iraq had an absolutely final opportunity to comply with UN demands; and

(iii) contained authorisation to use force if necessary."

920. Mr Pattison's "broad understanding during the negotiations was that, at a minimum, the position of previous Attorneys General required us to obtain a resolution which contained a material breach finding and talked of 'serious consequences' if Iraq remained in breach".

921. Mr Pattison explained:

"At the risk of stating the obvious, I think it worth pointing out that Security Council resolutions are often the products of complex political negotiations. The result is that the texts are sometimes more nuanced than one might expect in domestic law making … They are made by states seeking to protect political positions as well as to make international law. They often contain important compromises, which allow states with different points of view to sign up to a final text claiming it protects their positions while knowing it gives another group of states what they were seeking."[323]

922. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry that the objectives "were all equally important" as a means to achieving the objective of trying to "bring about an Iraq about whom we had no questions concerning their weapons programme".[324]

923. Mr Rycroft told the Inquiry:

"Our top objective was to get the Iraq issue back into the UN. By that we meant a UN Security Council resolution ideally by unanimity that sets out a final opportunity, an ultimatum to comply with all the previous resolutions, and a two-stage process so that if there were further evidence of non-compliance or non-co-operation, then … a discussion but not a further resolution by the Security Council about the consequences. So one objective was to keep the international community together and the other objective was to ensure that if there was a material breach either through non-co-operation or through a find of WMD, then we didn't have to go through this whole rigmarole again and have another resolution that then gave a final, final opportunity to comply."[325]

924. Mr Macleod thought that there were two main objectives for the resolution:

"One was to achieve the disarmament of Iraq by essentially inspections and peaceful means, if we could at all, and that's why part of the focus of 1441 is on a strong inspection regime, but I think it was very much a part of the framework, also, that there should be one final opportunity for Iraq to disarm and that that should be this resolution, and that there would not be a further Security Council decision at a later stage."[326]

925. In his private hearing, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that the US:

"… wanted freedom to be able to pin Iraq down in material breach, either through something that was heinous in the declaration, or through a further act or omission, and they wanted the capacity to report that to the Security Council without it being reported through the inspectors."[327]

926. Sir Jeremy stated:

"The French knew what they were agreeing to, and then later didn't want to live up to what they had agreed to, and to that extent changed their policy from the basis of the understanding of the negotiation in 1441."[328]

927. Sir Jeremy added:

"The French wanted to make sure that the United States could not take unilateral action. This was underlying the French position from beginning to end.

"… the French knew that they had not achieved in 1441 the requirement that the Security Council make a decision following 1441, that 1441 was the last point of agreement that we had reached, and that left the decision open by a Member State, devoid of a Security Council resolution, to follow up on the previous resolutions."[329]

928. In his first statement for the Inquiry, Mr Straw wrote that the US had "never", so far as he was aware, "explicitly ruled out the possibility of a 'second resolution'", but their "hard policy commitment was for one resolution only": "An objective of the negotiations … was therefore that it should be self contained, and not legally contingent on a second resolution."[330]

929. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that his view "was that there was an overwhelming argument that 1441 required a second stage but not a second resolution".[331]

930. Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "I believed that we were intent on negotiating a self-contained resolution … The Americans would never agree to a resolution that was not self-contained. I would say everybody else we were negotiating with took the same view. As Jeremy Greenstock has pointed out, if we had been ready to accept a resolution which simply required another resolution, we would have got that in a week."[332]

931. In his memoir, Mr Straw described the negotiation of resolution 1441 as "a great team effort". The UK and US teams had:

> "… argued so intensely over every last detail because everyone knew what was riding on it."[333]

932. Mr Straw wrote that he had felt a "great sense of relief and achievement "about the outcome of the resolution; it was "comprehensive", it was "mandatory, based on Chapter VII of the UN Charter" and, "crucially it recognised 'the threat Iraq's non-compliance … poses to international peace and security'".[334]

Lord Goldsmith's role in the negotiation of resolution 1441

933. Lord Goldsmith's officials were involved in the initial formulation of proposals for a resolution, but he was not formally asked for his views until 24 September, after a draft had been agreed with the US.

934. Lord Goldsmith was sent a copy of the FCO advice to No.10 of 27 August, setting out possible elements for a new resolution.[335]

935. In his statement for the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith wrote that the letter of 27 August:

> "… attached a rudimentary outline of the terms of a possible resolution. I was shown the letter but I am sure I would have assumed that my advice was not required in relation to that text but that instead it would be sought on a more developed draft …"[336]

936. Sir David Manning proposed the establishment of an Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq to Mr Blair on 12 September (see Section 2).[337] Setting out proposals for membership, Sir David wrote:

> "This leaves the question of what to do about the Attorney. I assume that you would not want him to attend your Ad Hoc Groups except by invitation on specific occasions."

937. Mr Blair decided to wait to set up a Cabinet Group.[338]

938. There are no records of Lord Goldsmith's direct involvement in UK Government discussions before his meeting with Mr Straw on 23 September, when Mr Straw had "stressed" that Mr Wood "had his full authority to talk to Lord Goldsmith".[339]

939. Mr Wood's letter of 24 September stated that Lord Goldsmith would be "aware of the context and background" of the draft resolution and asked for his advice.[340]

940. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that a "number of difficulties" had "prevented" him "from being more actively engaged" in advising on resolution 1441.

941. In his statement, Lord Goldsmith identified three broad areas of difficulty:

- his Office was not sent all the relevant documents;
- he was not sufficiently involved in Ministerial discussions; and
- the approach to seeking his advice was inconsistent.

942. Lord Goldsmith initially told the Inquiry that during the drafting of resolution 1441:

> "I don't know whether every draft was being copied, but certainly some drafts were copied to my office, not with a request that I should advise, which was slightly unsatisfactory, because it was sort of 'keep you in the picture' but not actually ask you to advise."[341]

943. Asked to clarify his comment that the arrangements for seeking his advice on the resolution were "unsatisfactory" and that he had not been asked to provide advice, Lord Goldsmith's witness statement identified a "number of difficulties" that had "prevented" him "from being more actively engaged" in advising on resolution 1441.[342]

944. The negotiation of resolution 1441 was difficult and at times conducted directly between Mr Blair and Mr Straw and their counterparts.

945. While the exceptional nature of the negotiations would have made it impossible for Lord Goldsmith to follow each twist and turn of the negotiations, he was not sent the records of some of the most critical discussions.

946. Lord Goldsmith wrote that, as Ms Adams had told the Inquiry, his Office was not sent copies of all the telegrams during the negotiation process. In particular, he had not seen those reporting "some of the most critical discussions".[343]

947. Ms Adams told the Inquiry that the Attorney General's Office (then known as the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers (LSLO)) received telegrams from UKMIS New York and from the Foreign Office itself:

> "… during the course of the negotiation … there were two distributions for telegrams … and … a lot of the very critical points in the negotiation were issues that were discussed between the Foreign Secretary and US Secretary Powell and obviously the French Foreign Minister and so on. Those records of rather key moments were not coming to us at the time."[344]

948. The evidence confirms that Lord Goldsmith did not see records of key discussions between Mr Blair and Mr Straw and their counterparts, or proposals on the draft resolution which were being discussed within the UK Government, before decisions were taken.

949. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that, during the negotiation of resolutions 1154 and 1205 in 1997 and 1998, he had been working in the Attorney General's Office. In relation to resolution 1154, he described a letter and briefing which took him and the Attorney General through the background in New York, the UN processes, the significance of the different terminology, the origins of the revival doctrine and the view of previous Law Officers on it:

> "The picture that emerges is very much of the Attorney's office being told what was happening, being offered ideas about what the future shape of the resolution might be, being asked for advice on whether one formulation was the stronger basis than another and giving views on that."[345]

950. After the adoption of resolution 1154 and before and during the negotiation of resolution 1205 Mr Macleod stated:

> "… it [the process] worked exactly the same way; we knew what was coming, there were drafts going round, different operative paragraphs. I think there were even drafts of the explanations of vote, and they were gone through both before and after the adoption of the text, and I think there was guidance from the Attorney."

[344] Public hearing, 20 July 2010, page 10.
[345] Public hearing, 30 June 2010, pages 14-15.

951. Mr Macleod's account of the involvement of the Attorney General in 1998 is supported by contemporaneous records that the Inquiry has seen.

952. Ms Adams contrasted the process during the drafting of resolution 1441 with that which subsequently took place on the second resolution and other cases when:

> "… the Attorney General was presented with a draft and it was clear, 'This is our objective for this resolution. Is this text sufficient to achieve this objective, and if it isn't, what do we need as a sort of legal red line?' … the Attorney was able to say 'I think X or Y' and therefore, that informed the process of the negotiation in New York …"[346]

953. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry that the FCO Legal Advisers "kept the Attorney General informed" about the "course of the negotiations" and about the advice they were giving as the draft resolution developed: "both to ensure that he was in a position to give advice to Ministers and to the negotiators at any time, either on request or as he saw fit, whether or not his advice was formally sought".[347]

954. Sir Michael explained:

> "What was in my view more important than a formal request for advice was for the FCO Legal Advisers to keep the Attorney General's Office as fully informed as they could throughout the negotiations. This we did. We sent to his Office anything we saw that was legally significant as soon as we received it, and we kept him informed of the advice that we were giving. We wished to ensure that the legal advice we were giving within the FCO and beyond on a matter of such importance did not differ from his own views.
> "The Attorney's advice was … obtained during the negotiation of 1441, but not at every stage (which would have been impractical, given the complexity of the negotiations and the manner in which they were being carried out). His views on the revival argument, and the kind of language that was needed in any resolution if it was of itself to authorise the use of force, were well known."[348]

955. Sir Michael Wood also told the Inquiry that there were "no formal or other rules" on seeking the Attorney General's advice during the negotiation of UN Security Council resolutions, "either in general or in exceptional circumstances like 1441"; and that it "all depends on the circumstances". The FCO Legal Advisers had "made it clear throughout to policy clients, including Ministers, that it was highly desirable to seek the Attorney's advice, and in particular that the Attorney's advice would be needed before military force was used".[349]

956. Lord Goldsmith's requests to Mr Straw on 18 October and Mr Blair on 22 October, to be invited to meetings and "to be kept closely informed of developments", which would have allowed him to be more involved in discussions about the resolution and the policy behind it, were not followed up by Mr Straw or Mr Blair.

957. Despite agreement in July that Mr Blair and Lord Goldsmith should discuss his advice in September, that discussion did not take place until 22 October.

958. The meeting took place as a result of Lord Goldsmith raising his concerns with Mr Powell and Mr Straw.

959. Key decisions on the resolution had already been taken and the draft was at an advanced stage.

960. In his statement for the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith wrote that he was not sufficiently involved in the Ministerial meetings and discussions about the resolution and the policy behind it. He had told:

- Mr Straw on 18 October that he should be present at "any meetings between the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and others at which decisions on the use of force were made"; and
- Mr Blair in the meeting on 22 October that that it would be important for him "to be kept closely informed of developments". He had made it clear that he "was available for a further meeting with the Prime Minister at any time".[350]

961. After that, Lord Goldsmith was not invited to key meetings to discuss the UK's negotiating strategy and the implications of changes to the draft resolution.

962. There were inconsistencies about the level of involvement expected from Lord Goldsmith.

963. His advice was sought in the early stages of the development of the draft resolution, but from late-September onwards that was not the case.

964. In his statement Lord Goldsmith wrote that there "was an inconsistent approach within Government about the level of engagement that was expected" from him.[351]

965. In the period between his meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October and his "telephone call" with Mr Straw on 7 November, his "views were not sought"; and "During that period … important changes [to the draft resolution] occurred."[352]

[351] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraph 1.11.

966. Identifying those changes, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "In particular … OP2 said that Iraq was being given a 'final opportunity' to comply with its obligations; OP4 contained the words 'for assessment'; and OP13 recalled that the Council had repeatedly said that there would be 'serious consequences' as a result of Iraq's continued violation of its obligations."[353]

967. Lord Goldsmith identified the addition stipulating that any further material breaches would be reported to the Council for assessment in the text of what became OP4, as the "most important" of those changes.

968. In addition, there had been "no further meetings" between Lord Goldsmith and "Ministers or officials of the FCO on this … prior to adoption of the resolution".[354]

969. Lord Goldsmith wrote that after 18 October there had been "no further requests" for advice:

> "… the FCO Legal Advisers were not pressing for advice before the resolution was adopted. I recall … that at some point after the meeting on 22 October 2002 Cathy Adams expressly informed me that my advice was not being sought and that documentation was being provided for my reference only."[355]

970. FCO Legal Advisers and Lord Goldsmith's office were aware on 4 November of the revision of the final clause of OP4 over the weekend of 2-3 November, when Secretary Powell agreed to replace the text that, in the event of a further material breach, the Security Council would "convene in accordance with OPs 11 and 12" with the phrase that it would be "reported to the Council for assessment".

971. There is no evidence that any concerns were raised about the inclusion of "for assessment" before the adoption of resolution 1441.

972. Lord Goldsmith saw the draft resolution containing the revised text on 6 November.

973. Sir Michael Wood identified that, as well as his letters of 24 September and 18 October, the note from Mr Grainger to Mr Brummell of 4 November 2002, was a specific occasion when the FCO Legal Advisers had "made it clear to the Attorney and his Office, formally or informally, that we needed his advice".[356]

974. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry that in the meeting with Lord Goldsmith on 5 November 2002:

> "… we expressed concerns that assumptions were being made by Ministers about his eventual advice, and that therefore in our view early advice from the Attorney was desirable. As I recall, the Attorney's response was to the effect that he would give his advice when it was requested by Ministers, but that in any event we knew his views."[357]

975. Asked what legal advice had been provided on the effect of the insertion of the words "for assessment", Sir Michael Wood wrote that the words were "proposed by the US Secretary of State, in response to a French request, and agreed by him directly with the British and French Foreign Ministers, without, so far as I am aware, legal advice being sought".[358]

976. Despite the difficulties which Lord Goldsmith rightly identified as limiting his contribution during the negotiation of resolution 1441, the way in which Lord Goldsmith's advice was provided raises a number of issues.

977. After the meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October, Lord Goldsmith understandably felt it necessary to ask Mr Brummell to record his views.

978. Accordingly, on Lord Goldsmith's instructions, Mr Brummell wrote to Sir David Manning setting out the points that Lord Goldsmith had made in his meeting with Mr Blair.

979. Asked about his meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October and Mr Brummell's letter of 23 October 2002 before the declassification of his manuscript notes of that meeting, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he hadn't thought he needed to put his views in writing at that stage:

> "I think I had been very clear in my oral statements that there needed to be a clear statement of material breach and so forth. So I don't think I needed to add anything else."[359]

980. Asked if he had been anxious that Mr Blair should know his legal advice, Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "I don't think so … I couldn't have given definitive legal advice at that stage, because the whole point was he [Mr Blair] had had the advice in July about what needed to happen … Until there was a resolution finally, there wasn't really anything more to say, although I was giving a bit of guidance about a couple of matters. One of them was some expressions of concern about the developing resolution, draft resolution, though, as I have said it actually changed in significant ways at the last moment."

981. Lord Goldsmith subsequently wrote that in his oral evidence he had had in mind the passage in Mr Brummell's letter recording that he could not give a final view on the effect of the resolution until it had been adopted.[360]

982. Asked about Mr Brummell's letter to Sir David Manning of 23 October, Lord Goldsmith wrote that he "felt there should be a record of the advice" he had offered; that he had asked Mr Brummell to send the letter; and that, if he had not recorded his advice through that means, he "would have ensured that the same result was achieved by other means, i.e. through written advice in a note to No.10".[361]

983. Lord Goldsmith's argument that he could not give a 'final view' on the legal effect of resolution 1441 until after its adoption is evidently correct.

984. Lord Goldsmith was also being advised that he should not "provide a running commentary".

985. Nevertheless, and given its importance, Mr Blair and Mr Straw should have ensured that Lord Goldsmith was invited to advise on the legal implications of the text under discussion at key stages in the development of resolution 1441.

986. That would have ensured that policy decisions were fully informed by consideration of the legal issues.

987. Specifically Lord Goldsmith's views should, at the very least, have been sought and considered first in the context of the decision on 17 October that the UK should seek to negotiate a resolution which would be capable of authorising the use of force without a further decision by the Security Council, and secondly once the near final draft of the resolution was available on 4 November and before the resolution was adopted on 8 November.

988. There should have been an agreed, collective understanding of the legal effect of the resolution amongst key Ministers, the Cabinet Secretary, the Chief of the Defence Staff and senior officials participating in the negotiations.

989. As Ms Adams pointed out, the UK Government "didn't really know what it was voting for".

990. Ms Adams had told the Inquiry that the timing of the legal advice was:

"… a very important issue … and in fact for me this is the key lesson learned from the whole episode … I say this with the benefit of hindsight – I do think that if definitive advice had been given, and perhaps it might have had to be conditional

[360] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraph 3.8.
[361] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraphs 3.3 and 3.5.

advice, but nevertheless, if definitive advice from the Attorney had been given prior to the adoption of resolution 1441, events would have unfolded rather differently."[362]

991. Ms Adams stated:

"… it has struck me very forcibly with the benefit of hindsight that that would have been desirable, to say the least, in relation to 1441 because the net effect was … the Government didn't really know what it was voting for … the Foreign Secretary and Sir Jeremy had a very clear view of what they thought the resolution meant. Michael Wood had a very clear view which was a rather different view, but the one person whose view actually mattered hadn't even been asked at that stage."[363]

992. Ms Adams told the Inquiry that Lord Goldsmith's advice at an earlier stage:

"… would have influenced the statements that were made about the resolution after its adoption … the Explanation of Vote which was made. Normally, when you have a resolution negotiated, if you don't achieve everything that you want to achieve in the negotiation and you end up with a less than clear text, it is a classic way to reinforce one's interpretation by stating clearly that you think it means a certain thing … our statement was arguably not inconsistent with the view that the Attorney had reached, but it could have been clearer and I think some of the things that were said … about what automaticity did or didn't mean and these kind of issues, but if there had been a very definitive legal view, then perhaps that would have fed into a clearer Explanation of Vote."[364]

993. Lord Goldsmith wrote that there was a view within his Office that he "should not provide a running commentary on the drafts as they emerged".[365] He only saw what were "effectively snapshots provided … for information". His role should be to "provide advice on the legal effect of the final, agreed wording". That seemed to him "a valid position" which he "understood to be consistent with the role adopted by his predecessors". Lord Goldsmith wrote that that was what he "had in mind" when he told Mr Blair in their meeting on 22 October that "it would not be possible to give a final view on the legal effect of the resolution until it had been adopted".

994. Asked to address the effect greater involvement during the negotiation of the resolution could have had, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

"If my advice had been provided to the negotiating team at key points in the later stage of the negotiations, I think this may well have influenced the negotiations and the statements that were made about the resolution after its adoption.

> "It is impossible to say what difference this would have made but the text did change after my meeting with the Prime Minister [on 22 October 2002] and my advice on it was not sought. Some of those changes were in my view significant and featured in my eventual advice."[366]

995. Lord Goldsmith added that it would not be "impossible for an Attorney General in London to give advice throughout the process of negotiations", but that would have required him to have "been given much more information and to have been included to a far greater extent".[367]

996. Asked whether Lord Goldsmith should have been more closely involved in the negotiation of resolution 1441, Mr Blair stated:

> "… in retrospect it would have been sensible to have had him absolutely in touch with the negotiating machinery all the way through …"[368]

997. Sir Michael Wood identified the "main consequence" of the fact that Lord Goldsmith did not give advice at the later stages of the negotiation was that "there was inevitably some uncertainty about his views on the meaning of the resolution, which made it difficult for FCO Legal Advisers to advise Ministers". But it was "far from clear that having his further views during the negotiation would have made a significant difference to the course of the negotiations or to the terms of the eventual resolution".[369]

998. Lord Goldsmith decided to convey his views orally rather than in writing on a number of occasions, including in response to the three explicit requests, of 24 September, 18 October and 4 November 2002, from FCO Legal Advisers for his advice.

999. Lord Goldsmith bears some responsibility for not seeking more assertively to ensure that his views were known and understood by those negotiating the resolution and those responsible for its implementation.

The role of FCO Legal Advisers in the negotiation of resolution 1441

1000. Mr Wood and Mr Macleod did not have full visibility of the discussions between Mr Blair and Mr Straw and their counterparts which led to some of the key provisions in resolution 1441.

1001. Nor did they see all the records of discussions in which Lord Goldsmith set out his concerns.

1002. The accounts given to the Inquiry by Sir Michael Wood, Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Mr Macleod, about the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York's knowledge and understanding of the views of the FCO Legal Advisers and Lord Goldsmith during the negotiations and of their understanding in early November 2002 of the legal effect of the drafts of resolution 1441, were not consistent.

1003. In a statement to the Inquiry, Sir Michael Wood wrote that he, Ms Wilmshurst and Mr Grainger worked closely together as a team on all matters concerning the use of force against Iraq.[370]

1004. Legal advice was "folded in to the day-by-day instructions to UKMIS New York". Mr Grainger attended the daily meetings on Iraq, discussed drafts with the United Nations Department (UND), cleared draft instructions to New York and gave day-to-day advice orally and in writing. Virtually all significant pieces of written legal advice were a co-operative effort.[371]

1005. Sir Michael had been aware of, and agreed with, all the advice Mr Grainger had given.

1006. Sir Michael stated that he had ensured that he was "consulted … on all significant legal questions concerning Iraq", and that he gave his own written advice whenever he "was asked directly by Ministers or senior officials".[372] He would "intervene directly only when we considered that necessary, particularly to get a point across to Ministers".

1007. Instructions to the Mission in New York on the negotiation of resolution 1441 were issued from the FCO in London.

1008. Sir Michael Wood's and Mr Macleod's evidence indicates that direct contact between the FCO Legal Advisers and the Legal Counsellor in UKMIS New York was limited.

1009. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that the Legal Counsellor in New York had "played a very important role in the negotiation and drafting of 1441 and after that, in its interpretation".[373]

1010. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Macleod wrote that his instructions came "from or through UND", and that was the case "even on issues with a high 'legal' content".[374] Direct contact with FCO Legal Advisers was "not commonplace", and on major negotiations, such as resolution 1441 "pretty rare". He reported "ultimately to the Permanent Representative [Sir Jeremy Greenstock]". There was:

> "… no line of reporting, direct or indirect to the FCO Legal Adviser in London … Nor was there any routine process of … reporting on legal issues or anything of that sort."

1011. Sir Michael Wood wrote that "the work of a legal adviser overseas is quite different from that of a lawyer in London, having large policy and representational elements".[375] The Legal Counsellor and First Secretary (Legal) in UKMIS New York reported to the UK Permanent Representative to the UN and, while it was "important" that the links to the FCO Legal Advisers were maintained, it would not have been "appropriate" for them to "report directly to, and effectively work under the FCO Legal Adviser".

1012. Sir Michael added:

> "… the negotiation of SCR 1441 was wholly exceptional, with Washington firmly in the lead and key negotiations taking place directly between foreign ministers and often on the telephone. The negotiating process was quite different from that for other SCRs, such as SCRs 1154, 1205, the second resolution in early 2003, and subsequent resolutions on Iraq adopted in 2003/4."

1013. As a result, in Sir Michael's view: "It was, therefore, not always easy for anyone, including the lawyers, to follow the negotiations blow-by-blow and to feed in considered and timely advice in the usual way."[376]

1014. In Mr Macleod's view, the UK Mission in New York had had "a relatively limited role" in the drafting of resolution 1441:

> "The main components of the draft came to us from Washington via London."[377]

1015. Mr Macleod wrote that he had received "no instructions" from London in relation to the negotiation of resolution 1441 "beyond or in addition to those received by Sir Jeremy Greenstock and UKMIS".[378]

1016. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that, "as a member of Sir Jeremy's team", he was "closely involved in the negotiation of what became UNSCR 1441 from an early stage".[379] He "knew what we were trying to achieve and attended the majority of the negotiating sessions". He had: "Occasionally … noted and reported the discussion", but "on the whole" he had "a watching brief".

1017. Mr Macleod wrote:

> "On some key points, Sir Jeremy [Greenstock] had a crucial input, and I was involved in the drafting and discussion of proposals within the mission."

1018. Asked about the process of providing advice to Sir Jeremy, Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that it was "fairly informal":

> "… Jeremy knew the issue very, very well. He understood that the legal parameters in which 1441 was being negotiated were very well-established, at least as far as we were concerned, because he had been responsible for negotiating resolution 1205 and he had probably been involved in the earlier ones too. So the framework we were operating in was very clear and pretty well understood by all of us, and I don't recall really any occasion when we had to sit down and have a head-to-head about any legal issue."[380]

1019. Within the FCO, Mr Pattison was responsible for the formulation of policy on Security Council resolutions, and provided instructions to the UK Mission in New York.[381]

1020. Mr Pattison wrote that the key tactical decisions were taken at twice-daily meetings chaired by Mr Ricketts which agreed instructions for UKMIS New York on how to handle negotiations on the text of resolution 1441.[382]

1021. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry that instructions were sent in the form of a telegram, known as an e-gram, and were complemented by daily telephone conversations between Mr Ricketts and Sir Jeremy Greenstock, and by correspondence with other members of UKMIS New York.[383]

1022. Mr Pattison circulated a draft of the instructions around the 'core group', which included Mr Chaplin, Mr Charles Gray, Head of the FCO Middle East Department, representatives of the FCO Non-Proliferation Department (headed by Mr Tim Dowse) and FCO Legal Advisers, before sending them to New York.

1023. Telegrams sent by the FCO in London to the UK Mission in New York during the negotiation of resolution 1441, were in accordance with usual practice, signed "Straw" but would have been compiled by the process Mr Pattison described. Some report the Foreign Secretary's own involvement in discussions on the draft resolution with his US and French counterparts. Others contain detailed instructions to New York for discussion in the Security Council.

1024. When it was drawn to his attention that only one of the telegrams expressly stated the legal view of the effect of the draft resolution, Mr Pattison replied that:

> "… legal advice was incorporated into all the instructions we sent. We did not normally practise making a distinction between legal and … policy advice."[384]

1025. Sir Michael Wood confirmed that:

> "… instructions were drafted by United Nations Department, cleared with the FCO Legal Advisers and others, and, presumably, submitted to Ministers as necessary. They would be conveyed to UKMIS by telegram, fax or on the phone. This was standard practice for the drafting of SCRs."[385]

1026. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that he was not aware of the divergence of view about whether the draft of resolution 1441 would authorise the use of force without a further resolution.

1027. Mr Straw, Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Mr Pattison all referred to the fact that Mr Macleod took the view that resolution 1441 authorised the use of force, without the need for a further resolution.

1028. There is no contemporaneous written evidence of Mr Macleod's advice during the negotiation of resolution 1441.

1029. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that he was not conscious of the strength of the FCO Legal Advisers' concerns until late November.

1030. Asked whether he was aware of the views, after its negotiation, of Sir Michael Wood and other Foreign Office Legal Advisers on the effect of resolution 1441, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

> "I was not copied in on the minuting, for instance, between Michael Wood and the Secretary of State, Jack Straw, at the time …
>
> "I relied on two things in New York, one was the telegrams of instruction, signed 'Straw', coming from London; and secondly, my legal adviser Iain Macleod's advice in New York …"[386]

1031. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry that Mr Macleod's advice:

> "… was different in substance and character from the legal advice coming from Elizabeth Wilmshurst and Michael Wood to the Secretary of State."

1032. Subsequently, in the context of questioning about the later debate on the interpretation of resolution 1441 and the need for a second resolution, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated:

> "If I had known that there was that degree of doubt in London, I would have had to examine whether the advice I was getting from my own legal adviser was the advice I should be listening to."[387]

1033. The Inquiry drew those extracts from Sir Jeremy's evidence, which addressed the understanding in New York of the legal effect of resolution 1441 after its adoption and which had not at that stage been published, to the attention of Mr Macleod before he gave evidence to the Inquiry.

1034. Addressing his advice to Sir Jeremy in his statement, Mr Macleod wrote:

> "Sir Jeremy Greenstock knew the legal framework as well as I did … I think we had a shared understanding of what London's instructions required and a shared assessment of what the final text meant. I did not have to offer lengthy written advice: my views were simply fed into the negotiating process, along with those of the rest of the team. At no time during the negotiation of UNSCR … was there any opposition or questioning of the views I expressed, and nor was I put under any pressure to advise in any particular direction (by Sir Jeremy or anyone else)."[388]

1035. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that he was "not really clear about what exactly happened in London during the negotiation of resolution 1441".[389] He understood from papers that he had seen "that questions were being asked of the Attorney on a couple of occasions" but he did not "think that was evident to us at the time in New York".

1036. Mr Macleod added that "there seemed to be no definitive view from the Attorney's Office during the 1441 process"; which he thought had been "a big mistake" and which he contrasted with the process adopted during the negotiations in 1997 and 1998.[390]

1037. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that UKMIS "had one view of the resolution, we thought it would authorise the use of force". He thought difficulties "could have been avoided" if Lord Goldsmith's view "had been obtained at that earlier stage".[391]

1038. Referring to the "doubts in London that began to emerge and really became apparent to us in November", Mr Macleod stated that it was:

> "… puzzling … that people decided just to continue allowing UKMIS to negotiate a text which was, to use the phrase, 'unfit for purpose' because … a key criterion for the resolution was that there wouldn't have to be a further decision of the Security Council to authorise the use of force.

"… the other reason why it is odd is that we had been negotiating in New York side by side with the US …

"… to have reached the end of that and then have to turn round and tell the Americans that 'Actually, what you and we thought we were negotiating, we haven't achieved at all', it is a very strange place to end up."[392]

1039. Asked if he was completely unaware that the FCO Legal Adviser was repeatedly and very clearly advising Mr Straw during and after the negotiation of 1441 that it did not authorise the use of force without a further resolution, Mr Macleod replied:

"There are minutes – on the file which I have seen subsequently, which in hindsight you could see … the London legal view was diverging from the policy as we thought of it. But I wasn't really aware, to be honest, that there was such a divergence of view."[393]

1040. Mr Macleod added that it was not until "towards the end of November" when he saw the draft of the instructions asking Lord Goldsmith to advise that he "really realised that something was not quite right here. I hadn't really spotted it before then, and perhaps I should have, but I hadn't really."

1041. Addressing what he described as "the legal advice beginning to diverge from where the policy was", Mr Macleod stated "Jeremy [Greenstock] and I both thought that it [resolution 1441] did achieve that [the policy aim]"; and:

"That remains my view and, in the end that was the view the Attorney also took. But London, it is clear certainly now, that wasn't the view in [the FCO] Legal Advisers. The way to fix that was actually relatively straightforward, which is to get a view from the Attorney. I think it should have happened. Now, why it didn't is very difficult for me to say from where I was, but I think it is a big gap in the process."[394]

1042. Asked specifically if he was aware that Lord Goldsmith had advised Mr Straw on 18 October that the draft resolution would not in itself authorise force, Mr Macleod said he was not aware of that advice.[395]

1043. Pressed on the implications, Mr Macleod stated that he should have been aware of the advice, and that:

"… it would have had an impact. There would have had to be some quite serious analysis with London, but also with Washington, of where we were going.

> "… If that kind of doubt had begun to emerge about where we were going, that ought to have been fed into every conversation the Foreign Secretary was having with Secretary of State Powell, indeed the conversations that were taking place above that and below it and at the USUN … that would have been a huge impact on the whole way the negotiations were going without any doubt at all."

1044. Mr Pattison, who was in daily contact with the UK Mission in New York, and Mr Ricketts, who spoke frequently to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, were both aware of the decision taken on 17 October, the views of the FCO Legal Advisers, and Lord Goldsmith's conversation with Mr Straw on 18 October.

1045. The FCO's arrangements to provide instructions to the UK Mission in New York on a day by day basis should have meant that Sir Jeremy and Mr Macleod were both aware of the essential points made by the FCO Legal Advisers and Lord Goldsmith which were of direct relevance to the negotiations.

1046. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry he had assumed that there had been direct contact between the FCO Legal Advisers and Mr Macleod.

1047. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry that he had not discussed Lord Goldsmith's advice to Mr Straw with Mr Macleod, asserting that Mr Macleod's contacts with the Foreign Office "were entirely with Legal Advisers, as was proper and appropriate at the time"; and that he had "assumed that the Legal Advisers were talking to each other offline, privately in telephone conversations".[396]

1048. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry that Mr Macleod "had a different opinion on the interpretation of the text, as of course, did United States' lawyers".[397]

1049. Mr Pattison would have been:

> "… surprised if the Mission in New York wasn't aware that Iain Macleod's views were not endorsed by the Foreign Office Legal Adviser".[398]

1050. Mr Pattison told the inquiry that he was "surprised" that UKMIS New York was not aware of the Lord Goldsmith's views of 18 October:

> "Jeremy must have had regular conversations with Peter Ricketts … I would have thought that the evolution of the Attorney General's view was a subject in them …"

1051. Mr Grainger's minutes of 4 and 11 October and the FCO telegram of 21 October were sent to the UK Mission in New York.

1052. They clearly set out the view of FCO Legal Advisers that the drafts of the resolution then under discussion would not authorise the use of force without a further decision by the Security Council.

1053. Sir Jeremy Greenstock took the same position in a conversation with Ambassador Negroponte on 16 October.

1054. Mr Straw took the same position in conversations with Secretary Powell and Mr de Villepin on 16 and 17 October.

1055. The Inquiry has seen no evidence that the correspondence recording the concerns expressed by the FCO Legal Advisers and Lord Goldsmith and their discussions with Mr Straw on 17-18 October was sent to the UK Mission in New York.

1056. Advice from Mr Wood to Mr Straw was not sent to the UK Mission in New York until 6 November.

1057. In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Michael Wood wrote:

> "… there were occasions when written legal advice was copied directly to UKMIS New York. This was the case, for example, with John Grainger's minutes of 4 and 11 October 2002 and my submission … of 6 November 2002."[399]

1058. Sir Michael wrote that, given the convention that neither the advice of the Law Officers nor the fact that they had advised was to be disclosed, there was a general practice that their advice should not be sent to posts overseas.[400]

1059. No copies of the minutes expressing Mr Wood's concerns at that time or the records of the conversation between Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw on 18 October appear to have been sent to the UK Mission in New York.

1060. The FCO instructions to the UK Mission issued on 21 October clearly stated, however, that the draft could not "be read as authorising the use of force, taking into account the draft resolution as a whole, including OP10, which gives a clear indication that further action will be for the Council".[401]

1061. Mr Pattison also told the Inquiry that by 6 November, when Mr Wood sent his advice to Mr Straw, he "certainly understood" Mr Wood's position [that there would need to be a further decision by the Security Council to revive the authorisation to use force in resolution 678]; and that he had had that understanding "for some time".[402]

1062. Mr Pattison added that he was "reasonably confident that both Iain Macleod and Jeremy Greenstock would have understood that to be the Legal Adviser's opinion".

1063. Asked if it was "strange" that the UK Mission in New York was finalising the negotiation in ignorance of Lord Goldsmith's position and thought that they had achieved something which Lord Goldsmith said that they had not, Mr Pattison agreed.[403]

1064. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry that it was not clear to him that Mr Macleod took a different view from himself; and that the differences between their positions only crystallised when it became clear that a second resolution would not be forthcoming.

1065. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that Mr Macleod took a different view to Mr Wood about the effect of resolution 1441.[404]

1066. Asked whether Mr Macleod and Sir Jeremy Greenstock were aware during the course of the negotiation of resolution 1441 of his view that the various drafts did not authorise the use of force without a further resolution, and whether it was recognised that there was a discrepancy between their respective positions, Sir Michael Wood responded that he did not think that during the negotiation of resolution 1441 Mr Macleod had a radically different view of the essential legal position from that of the lawyers in London.[405] They were both clear that resolution 1441 in itself did not authorise the use of force and that a second stage was needed.

1067. Sir Michael added:

> "The only question was what precisely was needed at that second stage, which only crystallised as a major issue following the adoption of the resolution."

1068. Asked whether a difference of view had been recognised at the time, Sir Michael wrote:

> "… I do not believe that there was a significant discrepancy between the legal views in London and New York during the negotiation of the resolution. Such differences as there may have been seem to have arisen when it came to interpreting the resolution as adopted, in the light of the preparatory work … and of the surrounding circumstances."[406]

1069. Asked to identify the consequences of failing to resolve the differences of view during the negotiation, Sir Michael responded:

> "Given (i) the limited nature of such differences as there may have been, (ii) the fact that what mattered at the end of the day was the Attorney General's opinion, not those of lawyers in the FCO or in UKMIS New York, and (iii) the nature of the negotiations, I do not consider that there would have been any significant change in the course of the negotiation, or the wording of the eventual resolution."[407]

1070. The Inquiry was given divergent views on the question of whether it would have been appropriate for there to have been more direct links between the FCO Legal Advisers and the Legal Counsellor in New York.

1071. The different reporting arrangements under which the Legal Counsellor in New York reports to the Head of the Mission rather than to the FCO Legal Adviser in London, and the reasons for that, are understandable.

1072. But given the importance of resolution 1441 and the complex legal considerations, and notwithstanding Sir Michael Wood's position that the general practice at that time was that the advice of the Law Officers was not sent to posts overseas, direct discussions between Mr Wood (or Mr Grainger on his behalf) and Mr Macleod of the drafts during the negotiation could have ensured a common understanding of, and advice on, the legal effect.

1073. Sir Michael Wood wrote that he:

"… did not recall discussing the negotiation of SCR 1441 with Sir Jeremy Greenstock or Iain Macleod, though we were … seeing many of the same papers. Direct contact was not necessary since … legal advice was fully incorporated into the instructions … Lawyers in New York and London played quite different roles …"[408]

1074. Sir Michael Wood added:

"Nor in my view would it have been appropriate for Iain Macleod and me to have conducted some sort of 'back channel' discussion among lawyers on the course of the negotiations and the ever-changing texts. It would have short-circuited the regular process for feeding in combined policy and legal considerations into the instructions sent to New York. And, in the particular circumstances of this negotiation, it would have risked crossing wires, and might even have been seen as interfering in matters of great political sensitivity."[409]

1075. Sir Franklin Berman, who preceded Sir Michael as the FCO Legal Adviser, provided the Inquiry with his thoughts on the processes followed in negotiating resolution 1441; he did not seem to share that concern.[410]

1076. Acknowledging that, unlike in London, as a member of the Mission the legal adviser answers to and takes instructions from the Head of Mission, Sir Franklin said he had never known a Head of Mission take umbrage at separate, parallel, correspondence between the Mission legal adviser and the FCO Legal Advisers.

[407] Statement, 15 March 2011, page 10.

1077. Sir Daniel Bethlehem, Sir Michael's successor as FCO Legal Adviser, agreed fully with the observations that had been made in evidence about the wholly exceptional nature of the negotiations that led to resolution 1441.[411] He identified the close personal involvement of the Foreign Secretary, the particular political significance of the resolution, the sensitivity of the issues in question, their security classification and the potential consequences that would follow from the resolution as the reasons for the exceptional nature.

1078. Sir Daniel also commented on the formality of the process of instruction from London to UKMIS New York during the negotiation of resolution 1441.

1079. Sir Daniel added that in more recent years issues concerning the negotiation of Security Council resolutions would be conducted by email (with multiple copy addresses), video-conferencing and other mechanisms which enabled timely, inclusive and interactive communication, as well as by more formal electronic telegrams.

Conclusions

1080. The declared objective of the US and UK was to obtain international support within the framework of the UN for a strategy of coercive diplomacy for the disarmament of Iraq. For the UK, regime change was a means to achieve disarmament, not an objective in its own right.

1081. A new UN resolution was a key element of Mr Blair's "clever strategy" to achieve the policy objectives of the US and UK in a manner which fostered international unanimity and maintained the authority of the UN.

1082. The UK's stated objective for the negotiation of resolution 1441 was to give Saddam Hussein "one final chance to comply" with his obligations to disarm. The UK initially formulated the objective in terms of:

- a resolution setting out an ultimatum to Iraq to readmit the UN weapons inspectors and to disarm in accordance with its obligations; and
- a threat to resort to the use of force to secure disarmament if Iraq failed to comply.

1083. Iraq's agreement in principle on 16 September to the return of inspectors, was almost certainly a response to President Bush's speech on 12 September, but the US and UK immediately expressed scepticism about the terms on which Iraq would readmit inspectors and its future conduct.

---

[411] Statement, 24 June 2011, pages 4-5.

1084. A new resolution would not have been required to permit UNMOVIC and the IAEA to operate in Iraq. The UK and the US had, however, already agreed that the provisions of resolution 1284 (1999) were no longer sufficient to secure the disarmament of Iraq and a strengthened inspections regime would be required. A new resolution would maintain the pressure on Iraq and define a more intrusive inspections regime allowing the inspectors unconditional and unrestricted access to all Iraqi facilities.

1085. Iraq's letters of 16 and 19 September to the Security Council declaring that Iraq was "totally clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons" and Saddam Hussein's rebuttal of suggestions that Iraq might share such weapons with Al Qaida were immediately discounted. In response to Iraq's detailed rebuttal of the UK dossier, the Assessments Staff concluded that there was no need for a full reply to Iraq's claims.

1086. The negotiation of resolution 1441 reflected a broad consensus in the United Nations Security Council on the need to achieve the disarmament of Iraq.

1087. There were, however, significant differences between the US and UK positions: and between them and China, France and Russia about the substance of the strategy to be adopted, including the role of the Security Council in determining whether peaceful means had been exhausted and the use of force to secure disarmament was justified.

1088. Those differences resulted in difficult negotiations over more than eight weeks before the eventual unanimous adoption of resolution 1441 on 8 November 2002.

1089. In September and October 2002 negotiations were being conducted simultaneously at three separate levels: discussions between Heads of State and Government and their advisers; between foreign ministers; and in New York.

1090. The degree to which Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Sir David Manning, and their counterparts in other capitals, were directly engaged in the detailed negotiations with counterparts in other capitals was highly unusual and demonstrated the difficulty and political sensitivity of the issues under discussion.

1091. Mr Blair played an active role in determining the UK's negotiating strategy and seeking to influence President Bush, President Chirac and President Putin.

1092. Within the UK's overarching objective, the initial discussion of the resolution focused on the crucial need to revive UN authority to permit UK use of military force if coercive diplomacy failed.

1093. Mr Blair was advised that it would be impossible to get agreement in the Security Council to a single resolution unequivocally providing that authority.

From the end of September, Mr Blair was advised that a second decision by the Security Council would be needed to authorise military action.

1094. Mr Straw and Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that tough messages were required to persuade President Bush to accept the UK position and to address the difficulties for the UK that the US stance might create. He was encouraged to try to get the US to agree to two resolutions.

1095. Between 2 and 17 October, Mr Blair made a series of decisions which aligned the UK with the declared US position that no further decision by the Security Council could be explicitly conceded in the negotiation.

1096. To maintain pressure on Iraq, Mr Blair and Mr Straw decided on 17 October not to address the question of a second resolution at that time.

1097. The effect of the policy was that if a material breach of the resolution was reported to the Security Council, Saddam Hussein would not get a second chance.

1098. But Mr Blair, Mr Straw and other senior UK participants in the negotiation of resolution 1441 envisaged that, in the event of a material breach of Iraq's obligations, a second resolution determining that a breach existed and authorising the use of force was likely to be tabled in the Security Council.

1099. The pursuit of a possible "side agreement" to that end, Mr Straw's conversations with Secretary Powell and Mr de Villepin, and Sir Jeremy Greenstock's suggestion that the UK might table such a resolution all confirm that conclusion.

1100. Mr Blair and Mr Straw were, however, concerned that it might be difficult to secure agreement to a second resolution within the Council and that one or more of the Permanent Members might veto the resolution.

1101. In those circumstances, Mr Blair's and Mr Straw's position was that if the Security Council failed to meet its responsibilities, military force should be used to disarm Iraq. Mr Blair had already assured President Bush on several occasions that the UK would take such action.

1102. Mr Blair framed that in terms of the "Kosovo option" and what would happen in the event of an "unreasonable" veto.

1103. Mr Straw told Lord Goldsmith that he accepted a second resolution would be needed "unless circumstances changed", but he argued that could not be acknowledged publicly for tactical reasons.

1104. Lord Goldsmith informed Mr Blair on 22 October that, although he would not be able to give a final view until the resolution was adopted, the draft of the resolution of 19 October would not on its own authorise military action.

1105. The way in which the legal advice was sought and considered during the negotiation of resolution 1441, and the substance of that advice, including Lord Goldsmith's views on the legal effects of the drafts he saw and whether there was any reason for the Government to assume that the resolution adopted on 8 November could by itself provide the authority for the use of force, are addressed earlier in this Section.

1106. Decisions made by Mr Blair at key stages in the negotiations limited the policy options subsequently available to the UK.

1107. In seeking to influence President Bush's decisions, Mr Blair offered the UK's support while suggesting possible adjustments to the US position.

1108. In his discussions with President Bush, Mr Blair did not seek to use the potential UK military contribution to influence the US during the negotiation of resolution 1441.

1109. The way in which the decision on 31 October to offer significant forces for ground operations to the US for planning purposes was taken is addressed in Section 6.1.

1110. The UK was successful in changing some aspects of the US position during the negotiations, in particular ensuring resolution 1441 was based on the disarmament of Iraq rather than wider issues as originally proposed by the US.

1111. Initial US/UK drafts of the resolution which would not be acceptable to other members of the Security Council were tabled without identifying the impact that would have on the timetable for reaching consensus, the consequent delay in the return of the inspectors, and the extent to which that would require key questions to remain unresolved.

1112. The length of time taken to agree resolution 1441 meant the first update from the inspectors for the Security Council would not be required until mid-February, and the resolution was silent on what would happen after that.

1113. The potential tension between the time available for inspections and when US would be ready to take military action was recognised in papers produced by officials from July onwards.

1114. Reporting from Washington in mid-October identified clear indications that the US Administration was likely to be impatient about the time allowed for inspections.

1115. Notwithstanding Mr Blair's and Mr Straw's statements at the time and his evidence to the Inquiry, resolution 1441 did not meet all the UK's original objectives.

1116. To secure consensus in the Security Council despite the different positions of the US and France and Russia (described by Sir Jeremy Greenstock as "irreconcilable"), resolution 1441 was a compromise containing drafting 'fixes'.

1117. That created deliberate ambiguities on a number of key issues including:

- the level of non-compliance with resolution 1441 which would constitute a material breach;
- by whom that determination would be made; and
- whether there would be a second resolution explicitly authorising the use of force.

1118. As the Explanations of Vote demonstrated, there were significant differences between the positions of the members of the Security Council about the circumstances and timing of recourse to military action. There were also differences about whether Member States should be entitled to report Iraqi non-compliance to the Council.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the development of UK strategy on Iraq between the adoption of resolution 1441 on 8 November 2002 (see Section 3.5) and Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, in Washington, on 31 January 2003.

2. Other key developments in the UK's thinking between mid-November and the end of January which had an impact on the strategy and the planning and preparation for military action are addressed elsewhere in the report:

- The Joint Intelligence Committee's (JIC) Assessments of Iraq's declaration of 7 December 2002, and its view that there was a continuing policy of concealment and deception in relation to its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes, are addressed in Section 4.3.
- How advice was sought from Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, regarding the interpretation of UN Security Council resolution 1441 (2002) and the manner in which that advice was provided is addressed in Section 5.
- The development of the options to deploy ground forces and the decision on 17 January to deploy a large scale land force for potential operations in southern Iraq rather than for operations in northern Iraq, as well as maritime and air forces, are addressed in Sections 6.1 and 6.2.
- UK planning and preparations for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq are addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

Key findings

- Following the adoption of resolution 1441, the UK was pursuing a strategy of coercive diplomacy to secure the disarmament of Iraq. The hope was that this might be achieved by peaceful means, but views differed on how likely that would be.
- The UK Government remained convinced that Iraq had retained prohibited weapons and was pursuing chemical, biological and ballistic missile programmes in contravention of its obligations to disarm; and that the absence of evidence of weapons and programmes was the result of a successful policy of concealment.
- By early January 2003, Mr Blair had concluded that Iraq had had "no change of heart" and military action to remove Saddam Hussein's regime was likely to be required to disarm Iraq.
- The US Administration was planning military action no later than early March.
- Mr Blair and Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, concluded that a second UN (United Nations) resolution would be essential to secure domestic and international support for military action. In the absence of a "smoking gun", that would require more time and a series of reports from the UN inspectors which established a pattern of Iraqi non-compliance with its obligations.

- Mr Blair secured President Bush's support for a second resolution but did not secure agreement that the inspections process should continue until the end of March or early April. That left little time for the inspections process to provide the evidence that would be needed to achieve international agreement on the way ahead.

The response to resolution 1441

Iraq's response

3. Iraq announced on 13 November 2002 that it would comply with resolution 1441.

4. Iraq challenged US and UK claims, including the UK statement that it had decided to keep possession of its weapons of mass destruction (WMD), and restated its position that it had neither produced nor was in possession of weapons of mass destruction.

5. Iraq informed the Security Council of its decision to comply with resolution 1441 (2002), without conditions, in a letter from Dr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister, to Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, on 13 November 2002.[1]

6. The letter stated:

- The claims by President Bush and Mr Blair that "Iraq might have produced, or might have been on the way to producing, nuclear weapons" since 1998 and that "Iraq had indeed produced chemical and biological weapons" was "an utterly unfounded fabrication" and "baseless".
- Iraq had agreed to the return of the inspectors, and had "already stated" that it had "neither produced nor possessed any nuclear, chemical or biological, weapons of mass destruction during the absence of the inspectors".
- Iraq would "deal with resolution 1441, despite its iniquitous contents". It was "ready to receive the inspectors so that they can perform their duties, and ascertain that Iraq has produced no weapons of mass destruction during their absence".
- Iraq was "eager for them to accomplish their task in accordance with international law as soon as possible". If they did so "in a professional and lawful manner" the (US and UK) "liars" would be "revealed to the public and the declared aim of the Security Council will be achieved".
- The Security Council would be "under obligation" by "the public and the law to apply paragraph 14 of … resolution … 687, by applying it to … (Israel), and > thereafter to the entire region of the Middle East … so that it is free of mass destruction weapons".

7. The letter challenged a statement made by Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York, that Iraq had been provided with the opportunity to dispose of its weapons of mass destruction, but Iraq had ignored that opportunity and decided to keep possession. The letter asked why "none of the representatives" of the members of the Security Council had "asked … when, how or where such an alleged decision had been taken by Iraq to keep weapons of mass destruction".

8. Iraq referred to the American Administration having exerted pressure and threatened to leave the UN if it did not agree to what America wanted; and that America threatened to perpetrate "aggression". Iraq feared that the United Nations may "lose the trust and interest of peoples". "All those" who were concerned about the organisation were "called upon to exercise caution and act in accordance with international law and the Charter of the United Nations".

9. Iraq appealed to Mr Annan to ensure that those implementing the resolution did not:

> "… push the situation to the edge of the precipice … because the people of Iraq will not choose to live if the price is their dignity, homeland, their freedom or things sacrosanct to them. On the contrary, the price will be their lives if that is the only way forward to preserve what must be preserved."

10. The UK remained sceptical about Iraq's intentions, focusing on its track record of deceit and deception, and repeating the need to maintain the threat of military action to secure compliance.

11. In a lecture that evening, Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, welcomed Iraq's response "so far as it goes" but added:

> "… we must remain vigilant for experience with Iraq tells us to temper optimism with scepticism and to read the small print. Iraq's intentions are notoriously changeable. What matters above all is their actions not their words.
>
> "… The history of UN weapons inspections in Iraq is littered with examples of deceit, evasion, intimidation and harassment. I hope even Iraq will recognise the consequences of any repeat. If Saddam fails to co-operate fully, then he faces force.
> "UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] 1441 sets out the pathway to peace. Those of us who negotiated the text were determined to ensure that it was not a set of traps for Iraq … But we must be clear: he will not comply unless he is sure that the international community has another route to disarmament – the military route …"[2]

12. Mr Blair used an interview with the Arabic Service of Radio Monte Carlo on 14 November to send a message to Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi people and the Arab world that it was Saddam Hussein's fault that the people of Iraq were not enjoying real wealth and prosperity.[3] He declared that the objective of the United Nations resolution was disarmament not regime change.

13. Mr Blair emphasised that Saddam Hussein's duty was to co-operate fully with the inspectors by providing an "honest declaration [of Iraq's proscribed capabilities]" and then to co-operate in eradicating them. Mr Blair added that if Saddam did not disarm the consequence would be that he would be "disarmed by force". The choice for Saddam Hussein was "very, very clear".

14. Mr Blair also stated that weapons of mass destruction and terrorism were two separate, but linked issues that had to be dealt with:

> "… if we allow countries which have got repressive and brutal regimes to develop these weapons, at some point they will use them, and that is why we have got to take the action."

Cabinet, 14 November 2002

15. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 14 November that while the Security Council would need to be reconvened to discuss any breach in the event of Iraqi non-compliance, the key aspect of resolution 1441 was that military action could be taken without a further resolution.

16. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 14 November that Iraq was required to accept the terms of resolution 1441 by the end of that week. Iraq had sent the UN a tirade of abuse but the response was nevertheless positive.[4] The requirement for Iraq to make a declaration of its holdings of weapons of mass destruction and the facilities for developing such weapons was more important. The new inspection regime would start work by 23 December.

17. Mr Straw stated that a "key aspect of the resolution was that there was no requirement for a second resolution before action was taken against Iraq in the event of its non-compliance, although reconvening the Security Council to discuss any breach was clearly stated".

18. Mr Blair concluded that "the Iraq regime was under pressure and the leadership was concerned about the reliability of internal support".

19. The issue of whether assurances to Cabinet that military action could be taken without a further resolution accurately reflected the position of Lord Goldsmith at that time is addressed in Section 5.

UK assumptions about Iraq's position

JIC ASSESSMENT, 14 NOVEMBER 2002: 'IRAQ: REGIME COHESION UNDER PRESSURE'

20. In mid-November, the Joint Intelligence Committee reviewed its July 2002 Assessment of regime cohesion in Iraq.

21. The JIC judged that Iraq had accepted resolution 1441 to avert a large-scale US-led ground attack and it would focus on concealing sensitive items from the inspectors.

22. If Saddam Hussein believed a large-scale attack was inevitable, he would probably cease co-operation and become far more confrontational.

23. In parallel with the adoption of resolution 1441, the JIC decided to revisit its July 2002 assessment of regime cohesion in Iraq to:

> "… examine how the Iraqi regime is responding to mounting international pressure … [and] assess whether there are any signs of strain within the regime and evaluate the speed and effectiveness of Iraqi decision-making."[5]

24. In the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment on 13 November, three key points were made:

- The draft Key Judgement that the cracks in the Iraqi regime had not widened since the last Assessment was correct.
- Concealment and the retention of a WMD capability "remained a cornerstone of Saddam's policy" and his intention was to allow the inspectors in and "manage" the inspections indefinitely as a means of avoiding conflict. But the resolution put the onus on Iraq to prove it had no WMD programmes. The inspectors would need to be prepared to deal with diversionary tactics including lengthy inspections of sites not related to WMD. The UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspections Commission (UNMOVIC) would "eventually" bring pressure to bear on Saddam Hussein, "causing further cracks in the regime".
- The Assessment should address the extent to which cracks might widen, the role of regime members and how concerns about their personal survival might affect their support for Iraq's WMD policy.[6]

25. The Key Judgements of the JIC were:

- Iraq accepted UNSCR 1441 because Saddam knew this was the only way to avert a large-scale US-led Coalition ground attack. The regime probably believes that a Coalition attack will not be possible when inspectors are inside Iraq.

---

[5] JIC Assessment, 14 November 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion Under Pressure'.
[6] Minutes, 13 November 2002, JIC meeting.

- Iraq could try to overload UNMOVIC by releasing large volumes of information about legitimate industries. Although less likely, Iraq might admit to some 'expendable' parts of its WMD programmes to demonstrate ostensible co-operation and to provoke divisions in the UN. But it will focus on concealing sensitive items from inspectors.
- There is no real evidence as yet of real cracks within the regime, but these might appear if UNMOVIC makes real progress. But loyalty within the Iraq military or security apparatus is unlikely to collapse until an overwhelming Coalition attack is seen as inevitable or actually begins. And regime breakdown cannot be guaranteed short of a major ground invasion.
- If Saddam were to perceive a large-scale Coalition attack to be inevitable, he would probably cease any co-operation with the UN and become far more confrontational.
- Saddam's total control means that Iraqi policy can change substantially with little warning. There is considerable scope for Saddam to miscalculate or react unpredictably."[7]

26. Other important points made in the Assessment were:

- The agreement of "new, tougher rights for inspectors" in resolution 1441 had been "an unwelcome surprise to the Iraqi leadership".
- "Regime survival" was Saddam Hussein's "overriding priority". But he also "had a very strong commitment to retaining WMD" which he saw as "key to Iraq's power and influence".
- Iraq's security apparatus was "designed to prevent internal rebellion". Top officials already associated "their fate with that of the regime, fearing retribution from the Iraqi population, or the Coalition".
- Regime concerns about internal security were "focused on southern Iraq" but the JIC continued to judge that "an internal uprising would be unable to overthrow Saddam except in conjunction with a large-scale external attack".
- Iraq had "no credible alternative to ostensible co-operation with the UN" and it could "only continue playing for time in the hope that the international pressure it faces eventually weakens". Saddam Hussein would "avoid extreme actions, at least in the short term".
- The JIC had "no new intelligence" on whether Iraq would "declare any prohibited materials or activity in response" to resolution 1441. Any disclosures on WMD would "damage the regime's already limited credibility, given its continuing blanket denials of WMD possession". The Iraqi regime would "seek to take advantage of any opportunity to fudge Iraq's obligations or delay the UN process".

---

[7] JIC Assessment, 14 November 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion Under Pressure'.

- "Senior Iraqis" agreed "that Iraq should maintain a WMD capability", but if UNMOVIC made "demonstrable progress which threatens to overcome Iraq's policy of deception and concealment, and Saddam refuses to give ground, there could be pressure on key insiders to break with Saddam in order to ensure their own survival".

PSYCHOLOGICAL PROFILE OF SADDAM HUSSEIN

27. Following Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush on 6 November (see Section 3.5), No.10 commissioned a psychological profile of Saddam Hussein, "not least for the pointers this may give on splitting off Saddam from his regime".[8]

28. On 14 November, the Private Secretary to Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), sent Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the JIC, a draft psychological profile of Saddam Hussein, based on a Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) document produced in late 2001.[9]

29. The key points identified in the profile included:

- Personal survival, survival of the regime, and Iraqi-led Arab unity are the three most powerful factors that motivate Saddam …
- He thinks strategically and will operate tactically. He is a judicious political calculator …
- His propensity to take risks coupled with vigilance and a task-oriented approach to problems has led to generally judicious decision making. However, his tendency to seek and filter information to support his beliefs has created a skewed appreciation of any risks he may take …
- The result is perpetuation of a deeply entrenched belief that the intention of outsiders is unjust and it is they who are responsible for the ills in Iraq …"

30. The profile stated that Saddam Hussein would "not wish a conflict in which Iraq will be grievously damaged and his stature as a leader destroyed". His perception of damage was "far more focused on reputation than on physical or economic standing". Saddam Hussein would:

> "… use whatever force is necessary. This is reflected in [...] Saddam's willingness to use WMD both internally and regionally if he believes he is about to fall."

31. Addressing Saddam Hussein's decision-making, the profile stated:

> "Although his actions may at times appear obtuse and reckless to the West, Saddam is a rational actor … Each time he defies the UN or US he will push them, testing their resolve a step at a time, often until his adversary is on the brink of military attack … if he feels he is losing control, and becoming increasingly politically confined and potentially 'losing', he can become very dogmatic, increasingly impulsive and extremely non-compliant."

32. In relation to Saddam Hussein's perception of risk, the profile stated that he was only likely to identify alternative strategies "once something has been proved to fail outright".

33. In terms of predicting Saddam Hussein's future behaviour, the profile stated: "Saddam maximises benefits before he minimises costs." He was:

"… not aiming to gain extra power or resources but simply to maintain his current leadership position. The assumption that the current situation may increase his intent to take dramatic action, does not, therefore, necessarily apply.

"Whilst there is little doubt that Saddam's behaviour is being influenced by political pressure, there are no compelling indications that he is likely to take radical or unpredictable action. On the contrary, Saddam is currently making decisions and adopting tactics that make his near term behaviour more predictable and stable than usual."

34. The profile concluded:

"… [Saddam still judges there to be some opportunity to derail moves towards war.] Whilst his threat perception remains 'potential' Saddam will continue to pursue a strategy of relative compliance, with the main intention of not giving the US or the UK any ground to move against him militarily; provocation at this stage is therefore not an option.

"Many factors within the next few months might serve to either maintain Saddam's current threat perception, or give him cause to confirm the inevitability of an attack. The UN resolution is one such factor. If Saddam perceives a semblance of hope in the resolution, the likelihood of him taking precipitate action remains low. If, however, the resolution confirms in Saddam's mind, the inevitability of an attack, then he will have little motivation to remain compliant.

"In the longer term, there will come a time where Saddam may decide that a strategy to deal with the potential loss he faces requires him to take radical, aggressive action. He is unlikely to wait until such a threat becomes imminent. Once he is confronted with tangible evidence of an inevitable attack, such as troops on Iraq's borders … he is likely to conclude that he has no alternative option to guarantee his survival. In this instance he is likely to act quickly, decisively and whilst he still maintains some degree of loyalty within his command structures."

35. The profile was seen by Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, and Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office

Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), but there is no indication whether or not it was seen by Mr Blair.[10]

Concerns about the US view on the threshold for a material breach

36. Concerns about the differences between the UK and the US on what would constitute a material breach, the US stance of "zero tolerance", and the debate in the US on "triggers" for military action were already emerging.

37. A debate on what might constitute a material breach and what actions by Iraq might trigger a military response had begun within the US Administration before the adoption of resolution 1441.

38. Reporting conversations with senior officials in the US Administration on 7 November, Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission, British Embassy Washington, reported that the hawks in Washington saw the resolution as a defeat and warned that they would be "looking for the least breach of its terms as a justification for resuming the countdown to war".[11]

39. The US statement after the adoption of resolution 1441 on 8 November 2002 made it clear that the US would regard every act of Iraqi non-compliance as an indication that Iraq had no intention of disarming.[12] President Bush had also warned that "the old game of cheat and retreat" would "no longer be tolerated".

40. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised overnight on 14-15 November that there were indications that President Bush's reference to "zero tolerance" was causing some members of the US Administration to seek to lower the bar set in resolution 1441.[13] That might include Iraqi attacks on aircraft enforcing the No-Fly Zones (NFZs), despite the agreement that operative paragraph (OP)8 of resolution 1441 did not apply to the NFZs.

41. Sir David Manning subsequently spoke to Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, on 15 November.[14] They agreed that recent Iraqi attacks on UK and US planes in the NFZs would continue to be treated as a "discrete issue, separate from what would trigger military action under [resolution] 1441".

42. Sir David stated that the UK and the US should not be drawn on "hypothetical scenarios" about what would constitute a material breach. Reflecting Mr Blair's words to President Bush at Camp David on 7 September (see Section 3.4), that "If Saddam Hussein was obviously in breach we would know", Sir David added that "the Security Council would know a material breach when it saw it". He reported that the US Administration would continue to insist on "zero tolerance" to keep up the pressure on Saddam Hussein.

43. Mr Straw and Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, also discussed Iraq on 15 November, including the reporting in the US that military action was imminent and inevitable.[15] Mr Straw emphasised the need to build as wide a coalition as possible for any military action. They also discussed the need for patience on the Middle East Peace Process (MEPP), because of the political situation in Israel.

44. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, took a slightly different view from Sir Jeremy Greenstock about the US Administration's position.[16] As he had previously warned, "Administration hawks" would "seek to lower as far as possible the threshold for attacking Iraq". They hated resolution 1441 and were "looking for ways of short circuiting it". But, in his view, the "debate" on the NFZs was now "over"; although if an aircraft was shot down that would "lead to war". The reference to "zero tolerance" was the "key [point] in the Administration's public presentation". There would be a "battle … between the hawks and the rest". The key would be President Bush's position.

45. Sir Christopher also reported that he had been told by a senior member of the Administration earlier that week that the preferred outcome was for the Iraqi regime to implode.

46. Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, was asked, at his pre-inspections press conference on 15 November, whether, if Iraq continued to insist in its declaration that it lacked WMD, that would constitute a material breach.[17] He replied that although Iraq had reaffirmed that it had no such programme, "it would nevertheless have some time now to check its records". That might lead to a change of position:

> "If, on the other hand, Iraq maintained that position, it would be up to those who had evidence of such a programme to produce such evidence. If the inspectors came up with evidence, that would be brought to the notice of the Security Council."

47. Mr Blair suggested that the UK should be working on the possibility of weakening Saddam Hussein's regime from within. He also wanted to agree a wider agenda of action with the US.

48. In a note to No.10 officials on 17 November addressing a range of issues as well as Iraq, Mr Blair wrote that he did not know if there was "anything in the stories about Saddam preparing a bolt hole. But we should be working assiduously on trying to weaken his regime from within."[18]

49. Mr Blair also set out concerns about the risks from WMD more generally:

> "The true criticism of us is not that we are doing Iraq; but that we are only doing Iraq. I agree with DM [David Manning], this needs to form a major part of our agenda with the US. I want the next bilateral meeting … with the US to draw up an agenda for action across a range of fronts … the timing is right, i.e. not just on terrorism but on WMD; MEPP and the Arab world; climate change; WTO [World Trade Organization]. We need to be articulating a strong world vision."

50. The note was also sent to Sir Andrew Turnbull, the Cabinet Secretary, Dr John Reid, the Minister without Portfolio and Labour Party Chair, and Mr Douglas Alexander, the Minister of State (Cabinet Office).

51. The MOD reported on 19 November that the option of a military campaign launched on 6 January appeared to have lapsed, and the timelines were "uncertain".

52. The MOD did not regard the position that we would know a material breach when we see it as a suitable basis for planning.

53. Mr Hoon's view was that agreement with the US on what constituted a trigger for military action was needed quickly.

54. On 19 November, following a visit to the US by Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), and before the NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organisation) Summit in Prague on 21 November and the planned debate on Iraq on 25 November, Mr Peter Watkins, Principal Private Secretary to Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, sent Sir David Manning an update on military discussions with the US.[19] He set out the themes which had emerged and registered a number of concerns, including the need to press the US to clarify Turkey's position.

55. Mr Watkins wrote that the option of a military campaign launched on 6 January 2003 seemed to have "effectively lapsed" and the timelines were "uncertain". The US military position was described as "get ready, but not too ready", because they did "not want to bring too large a force to too high a pitch of readiness". The MOD was concerned that:

> "Lack of clarity in US thinking about possible triggers for military action needs to be resolved quickly, particularly in relation to the No-Fly Zones."

[19] Letter Watkins to Manning, 19 November 2002, 'Iraq: Military Planning after UNSCR 1441'.

56. Addressing the issue of "Timetable and Triggers", Mr Watkins wrote:

> "To some extent, triggers are now under Saddam's control and so cannot be slotted into any firm timetable. Moreover, what constitutes a 'violation' and/or 'material breach' remains undefined: many in the US are reduced to saying 'we'll know when we see it', which is not a suitable base for planning."

57. There was "a sense in the US" of "two broad timelines in play, implying two different plans". The first was a "high-impact event to which the US might feel the need to respond quickly at short notice". The second was a decision that a material breach had occurred which would be followed by a "more deliberative build-up to military action".

58. The first scenario would effectively hand the initiative to Saddam Hussein. It might provoke a rapid response, but that could not be decisive because it could not involve sufficient land forces to take control of Iraq, "unless … it leads … to regime collapse, a scenario in which the US seem to invest quite a lot of hope".

59. The second scenario would give Saddam Hussein time, which he "might be able to exploit diplomatically and militarily". A deliberate campaign "would require some 60-90 days' build-up, and the time will soon come when the question has to be confronted of whether it is sensible to contemplate fighting in the summer". A "common understanding" needed to be reached with the US and plans "shaped accordingly".

60. The MOD was concerned that, if a Coalition aircraft was shot down, it would, "under long-standing plans, trigger a massive US response", which the US might use to trigger a wider campaign.

61. Mr Hoon believed that the UK response should include:

- pressing the US to "unblock" the Turkish position (on whether it would allow US and UK forces to transit Turkey);
- working "quickly to reach an agreed US/UK view on triggers … well before we are confronted with it in practice"; and
- explaining to the US that hostility in the No-Fly Zones should be met only by "self-defence responses".

62. A copy of the letter was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw, and Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of OD Sec.

63. Mr Blair and Mr Straw, and their most senior officials, were clearly aware that difficult and controversial questions had yet to be resolved in relation to:

- what would constitute a further material breach and how and by whom that would be determined;

- the issue of whether a further resolution would be needed to authorise force; and
- the implications of a veto.

64. The papers produced before Mr Straw's meeting on 20 November recognised that Lord Goldsmith's advice would be needed to clarify those issues.

65. A paper on what might constitute a material breach, which highlighted "a number of difficult questions … on which we will need to consult the Attorney General", was prepared by the FCO and sent to Sir David Manning, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Sir Christopher Meyer and Mr Watkins on 15 November.[20]

66. The FCO paper stated that "Most, if not all members of the Council will be inclined" to take the view that a "material breach" should be interpreted in the light of the Vienna Convention. Dr Blix had "made it clear" that he would "be using a similar definition for the purposes of reporting under OP11". The paper stated that it was not for Dr Blix to determine what constituted a material breach, "but his decision (or not) to report to the Council and the terms in which he reports" would "be influential".

67. The FCO stated that the US was "becoming more and more inclined to interpret the 1441 definition downwards": "Although, some weeks ago, NSC [National Security Council] indicated that they would not regard trivial omissions in Iraq's declaration [or minor problems encountered by UNMOVIC] as triggers for the use of force, more recently DoD [Department of Defense] have indicated that they want to test Saddam early."

68. The FCO also drew attention to President Bush's remarks on 8 November, which it described as "zero tolerance" and his warning against "unproductive debates" about what would constitute an Iraqi violation.

69. An examination of past practice on seven separate occasions since 1991 showed that the Council had determined Iraq to be in material breach of its obligations where there seemed "to have been a conviction that an Iraqi act would seriously impede inspectors in the fulfilment of their mandate and therefore undermine an essential condition of the cease-fire".

70. Against that background, the FCO listed the following incidents as ones which the UK would consider to be material breaches:

- "[A]ny incident sufficiently serious to demonstrate that Iraq had no real intention of complying" such as "an Iraqi decision to expel UNMOVIC, or to refuse access to a particular site, parts of a site or important information", "discovery by [20] Letter Sinclair to Manning, 15 November 2002, 'Iraq: Material Breach', attaching Paper [FCO], [undated], 'Iraq: A Material Breach'.

UNMOVIC/IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] of a concealed weapons programme, or of a cache of WMD material not declared …"

- "Efforts to constrain UNMOVIC/IAEA's operations in significant ways contrary to the provisions of SCR 1441 (2002) … and other relevant resolutions. Systematic efforts to deter, obstruct or intimidate the interview process would need to be particularly carefully watched."
- "Systematic Iraqi harassment of inspectors … which jeopardised their ability to fulfil their duties …"
- Failure to accept resolution 1441.
- "A pattern of relatively minor Iraqi obstructions of UNMOVIC/IAEA."

71. On the last point, the paper added:

"We would not take the view that a short (hours) delay in giving UNMOVIC access to a site would constitute a material breach unless there was clear evidence that the Iraqis used such a delay to smuggle information out of a site or to coach potential witnesses. But repeated incidents of such obstruction, even without evidence of accompanying Iraqi deception, would cumulatively indicate that the Iraqis were not fully co-operating, and thus cast doubt upon whether UNMOVIC would ever be able to implement its mandate properly."

72. The FCO stated that a similar US list would "probably … be even tougher". "Given the opportunity" in the resolution for the US to make its own report to the Council, the UK needed "to be clear in our own minds where the dividing lines" were. The paper recommended that the UK would need to work out "where to draw our red lines" with the US; and that "in the interests of maintaining maximum Council support for use of force, we should try to persuade the Americans to focus on the more serious possible violations, or to establish a pattern of minor obstruction".

73. The paper did not address the issue of whether a Council decision would be needed "to determine that Iraq's actions justify the serious consequences referred to in OP13 of 1441". That would be "a matter on which we will need the Attorney's views".

74. An undated, unsigned document, headed "Background on material breach" and received in No.10 around 20 November, raised the need to address three, primarily legal, issues:

- the need to clarify whether OP4 "must be construed" in the light of the Vienna Convention and past practice as that suggested "a much higher bar than the US";
- the need to seek Lord Goldsmith's advice "on how OPs 1 and 2 (and 13) and the declaration of material breach they contain affect the legal situation of Iraq and our authority to use force"; and specifically whether it could be argued that "1441 itself (especially OPs 1, 2 and 13 taken together) contains a conditional authority to use force … which will be fully uncovered once that Council discussion has taken place"; and

- "What happens if a second Resolution is vetoed?"[21]

75. The document appears to have drawn on the analysis in the FCO paper of 15 November.

76. On the second issue, the author wrote:

> "If this [the argument that 1441 contains a conditional authority to use force] has merit (and the most we can hope for in the absence of an express Chapter VII authorisation is a reasonable argument) it would be helpful to know that now. We would not have to impale ourselves and Ministers on the difficult point of what happens if the US/UK try and fail to get an express authorisation.
>
> "… we think London seriously needs to consider revising its thinking on 1441.
>
> "… from the point of view of OP4 the question is 'What does Iraq have to do to put itself beyond the protection of the law? At what point does its conduct amount to material breach?' Innocent until proved guilty.
>
> "But if you come at it through OPs 1 and 2 the question is 'When has Iraq blown its last chance? (regardless of whether OP4 is ever breached)'. Compliance with OP4 is strictly irrelevant: Iraq is guilty but released on a suspended sentence/ parole. This seems to us to have huge presentational angles – as well as whatever legal deductions can be made. If we are not careful, we are in danger of losing the key advantage of the resolution and turning a provision which we thought of deleting as unnecessary into the main operational paragraph of the text …"

77. Someone in No.10 wrote: "Is this, tho' a hidden trigger? (We and the US denied that there was one in 1441.)"[22]

78. On what would happen in the event of a veto, the author of the document wrote that this was:

> "… probably too difficult at this stage – everything depends on the circs … But knowing the answer to the legal implications of 1441 … would either (i) leave us no worse off than we are – if the AG thinks the argument doesn't run or (ii) radically improve the situation if the AG thinks we have a case."[23]

79. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, commented to Sir David Manning that the document was:

> "… helpful. Of course a S[ecurity] C[ouncil] discussion is needed if there is a material breach. But as the PM has said all along that discussion must be in the context of an understanding that action must follow."[24]

80. Mr Straw held an office meeting on 20 November to discuss Iraq policy with Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Sir David Manning, and Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director.[25]

81. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Mr Straw that he "believed we could get a second resolution provided the Americans did not go for material breach too early". The "facts to convince nine members of the Security Council" would be needed. He thought that the Council "would not … need much persuading".

82. Sir Jeremy proposed that "When the time came", the UK should put down a draft resolution and, "if we could show that we had done everything possible, then we would be in the best possible position if – in the end – there were no resolution".

83. Sir David Manning suggested that France should be invited to co-sponsor the resolution. Mr Straw agreed.

84. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that "the real strength" of resolution 1441 lay in its first two operative paragraphs: OP1 reaffirming Iraq's material breach up to the adoption of 1441 and OP2 suspending that material breach to give Iraq a final opportunity. Sir Jeremy stated that OP4 (and 11 and 12) were, therefore, not needed to reach the "serious consequences" in OP13. He was already using that argument in the Security Council and cautioned Mr Straw that focusing too much on OP4 brought a danger of weakening OPs 1 and 2.

85. Sir Michael Jay took a different view, advising that the UK could use all the OPs in resolution 1441. Mr Straw agreed that it would be a mistake to focus exclusively on OPs 1 and 2.

The Prague Summit, 21 November 2002

86. In his remarks at the NATO Summit in Prague on 21 November and in his subsequent statement to Parliament on 25 November, Mr Blair emphasised the resolve of the international community and his hope that that would result in the peaceful disarmament of Iraq; but that if it did not there was a commitment to act.

87. In his bilateral discussion with President Bush, Mr Blair assessed that there was a need to be ready for military action early in the New Year, as soon as possible after it was clear that there was a material breach. The chance of Saddam Hussein co-operating was no higher than 20 percent.

88. Mr Blair confirmed that the UK would provide military support if that was necessary.

89. In preparation for the bilateral discussion with President Bush at the NATO Summit in Prague, Sir David Manning suggested that the points Mr Blair might cover on Iraq included:

> "We are well placed after … 1441. International community behind us. If we are patient, and let Saddam make mistakes, they will stay there. We must work together to help Blix/UNMOVIC. We should avoid being trapped into tight definition of what would constitute material breach – keep our options open."[26]

90. Mr Alistair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote in his diaries that he had been told by Mr Dan Bartlett, President Bush's Communications Director, at dinner on 20 November that the US view was that it was "seventy to thirty that there would be war, but that thirty was genuine".[27] They had also discussed the need to "set up a proper operation in Qatar, not least to have people to make an impact on Al Jazeera".

91. Sir David Manning reported that, during the lunch for Heads of State and Government, President Bush had emphasised that resolution 1441 was about disarmament, not inspections.[28] As Mr Blair had said at the earlier plenary discussion, that was not a game of hide and seek. Saddam Hussein must co-operate. There would be very severe consequences if he didn't.

92. President Bush added that Mr Blair had made the excellent point that the greater our resolve appeared to be, the greater the chances that the current crisis could be resolved peacefully. Saddam Hussein must be under no illusion that if he did not disarm, an international coalition would do the job for him. President Bush had emphasised that he very much wanted the UN route to work and that he was grateful for the support he had received.

93. Sir David reported that there had been "wide support" for President Bush's intervention. The Prime Ministers of Denmark, Iceland, the Netherlands, Portugal and

Spain had all promised full support. Mr Blair had said that "it was very important that the UN had come to a common view on Iraq and therefore on the threat from WMD". It:

> "… had been right to go the UN route; but we must now have the courage to go the whole way. The international community had expressed its will and set out its demands. It must not flinch from enforcing them."

94. In the press conference before the bilateral meeting with Mr Blair, President Bush was asked about his expectations of support from the UK in the event of "possible conflict" in Iraq.[29] He replied:

> "My expectation is that we can do this peacefully if Saddam Hussein disarms … If he chooses not to disarm, we will work with our close friends, the closest of which is Great Britain, and we will disarm him. But our first choice is not to use the military option, our first choice is for Mr Saddam Hussein to disarm and that is where we will be devoting a lot of our energies."

95. Mr Blair stated:

> "We will do what is necessary both to secure ourselves at home and to make sure that the will of the United Nations is enforced abroad. And I think what you will find here at the NATO Summit is a total and united determination … that Saddam Hussein has to disarm himself … and how that happens is a choice for him. We hope and want it to happen through the United Nations inspectors … But if he fails to co-operate with them … then he will be disarmed by force, and that is the clear will of the international community …"

96. In his bilateral discussion with President Bush, Mr Blair confirmed that the UK would support the US militarily if necessary.[30]

97. In response to a request for his views on the military planning, Mr Blair said there was a need to be ready for military action early in the New Year and as soon as possible after it became clear that there was a material breach. There was a chance of Saddam Hussein co-operating, but it was "no higher than 20 percent".

98. In a discussion about what co-operation meant, Mr Blair's view was that Iraq's duty to co-operate extended to the declaration, the inspections and the interviews. The inspectors were "meant to enter Iraq and dismantle all the WMD with full co-operation with Iraq … [I]t was not a game of cat and mouse." He thought that "Saddam would miscalculate at some point". Mr Blair doubted that Saddam Hussein would admit to up to date WMD facilities or technology, but he might admit to some residual WMD.

99. Mr Blair thought that there was "an outside possibility of Saddam's regime crumbling".

100. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the need to provide support for Dr Blix and to be clear about his role, including that it would not be for Dr Blix to take decisions on military action.

101. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the importance of moving forward on the Middle East Peace Process, which would become easier to manage without Saddam Hussein, and the need to persuade Israel not to escalate the conflict if it was attacked by Iraq.

102. Describing the Summit in his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that the "press were all focused on Iraq, and on the line that the US had pretty much decided".[31]

103. Mr Campbell wrote that President Bush:

> "… felt there was a need for real pressure to build through troop movements, international condemnation, really tough and unpredictable inspections, to get Saddam off balance.
>
> "… once we made that phone call that agrees Saddam's in breach, we had to do something militarily and quickly. Quick sustainable bombing raid, and boots on the ground … [I]f Blix gets dicked around, while a US or UK plane gets shot down, we go for him.
> "… was clearly not keen on Blix, said he was wringing his hands and talking war and peace but 'That is our judgement. He is not going to get between us and freedom. Once we strike we go for it, we don't wait …'"

104. Mr Campbell also wrote that, in response to a comment from Mr Blair that he "believed the regime would crumble pretty quickly", President Bush had said that "both our secret services needed to be put to work to help that. They were thinking of a list of the top ten most wanted as part of a divide and rule strategy …"

105. Mr Rycroft's record of the conversation confirms Mr Campbell's account.[32]

106. In Sir David Manning's bilateral meeting with Dr Rice, they discussed the possibility of seeking an "audit" of Iraq's declaration of its WMD holdings and pressing for implementation of the provision in resolution 687 (1991) that stipulated Saddam Hussein must pass legislation requiring the Iraqi people to reveal any WMD or associated facilities.[33] That would be a test of how co-operative Saddam Hussein intended to be.

> "… expressed our serious concern about terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.
> "Concerning Iraq, we pledge our full support for the implementation of … resolution 1441 and call on Iraq to comply fully and immediately with this and all relevant UN Security Council resolutions.

> "We deplore Iraq's failure to comply fully with its obligations, which were imposed as a necessary step to restore international peace and security and we recall the Security Council has decided in its resolution to afford Iraq a final opportunity to comply …
> "NATO Allies stand united in their commitment to take effective action to assist and support the efforts of the UN to ensure full and immediate compliance by Iraq, without conditions or restriction, with UNSCR 1441. We recall that the Security Council in this resolution has warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violation of its obligations."[34]

108. In his statement to Parliament on 25 November, Mr Blair described the Summit as "a profound demonstration of unity in the face of the new threats that confront us".[35] "Every nation" had spoken of "the menace of international terrorism and weapons of mass destruction". The Summit statement was "a remarkable statement of defiance" which had "rightly" linked terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. The threat from WMD "in the hands of rogue unstable states" was:

> "… not part of some different danger …
>
> "The strength of the … statement on Iraq was testimony to that belief. There was complete unanimity … that the choice for war or peace lies with Saddam, and that if he breaches the will of the United Nations, the United Nations will have to act. There was strong support for multilateralism and for the decision of President Bush to go through the UN, but equally strong insistence that multilateralism and the UN be seen to work.
> "Some of the most powerful expressions of these sentiments … came not from the old but from the new members of the NATO Alliance."

109. Mr Blair concluded that the "ultimate message" from the Summit was that "if we care about these values of freedom, the rule of law and democracy, we should not flinch from the fight in defending them"; and that "Britain" would "defend them with courage and certainty".

110. In response to a question from Mr Doug Henderson (Labour) about whether action without the express authority of the UN would lack "international political legitimacy" and "severely damage" the UN and NATO, Mr Blair responded that it "would all depend on the circumstances". In Kosovo, action had been taken "outside the UN because there was an unreasonable blockage against action being taken". Mr Blair did not believe that the Security Council would "get to that point" on Iraq: "The countries that signed up to the deal at the United Nations know that if there is a breach by Saddam we have to act."

111. Asked by Mr Alan Simpson (Labour) for an assurance that, before he committed "any British troops or support to such a war" Mr Blair would seek a specific mandate through the UN and a specific vote in advance from the House of Commons, Mr Blair replied that Mr Straw would "deal with both points" in the debate on resolution 1441 later that day.

112. In response to a question from Mr Tam Dalyell (Labour) about the effect of discussion in the Security Council and if it would have "the final judgement", Mr Blair replied that it would "be for the weapons inspectors to say whether there is a breach", and that there would then be "a discussion about the seriousness of that breach". "All that" the UK had been "saying throughout" was that "the implication is that if there is a significant breach, there must be action". There was an "international consensus" that it was "not sensible to tie ourselves down to every single set of circumstances, that we want to keep some freedom of manoeuvre and that we should keep maximum pressure on Saddam".

113. Mr Blair added:

> "President Bush made a principled and difficult decision to go through the United Nations. He was right to do that. We supported him strongly and we are now obliged to ensure that the UN route works. I believe that we can do it in a way that avoids conflict, if at all possible."

114. Mr Blair's statement was repeated in the House of Lords.[36] No major issues on Iraq were raised.

115. An Oral Question on the UK's policy on Iraq had been answered earlier that afternoon when a number of issues, including who would be responsible for determining a material breach, the potential consequences in the region of military action in Iraq, and the need for an effective and well-planned exit were raised.[37]

Intelligence update, 21 November 2002

116. Mr Scarlett wrote to No.10 on 21 November to highlight new intelligence on Iraq's thinking on managing UNMOVIC which he considered "confirmed" earlier JIC judgements.

117. Mr Scarlett concluded that the Iraqi regime was confident in its ability to mislead the inspectors.

118. Subsequent intelligence that Saddam Hussein had made clear that UNMOVIC was to be given no grounds for claiming that inspections were being obstructed was interpreted as part of a policy of concealment. The possibility that it might have indicated an intention to co-operate with UNMOVIC appears not to have been considered.

119. Mr Scarlett wrote to Sir David Manning and other senior officials on 21 November drawing their attention to "the first significant … intelligence we have received on the Iraqi regime's thinking on how to manage UNMOVIC" since the adoption of resolution 1441.[38]

120. Mr Scarlett stated that the key points were:

- Iraq intended to demonstrate its ostensible co-operation with UNMOVIC but would actually resume its game playing.
- Iraq intended to declare a small part of its illegal programmes, and overload UNMOVIC with large quantities of information on legitimate activities.
- WMD was seen as vital to the regime's survival, so a core WMD capability and infrastructure must be retained.
- Iraq was concerned about the provisions for conducting interviews of Iraqis outside Iraq, which could expose illicit procurement.
- There was concern about the potential destruction by the inspectors of dual-use facilities.

121. Mr Scarlett commented that the concerns exposing illicit procurement might be referring to conventional weapons programmes and that the dual-use facilities supported "the WMD programmes".

122. Mr Scarlett wrote that the intelligence confirmed earlier JIC judgements, including the identification of "overload" as a potential strategy. There was no intelligence on which illegal programmes might be declared.

123. Mr Scarlett also drew attention to preparations to intimidate potential Iraqi interviewees.

---

[38] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 21 November 2002, 'Iraqi Strategy for Dealing with UNMOVIC'.

124. Mr Scarlett's other comments included the observations that:

- There seemed to be "an inconsistency in Iraq's policy towards inspectors. The [intelligence] indicates the regime plans to let the inspectors into any site. But it also indicates that the regime must rethink a core WMD capability."
- It was "possible" that Iraq was "so confident of its concealment strategy that it believes inspectors will not discover prohibited activity. Nonetheless, this [intelligence] is important in that it further confirms that ultimately the Iraqi regime does not envisage having to accept genuine and complete disarmament, and is confident in its ability to mislead inspectors".

125. The intelligence described by Mr Scarlett was based on reported comments, including from someone with access to senior members of the Iraqi regime; but it was not quoting Saddam Hussein's views.

126. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "There was some interesting stuff around on deception programmes, for example [Iraqi] officials being forced to put papers and materials in their homes with the warning that they and their families would be harmed if they were lost."[39]

127. The Assessments Staff Intelligence Update on 26 November stated that intelligence indicated Saddam Hussein was personally handling all dealings with UNMOVIC; and he was confident the inspectors would not find anything, nor find grounds for claiming Iraq had obstructed its work.[40]

128. The Update was summarising intelligence from a reliable source quoting Saddam Hussein's own views second hand. The intelligence reported that Saddam had made clear UNMOVIC was to be given no grounds for claiming that inspections were being obstructed; not that he was confident that the inspectors would not find grounds for claiming that they were being obstructed.

Mr Blair's meeting with Dr Blix, 22 November 2002

129. Mr Blair was advised to tell Dr Blix in a meeting on 22 November that there was a need for UNMOVIC to "bolster its credibility with some in the US"; and that UNMOVIC should make full use of the powers resolution 1441 had provided.

130. Dr Blix told Mr Blair that Iraq's tactics seemed to be co-operation on practical arrangements but no real change in their approach.

131. Mr Blair said inspections should not be a game of hide and seek, and that one of the reasons for strong action on Iraq was to deter others.

[40] Minute [Assessments Staff Intelligence Update], 26 November 2002, 'Iraq – 26 November 2002'.

132. At a press conference on 15 November, Dr Blix had identified potential practical problems with interviews outside Iraq.[41]

133. In response to a question about whether it was possible for Iraqi experts to be interviewed adequately inside the country, Dr Blix responded that:

> "… interviews were an important source of information. If there were a big weapons programme in Iraq there would be many people engaged in it. The UNSCOM [UN Special Commission] and the IAEA had interviewed a lot of people in the past and learned a great deal. He [Dr Blix] was also aware that most of the interviews had gone rather well and without great problems. There was also quite a number in which the persons interviewed were clearly intimidated by Iraqi representatives. Hence, there should be the possibility for interviews to be done in private, with the IAEA and the Commission deciding the modalities and the place for them. The question would be whether in the present atmosphere the Iraqis would be willing to be interviewed alone. He said he understood the need for the interviews to be carried out abroad. Defectors had been a very important source of information, and would presumably continue to be so. His concerns were about the practicality of taking people abroad if the [Iraq] Government was not willing to allow that to happen."

134. An advance team of 30 staff from UNMOVIC travelled to Baghdad with Dr Blix and Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, on 18 November to prepare for inspections.[42]

135. In Mr Straw's office meeting of 20 November with Sir Michael Jay and others, discussed earlier in this Section, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that UNMOVIC was "desperate for professional help (e.g. sniffing equipment and investigation techniques). So far they had been underwhelmed by the initial UK response."[43]

136. Mr Straw had agreed the UK should do more.

137. Mr Charles Gray, Head of the FCO Middle East Department, advised the Cabinet Office that the UK was providing a list of 10 suspect sites, including the test bed site at al-Rafah, which they would like UNMOVIC to inspect at an early stage.[44] It was also planning to offer a list of the top 10 individuals the UK thought UNMOVIC should interview as a priority.

[44] Letter Gray to Bowen, 20 November 2002, 'Iraq: Obfuscation under UNSCR 1441'.

138. In preparation for his meeting with Dr Blix on 22 November, the FCO advised Mr Blair that it would be helpful if he could give Dr Blix a number of key messages, including that the UK:

- had "worked very hard" for resolution 1441 and it was determined to do everything it could to make it work and UNMOVIC was vital to that;
- would do "whatever we can" to meet Dr Blix's "practical needs", including intelligence support;
- did "not want to compromise UNMOVIC's credibility as an independent organisation", but there was a need for UNMOVIC to "bolster its credibility with some in the US"; UNMOVIC should make full use of the powers resolution 1441 had provided.[45]

139. The FCO stated that there was "a continued whispering campaign against" Dr Blix in the US press. The UK was "keen to see a programme of multiple inspections designed to stretch Iraqi countermeasures and put Saddam's willingness to co-operate under early test". But the UK recognised "that UNMOVIC will need time to re-establish itself … It will not help our objectives if we push the inspectors into making mistakes by forcing them to run before they can walk."

140. The FCO advised that the US was "putting great weight" on the powers in resolution 1441 for UNMOVIC and the IAEA to interview individuals free of Iraqi Government "minders", if necessary outside Iraq. The UK agreed that interviews would be a "very important route to obtaining the sort of information we will need if covert Iraqi programmes are to be uncovered". But the UK also understood Dr Blix's "concerns about the practical and legal implication of extracting Iraqis – perhaps with a large number of family members – from Iraq and then holding them perhaps indefinitely". The US had admitted that it had not "thought through all these points" although it was now doing so.

141. In their meeting on 22 November, Mr Blair told Dr Blix that there had been much support at the Prague Summit for him and the inspectors, and for a tough line on the need for full Iraqi compliance with resolution 1441.[46]

142. Dr Blix reported that he had told the Iraqi Foreign Minister and others in Baghdad that Iraq should not make the mistakes it had made after the Gulf Conflict of providing an incomplete account of their holdings; and that they should not repeat the mistake of playing with the UN and offering too little too late. He had not, however, detected any sign that the Iraqi approach had changed. Nor was there any sign of legislation to prohibit involvement by Iraqi citizens in WMD programmes; that could be passed overnight and would have got Iraqi co-operation off to a flying start. Preparations for the first inspections were well under way. Iraq's tactics appeared to be co-operation on practical arrangements but no real change in their approach to giving up their WMD.

143. Mr Blair agreed with Dr Blix that the preference was Iraqi compliance and that the "inspections should not be a game of hide and seek". Mr Blair concluded that "one of the reasons for a strong multi-lateral approach on Iraq was to deter others".

144. Sir David Manning said that Dr Blix should audit the declaration and be ready to audit new material supplied by the UK and US. Mr Blair "strongly agreed. He emphasised that it was important the Iraqis knew that if Blix found their declaration to be false it would constitute a material breach". Dr Blix had "agreed", adding that "denying access would also be a material breach".

Security Council, 25 November 2002

145. Dr Blix provided an informal briefing to the Security Council on 25 November reporting on his and Dr ElBaradei's visit to Baghdad from 18 to 19 November.[47] They had been assured that Iraq intended to provide full co-operation. The first group of UNMOVIC and IAEA inspectors had arrived in Baghdad earlier on 25 November, and inspections would begin on 27 November, only 19 days after the adoption of resolution 1441. The report to the Security Council specified in OP5 would, therefore, be due on 27 January 2003.

146. Dr Blix reported that he had told Iraq that "many governments believed that WMD programmes remained in Iraq"; and that "The Council had wanted to offer Iraq a last opportunity. If the Iraqi side were to state – as it still did at our meeting – that there were no such programmes, it would need to provide convincing documentary or other evidence." The FFCDs (Full, Final, and Complete Declarations) submitted by Iraq to UNSCOM had, "in many cases left it an open question whether some weapons remained".

147. Dr Blix also reported that he had been assured by:

- Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, of "firm French support for the implementation stage"; and
- Mr Blair that the UK Government would provide "support for effective inspections" and that it was determined to "ensure the implementation of resolution 1441 … and the elimination of WMDs and long-range missiles from Iraq".

Debate on resolution 1441, 25 November 2002

148. The House of Commons voted on 25 November to "support" resolution 1441 and agreed that if the Government of Iraq failed "to comply fully" with its provisions, "the Security Council should meet in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance".

149. Mr Straw's speech focused on the definition of a material breach and whether it would be for the Security Council to determine whether such a breach had occurred.

150. After its return from recess, the House of Commons debated resolution 1441 on 25 November.

151. The Government motion proposed:

> "That this House supports UNSCR 1441 as unanimously adopted by the UN Security Council; agrees that the Government of Iraq must comply fully with all provisions of the resolution; and agrees that, if it fails to do so, the Security Council should meet in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance."[48]

152. Mr Michael Moore (Liberal Democrat) proposed an amendment to make it clear that the Security Council should determine whether military action should be taken. The amendment proposed the following addition to the Government motion:

> "… and believes that any decision that Iraq is in material breach of resolution 1441 is for the UN Security Council as a whole to determine and that no military action to enforce resolution 1441 should be taken against Iraq without a mandate from the UN Security Council; and further believes that no British forces should be committed to any such military action against Iraq without a debate in this House and a substantive motion in favour."[49]

153. Normally the Speaker of the House of Commons, selects the amendment proposed by the Official Opposition.[50]

154. In his opening speech, Mr Straw stated that resolution 1441 had "one central aim: the peaceful removal of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction through an effective inspection regime".[51] He set out the inspection process, including that inspections would resume in Iraq by 27 November, "four weeks ahead of the Security Council's deadline".

155. Mr Straw also posed and then answered four "key questions" which arose from the resolution:

- What constituted a material breach?
- Who would decide what happened if there was a material breach?
- Whether there would be a second Security Council resolution if military action proved necessary?
- Whether, if military action was necessary, the House of Commons would be able to vote on it and, if so, when?

156. Addressing what would constitute a material breach, Mr Straw referred to operative paragraph 4 of the resolution, but went on to say:

> "As with any definition of that type, it is never possible to give an exhaustive list of all the conceivable behaviours that it covers. That judgement has to be made against the real circumstances that arise, but I reassure the House that material breach means something significant: some behaviour or pattern of behaviour that is serious. Among such breaches could be action by the Government of Iraq seriously to obstruct or impede the inspectors, to intimidate witnesses, or a pattern of behaviour where any single action appears relatively minor but the actions as a whole add up to something deliberate and more significant: something that shows Iraq's intention not to comply."

157. Mr Straw also stated that the resolution made clear that there were two parts to a material breach, "a failure of disclosure and other failure to comply".

158. Addressing who would decide what happened if there was a material breach, Mr Straw stated that if there were "any further material breach", it would be reported to the Security Council "for assessment" and the Council would convene immediately to "consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all the relevant … resolutions in order to secure international peace and security".

159. Mr Straw added:

> "If there is evidence of a false statement or omission, together with a failure to comply in other respects, it can be reported to the Security Council as a further material breach either by a Security Council member or by the inspectors. The Council will undoubtedly require the opinion of the inspectors, regardless of who makes the final report.
> "There is then a clear requirement for an immediate meeting of the Security Council to make the assessment … Where the breach is flagrant – say, a physical and serious attack on the inspectors the decision on whether there had been a material breach will effectively have been made by the Iraqis … there will be no decision to be made. The Security Council will undoubtedly then act …"

160. Addressing the need for a second Security Council resolution if military action proved necessary, Mr Straw stated that resolution 1441 did:

> "… not stipulate that there has to be a second … resolution to authorise military action in the event of a further material breach … The idea that there should be a second resolution was an alternative discussed informally among members of the … Council … during the weeks of negotiation, but no draft to that effect was ever tabled … nor put to the vote ...
> "I should make it clear … that the preference of the Government in the event of any material breach is that there should be a second … resolution authorising military action. However, the faith being placed in the Security Council … requires the Council to show a corresponding level of responsibility. So far it has done and I believe it will do so in the future, but we must reserve our position in the event that it does not … So the discussion … in the event of a material breach, will be on the understanding action will follow."

161. Mr Straw also stated:

> "… the moment there is any evidence of a material breach … there will be a meeting of the Security Council at which it is … open for any member to move any resolution … Our preference is for a Security Council resolution, and I hope we would move it."

162. Addressing whether the House of Commons would be able to vote if military action was necessary and, if so, when, Mr Straw told Parliament:

> "No decision on military action has yet been taken … and I fervently hope that none will be necessary … However, we have got this far in terms of Saddam's compliance only because active diplomacy has been backed by the credible threat of force. For that threat to remain credible, it is crucial that we make proper preparations."

163. Mr Straw stated:

> "Any decision … to take military action will be put to the House as soon as possible after it has been taken … [T]he Government have no difficulty about the idea of a substantive motion on military action … at the appropriate time."
>
> "… If we can come to the House without placing our troops at risk, we shall do so …"

164. In response to questions, Mr Straw added:

> "… if we can and if it is safe to do so, we will propose a resolution seeking the House's approval of decisions … before military action takes place."

165. Mr Michael Ancram (Conservative) supported the motion although he sought to highlight divisions within the Parliamentary Labour Party by asserting that he would have "liked the motion to be more specific and stronger … and to dispel the uncertainties which … cloud parts of the issue."[52] He referred to the statement made by Mr Blair in his interview with Radio Monte Carlo on 14 November that if Saddam failed to disarm "the consequence is that the weapons will be disarmed by force".

166. Mr Hoon assured the House of Commons that military action would be a last resort. There were "prudent preparations and planning necessary for military action", but that did "not mean a commitment to take such action".

167. In his speech closing the debate, Mr Hoon stated:

> "Neither Britain nor the United States is looking for a pretext for military action, which is always a grave step, and which will certainly be a last resort. No member of the Government will risk British lives unnecessarily."[53]

168. In response to a question from Mr Mohammad Sarwar (Labour), Mr Hoon added:

> "We expect Saddam Hussein to have the survival instinct … to co-operate with UNMOVIC and to comply with resolution 1441, but we cannot exclude the possibility that he will fail to do so. Let us not delude ourselves. All our experience shows that Saddam Hussein has only ever complied with the will of the international community when diplomacy has been backed by the credible threat of force."

169. Mr Hoon stated that continuing with "the prudent preparations and planning necessary for military action" was the "only responsible course". But that did "not mean a commitment to take such action in any circumstances". It did mean that appropriate steps were being taken "to ensure that British forces" were "ready", and that they had "the training, equipment and support" that they would need "to undertake military action, should it prove necessary".

170. Addressing the US request to "a number of countries … seeking support in the event that military action proves necessary", Mr Hoon stated:

> "Although no decision has been made to commit UK forces to military action, discussions with the US will continue so that an appropriate British contribution can be identified should it prove necessary.
>
> "… There is no inevitability about military action. The US is clear about the fact that the issue is Iraqi disarmament …
> "Those who have accused the US of unilateralism should consider carefully. The US Government have followed an impeccably multilateral approach, first in building unanimous Security Council support for resolution 1441 and now in seeking to build broad-based support for military action should it be required … within the limits imposed by these uncertainties, we have been considering the contribution we might be able to make if military action ultimately becomes necessary.

"At this stage it would be inappropriate to go into details of the size and shape of forces that might be involved, for two specific reasons. First, as events unfold and time passes, plans will inevitably evolve. It would be misleading to describe specific force packages today as if they had some permanent and definitive status … Secondly, as I am sure the House appreciates, I have no intention of assisting Saddam Hussein's contingency planning."

171. The Liberal Democrat amendment was defeated by 452 votes to 85.

172. The question of who would be responsible for interpreting whether there had been a material breach was also raised by Baroness Williams of Crosby in an Oral Question in the House of Lords.

173. In response to an Oral Question from Baroness Williams of Crosby, Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean, the joint FCO/Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) Minister for Trade and Investment, stated on 25 November that she could not:

"… give an exhaustive list of what amounts to a material breach. It would be a question of judgement at the time … it might be referred by the inspectorate … it might be referred by a member of the … Security Council. There would be an immediate meeting, when no doubt there would be a discussion about how serious such a breach was."[54]

174. In response to a question from Lord Howell of Guildford, about whether a further resolution would be required before the UK could "go to war", Baroness Symons responded that resolution 1441 did:

"… not stipulate that there has to be a second Security Council resolution to authorise military action. Such a stipulation was never tabled … the preference of the British Government in the event of a material breach is that there should be a second resolution. But we are not about rewriting UNSCR 1441. It says what it says, and it does not say that such a second resolution would be necessary."

CABINET, 28 NOVEMBER 2002

175. In Cabinet on 28 November, Mr Straw described the vote in the House of Commons on 25 November as an "overwhelming endorsement of the Government's strategy towards Iraq".[55] The next deadline for Iraq was the requirement for a full declaration of their weapons of mass destruction programmes by 8 December.

[54] House of Lords, Official Report, 25 November 2002, columns 557-560.
[55] Cabinet Conclusions, 28 November 2002.

176. Cabinet was also informed that the Oil-for-Food resolution had been rolled over for only nine days because of difficulties with the United States on the Goods Review List.

177. Cabinet did not discuss the issues.

178. A FCO report on Saddam Hussein's crimes and humanitarian abuses, which was published on 2 December, is addressed in Section 6.4.

Iraq's declaration of 7 December and the response

179. Resolution 1441 (OP3) required Iraq to provide:

> "… not later than 30 days from the date of this resolution, a currently accurate, full and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes to develop chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons, ballistic missiles and other delivery systems such as unmanned vehicles and dispersal systems designed for use on aircraft, including any holdings and the precise locations of such weapons, components, sub-components, stocks of agents, and related material and equipment, the locations and work of its research development and production facilities, as well as all other chemical, biological, and nuclear programmes, including for any which it claims are for purposes not related to weapons production or material."[56]

180. The inclusion of a mandatory requirement for an immediate declaration of Iraq's WMD holdings by a defined date had been the subject of much discussion during the negotiation of resolution 1441 (see Section 3.5).

181. Mr Straw had originally warned that it would provide Iraq with opportunities for obfuscation, leading to endless arguments within the Council.[57]

182. In a conversation with Secretary Powell on 16 September, Mr Straw had suggested that a full, final and complete declaration could only be done once the inspectors were in Iraq.[58]

183. The JIC Assessment of 14 November stated that Iraq would "try to overload UNMOVIC by releasing large volumes of information"; and that it would "seek to take advantage of any opportunity to fudge" its obligations.[59]

184. On 20 November, in response to a remit from COBR(R) (see Section 2), Mr Gray provided a note, agreed within the FCO and with DIS about how to handle Iraq's likely efforts to flood UNMOVIC with masses of detail as an obfuscatory tactic.[60]

[60] Letter Gray to Bowen, 20 November 2002, 'Iraq: Obfuscation under UNSCR 1441'.

185. Mr Gray pointed out that:

- Resolution 1441 required Iraq to declare all relevant material even if it was not used for WMD production.
- UNMOVIC had an extensive database of dual-use facilities and it was thought that there could be a need to examine about 700 sites.
- UNMOVIC could take some time to scrutinise and update that "mass of material (even US analysts with very large resources at their disposal) have admitted … that going through the material could take months)".
- There was an expectation that there would be "many discrepancies" between the Iraqi declaration and UNSCOM documentation and approvals under resolution 661 (1990).

186. Sir David Manning warned Mr Blair in late November that there would be pressure on President Bush to move to military action as soon as Iraq submitted the declaration required by resolution 1441.

187. The UK position remained that the declaration could not constitute a casus belli. If an "audit" by the inspectors subsequently discovered significant discrepancies in the declaration that could constitute a material breach.

188. Following a conversation with Dr Rice on 24 November to "explore next steps on Iraq", Sir David Manning reported to Mr Blair that Dr Rice had returned to the suggestion she had made in their discussion during the NATO Summit in Prague that Dr Blix should audit Iraq's declaration and the information provided by the US and UK; and that she was:

> "… confident this would expose an 'audit gap'. It was very unlikely Saddam would account for the WMD outstanding … and very unlikely that Saddam would include the details of secret holdings …"[61]

189. Sir David stated that he had told Dr Rice that he thought Mr Blair:

> "… would have no difficulty with this. Establishing a base-line audit was presumably what the declaration was all about … we could not accept that the declaration itself could be a casus belli. But we were in no doubt that if the declaration proved false when Blix and UNMOVIC began their inspections Saddam would be in material breach."

190. Sir David added that, if it was decided to adopt that strategy, "we should try to bring the French and Russians with us. This pointed to a discussion in the Security Council …"

---

[61] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 24 November 2002, 'Iraqi: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

191. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed the positions of France and Russia and indications that their stance might have shifted in response to a calculation that "one way or another, the game was up for Saddam".

192. Sir David reported that he had told Dr Rice that, if President Bush was "willing to continue down the UN route, he would have the international community pretty much behind him. As long as there were UN cover, very few of the key countries seemed likely to break ranks." The unanimous support for resolution 1441, President Bush's victory in the US mid-term elections and his performance in Prague had "changed the terms of trade".

193. Sir David told Mr Blair that Dr Rice had asked if he would be willing to talk to President Bush. There were some people in Washington who would want to argue for military action as soon as the Iraqi declaration was available. President Bush would be under a lot of pressure from those who wanted him to discount the international dimension.

194. Sir David told Dr Rice he was sure Mr Blair would welcome a discussion. He added that, in his view, the UN process had been a triumph for President Bush. "If he were patient, he would now be able to take an international coalition with him all the way. This would have benefits for US policy across the board." That would not be incompatible with a strategy "to audit the gap", particularly if "support or acquiescence" from France and Russia had been secured.

195. Sir David commented that Dr Rice had been "clearly signalling that [President] Bush would probably be willing to continue working within UN parameters, taking the international community with him, if you [Mr Blair] made the case". He concluded:

> "… this offers us a valuable opening to influence President Bush at a key moment. I suggest you speak to him … when we have had another day to digest developments post Prague."

196. Mr Blair told President Bush on 26 November that he thought the inspectors probably would find something, and that would be the trigger for military action.

197. Mr Blair telephoned President Bush on 26 November to discuss the outcome of the Prague Summit, Mr Blair's discussion with Dr Blix and the response to Iraq's declaration, and how to make progress on the Middle East Peace Process.[62]

198. In the discussion on Iraq, Mr Blair stated that if Iraq did not provide a full declaration, Dr Blix should produce his own audit. Mr Blair "accepted that the first time the inspectors found anything significant that was not in the declaration would constitute a material breach". He thought that the inspectors probably would find something and that this would be the trigger for military action.

[62] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 26 November 2002, 'Prime Minister's Conversation with Bush, 26 November'.

199. Concerns were already being expressed in discussions between the US and UK about whether, in the face of Iraq's deception and concealment activities, the inspections would be able to find evidence of a material breach – a "smoking gun".

200. The UK sought to persuade the US not to make snap judgements on the declaration and to allow Dr Blix to make the first formal response.

201. On 29 November, in response to a request from Sir David Manning, Mr Straw's Private Office provided advice on handling the Iraqi declaration.[63]

202. The FCO advised that Iraq could maintain it had "no WMD and defy UNMOVIC/IAEA to prove them wrong, confident that they can conceal the programmes uncovered by UNSCOM in 1998", but the expectation was that it would be "more subtle: declaring very large quantities of dual-use items and programmes and reiterating all … past declarations. In both cases our assumption is that they will continue to hide programmes …"

203. Dr ElBaradei had suggested that the nuclear declaration was "likely to contain information that would be of use to proliferators"; and that it should not be circulated to the Council as a whole. Resolution 1441 required Iraq to provide the declaration to the inspectors and the Council.

204. The FCO anticipated that the US might "plan to rush out its own analysis (and probable dismissal) of the document in very short order" and advised that any immediate criticism of a lengthy and technical declaration would be likely to be regarded as "evidence of a determination to pursue military action regardless". It might also lead to requests for evidence which might not be releasable or would alert Iraq to potential inspections.

205. The FCO expected the US to focus on seven areas in the declaration:

- ballistic missiles;
- biological programmes;
- chemical programmes;
- an Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV) programme intended to deliver chemical and biological warfare (CBW) agents;
- mobile WMD facilities;
- the outstanding discrepancies in relation to CBW munitions; and
- the procurement of aluminium tubes.

206. The FCO advised that it would be best to "delay giving a definitive response until we have been able to assess the content, while expressing a healthy scepticism based on Iraq's past record of deceit". There was a "need to avoid giving the impression that an omission in the declaration would, in itself, constitute a material breach". The UK should caution the US "against a rush to judgement".

207. The UK aim should be to get the inspectors to "check (or audit)" the declaration "as soon as possible through intrusive inspections, interviews and access to records" against information from other sources, including:

- The information available to UNSCOM in 1998. If Iraq declared "nothing", it "must demonstrate the destruction of material or the disbandment of possible WMD programmes identified by UNSCOM".
- "Intelligence material provided by the US/UK. We have already pointed UNMOVIC towards key sites and provided a list of 6,500 individuals involved in WMD programmes"; the DIS was "working on a top ten list of people". UNMOVIC/IAEA was "willing to visit sites not mentioned" by Iraq but they would "not want to be seen to be taking instructions from the UK/US".
- "Information obtained … through early interviews …"

Where the declaration was "inconsistent with intelligence", the UK would "want UNMOVIC/IAEA to be able to discover that inconsistency on the ground before notifying the Council". That would avoid giving Iraq the chance to conceal evidence.

208. The FCO stated that an early initial meeting of the Security Council in mid-December would demonstrate support for the inspectors and maintain pressure on Iraq as well as demonstrating the intention "to keep the Council at the centre of Iraq handling". That should also call for a more detailed discussion of the declaration in early January. That would "give the US/UK a better opportunity (and more time) to highlight shortcomings" before the meeting of the Council to discuss the inspectors report, which was due on 27 January.

209. The FCO letter also provided a refined version of the advice in its letter to Sir David Manning of 15 November about what might comprise a material breach. This was further refined in advice on 6 December, which is addressed later in this Section.

210. Mr Campbell had asked Mr John Williams, FCO Press Secretary, for "a wider note on handling in the context of a set of public objectives to be agreed with the US". That would include:

- The declaration would be "a key test of Iraq's willingness to comply".
- The inspectors needed to test the declaration before a decision could be taken on whether Saddam Hussein was in breach or complying.
- The UK would be drawing "any discrepancies or mis-statements … to the attention of UNMOVIC/IAEA and, if necessary the Security Council, where the issues will be pursued".

- With “his long record of obstruction and deceit”, Saddam Hussein was “unlikely to make an honest declaration”; the UK wanted “to see his dishonesty demonstrated by inspections” if he made a false declaration.
- The UK would not allow the process “to become an indefinite game of hide and seek”.

211. In a discussion between No.10 and FCO officials and a team of US officials on 2 December, one senior US official expressed doubts about whether the inspectors would ever find any WMD evidence.[64]

212. In a separate meeting between FCO and MOD officials and the team of US officials, it was suggested that the strategy of “force of [sic] mind” had not got through to Saddam Hussein, partly it was thought because of the mixed signals from France and Russia.[65] One US official thought that once he did get that message Saddam’s position might “shift very quickly”.

213. Concerns were also expressed about the activities of Al Qaida in northern Iraq.

214. On 3 and 4 December, Sir David Manning discussed the need to avoid making snap judgements on the Iraqi declaration and the advantages of allowing Dr Blix time to make the first formal response with Dr Rice.[66] They also discussed the need to avoid “the prospect of a protracted game of hide and seek, waiting to see whether Saddam could be caught out, or whether he would make a mistake”.

215. Sir David recorded that the US Administration was “now thinking hard about what might constitute triggers” and asked the FCO for advice on that before a telephone call between Mr Blair and President Bush the following week.

216. On 5 December, Mr Straw told Cabinet that the Iraqi declaration was “likely to be lengthy” and “designed to show dissension inside the United Nations”.[67] It was “unlikely to be fully compliant”. The weapons inspectorates should be “encouraged to make a proper assessment”.

217. No further discussion on Iraq was recorded.

218. The FCO advised on 6 December that there was no agreement in the Security Council on precise criteria for what would constitute a material breach. Each case would need to be considered in the light of circumstances.

219. The FCO position was increasingly shifting from a single specific incident demonstrating a material breach to the need to establish a pattern of non-co-operation over time demonstrating that Iraq had no intention of complying with its obligations.

220. Following its advice of 15 and 29 November, Mr Straw's Private Office responded on 6 December to Sir David Manning's request for further advice on what would constitute a "trigger" for action.[68]

221. The FCO stated that a material breach could not "be a minor violation but must be a violation of a provision essential to achieving the object or purpose of the original Gulf War [1991] cease-fire". That position had been reflected in Mr Straw's remarks in the House of Commons on 25 November. The FCO expected most members of the Security Council to take a similar view.

222. Consistent with the advice sent to Sir David on 15 and 29 November, the FCO wrote that there were two broad areas where Iraqi behaviour could amount to a material breach:

- Non-compliance with its disarmament obligations – if Iraq concealed WMD. Evidence might take the form of discovery of WMD material not included in the declaration or evidence which Iraq could not satisfactorily explain which clearly pointed to a concealed WMD programme (e.g. a yellowcake receipt).
- Non-co-operation with UNMOVIC/IAEA – if Iraq's behaviour demonstrated that it had no intention of co-operating fully with UNMOVIC in fulfilling its mandate under resolution 1441 (2002) or other relevant resolutions. Evidence might comprise a single incident such as denying access to a particular site, information or personnel. Evidence of coaching witnesses or smuggling information out of potential sites would be "pretty damning". Attempts to impede the removal and destruction of WMD or related material would be potentially a material breach.

223. The FCO view was that there would be no need for "a single specific instance". A "pattern of lower level incidents" could amount to a demonstration of non-co-operation sufficiently serious to constitute a material breach. Indications of concealment could include "a series of unanswered questions identified by UNMOVIC/IAEA which suggested a concealed WMD programme" or "failure … to demonstrate convincingly that the WMD material identified by UNSCOM in 1998 had been destroyed and properly accounted for". "Much would depend on the circumstances and whether the incidents demonstrated deliberate non-co-operation rather than inefficiency or confusion."

224. The FCO concluded that there were:

> "… bound to be grey areas over whether Iraqi failures are sufficiently serious to constitute a material breach. There is no agreement in the Council on the precise criteria. We would need in each case to look at the particular circumstances.

---

[68] Letter McDonald to Manning, 6 December 2002, 'Iraq: Material Breach'.

Moreover, some incidents of non-compliance may be susceptible to remedial action by UNMOVIC/IAEA (e.g. by destroying weapons etc). In such cases, those seeking to trigger enforcement action would need to explain how such action would be necessary to enforce Iraqi compliance."

225. When Dr Blix briefed members of the Security Council on 6 December, the Council decided to make UNMOVIC "the depository of the declaration" and asked UNMOVIC and the IAEA to "review it immediately, with their experts and from the standpoint of existing international treaties, for any areas in the declaration that may contribute to proliferation, or be sensitive, in order to assure confidentiality of that information".[69] Members of the Council would meet the following week to decide on the further handling of the declaration. The declaration would "not be available for some days until this procedure is carried out and mechanical/logistical arrangements are made".

JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002: 'Iraq: Military Options'

226. A JIC assessment of Iraq's military options on 6 December confirmed that a massive ground force would be required to be certain of toppling Saddam Hussein and highlighted the possibility of Iraqi attacks on Coalition Forces.

227. At the request of the MOD, the JIC evaluated Iraq's military capabilities and its military options and issued an Assessment on 6 December.[70]

228. In the JIC discussion on 4 December, the draft Assessment was described as "an important paper which highlighted the gaps in our knowledge".[71] The judgements were based "largely on a mixture of observation and past experience", but the draft Assessment "did not quite do justice to the intelligence"; the judgements "could be made more confidently". The Assessment needed to bring out more clearly the risks of a phased attack and unpack the risks involved in possible scenarios, such as the use of CBW before Coalition Forces were properly assembled and urban fighting: "Nothing short of a massive deployment would guarantee overthrowing the regime."

229. The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- Saddam Hussein would "initially seek international pressure to halt Coalition [military] action". If that failed, he would "seek to inflict serious casualties on Iraq's neighbours and on Coalition Forces".
- A ground attack might fracture Saddam's regime, but only a massive Coalition force was guaranteed to topple him. The smaller the initial Coalition force, the more likely Iraqi forces were to resist. A phased Coalition attack could allow Iraq to claim military successes.

- Iraqi responses to military action might include "seizing hostages as 'human shields'; using non-lethal BW in a deniable manner; suicide attacks; or a scorched earth policy with the aim of creating humanitarian or environmental catastrophe. At some point, motivated by revenge, Saddam would seek to inflict the maximum damage on his enemies, whether Iraqi or outsiders."[72]

230. The Assessment of the military options is addressed in Section 6.1.

231. The statements on Iraq's WMD capabilities and intentions are addressed in Section 4.3.

Iraq's declaration, 7 December 2002

232. Iraq's declaration was provided to the Security Council on 7 December 2002.

233. The Iraqi declaration was detailed and technical, written in a combination of English, Russian and Arabic, with approximately 7,000 pages dealing with ballistic missile projects.[73] A backlog of semi-annual declarations of activity, covering the period 1998-2002 which Iraq had already provided to UNMOVIC, was not then available to the UK.

234. On 8 December, the President of the Security Council issued a statement recording that:

> "After consulting with the members of the Security Council, the Presidency decided to allow access to the Iraqi declaration to those members with the expertise to assess the risks of proliferation and other sensitive information to begin its immediate review.
> "This review will be in close co-ordination and consultation with … UNMOVIC and the … IAEA, and will assist them in producing a working version of the declaration as soon as possible."[74]

235. In a statement issued on 8 December, the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs said that "Iraq's timely submission of its declaration, parallel to its continuing co-operation with the international weapons inspectors, confirms its commitment to act in compliance with resolution 1441".[75]

The UK's initial response

236. Mr Blair expressed scepticism about Iraq's intentions and reiterated that, if it did not comply, force would be used.

237. In an interview for the Financial Times published on its website on 9 December, Mr Blair was reported to have stated that war with Iraq was "plainly not inevitable" if Saddam Hussein complied, but:

> "… you would have to be somewhat naive not to be sceptical about the likelihood of his compliance, given his past history … If he fails to co-operate, either in any false declaration or in refusing access to the sites, or interviewing witnesses, or any of the rest of it, then that is a breach. And in those circumstances, my understanding is that the United Nations are very clear that there should [be] action.
> "As for a second resolution, we said we would go back for a discussion …
>
> "We want to do this with the maximum international support and I believe that support will be there … in my view it is clear and right that if Saddam is in breach then we have to impose by conflict, that which we would have preferred to impose by the will of the UN and the inspectors."[76]

238. Asked if he was saying he did not need a second resolution to take military action, Mr Blair replied:

> "If we get to a situation … where there is a clear breach and … someone puts an unreasonable block … on it [action] … as we have seen before … over Kosovo you cannot say there are no set of circumstances in which you would ever refuse to act, because in my view if he breaches and the UN does nothing, then the authority of the UN is then hugely weakened. But I don't believe that will happen.
>
> "I believe that at the heart of that UN resolution is really a deal … which said … the US and the UK and those who feel really strongly about the threat that Saddam and weapons of mass destruction pose, they are prepared to go the UN route, to bring everyone together … we will put in the inspectors and give him the chance to comply. We'll go back to the UN route as the way of enforcing this, then the quid pro quo is … if he then having been given the chance to do the right thing does the wrong thing, we are not going to walk away from it."

239. Mr Blair also emphasised the threat posed by WMD and the "enormous" potential for them to "fall into the hands of either unstable states or terrorist groups".

240. During a discussion of the deficiencies in Iraq's declaration between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell on 11 December, and in response to probing about the statement that "a deficient declaration would be enough" to warrant action, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he did not think Mr Blair had "gone beyond the well rehearsed UK lines on two resolutions".[77]

[77] Letter McDonald to Manning, 11 December 2002, 'US Secretary of State'.

241. On 9 December, the FCO issued the formal request seeking Lord Goldsmith's advice on whether a further decision by the Security Council would be required before force could be used to secure Iraq's compliance with its disarmament obligations.

242. The request stated that Lord Goldsmith's advice was not needed "now".

243. The content of the letter from Mr Michael Wood, FCO Legal Adviser, to Lord Goldsmith[78] and the meeting held at Lord Goldsmith's request with No.10 officials on 19 December,[79] are addressed in Section 5.

244. Mr Blair was advised on 11 December that there was impatience in the US Administration and it "looked intent on military action in February/March".

245. There was a need to build "the strongest possible case" that Saddam Hussein was in material breach of his obligations and "the widest possible international support for action" through a second resolution.

246. Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove had a joint meeting with Dr Rice and Mr George Tenet, the Director of Central Intelligence, in Washington on 9 December.[80]

247. Sir David reported to Mr Blair that Dr Rice had "clearly been provoked" by Saddam Hussein's "challenge that it was up to us to prove he had WMD rather than up to him to prove he did not". She was:

> "… confident that the [Iraqi] declaration would be a sham. The [US] Administration would in due course declare it deficient and say that Saddam was in material breach. But she again accepted that this would not amount to a casus belli."

248. Dr Rice had "made no effort to hide the fact that the Administration would now be looking to build the case for early military action … probably mid/late February as we suspected". But she had:

> "… denied that military planning was dictating the timetable. The need to resolve the crisis quickly was dictated by political factors. Internally … President [Bush] was being 'griddled'. Externally, the international community … would soon lose their nerve if they began to doubt our determination to impose disarmament on Saddam if he did not disarm himself. And if we let the inspections process run, and Blix found nothing as was only too likely, the Russians, French and others would deride US and UK claims … leaving us exposed and Saddam strengthened."

249. Sir David reported that he had been clear about Mr Blair's determination that Saddam Hussein had to disarm or be disarmed; he was "obliged to co-operate" and if he didn't, "he would be in breach and military action would follow".

250. Sir David said that Iraq's declaration should be handled in a way "calculated to maintain Coalition support and to try to secure a second resolution". He thought that was possible, but Dr Rice's.

> "… impatience for action was much more obvious than her commitment to secure international backing. She wanted to know what I thought would constitute material breach, and how we could catch Saddam out if he did not trap himself through his own mistakes."

251. Sir David told Dr Rice that some cases would be straightforward, such as:

> "… the discovery of VX, anthrax, or a nuclear programme … But it would be much more difficult if we were dogged by a series of low-level and less clear-cut acts of obstruction … We would then be in a grey area where it would be much harder to persuade the international community to act."

252. Sir David stated that the UK needed "a convincing case based on evidence. Public defiance by Saddam was not the same as proving non-compliance." The US and UK "should work hard over the next couple of months to build our case and secure a second resolution". That would comprise three strands of action:

- Analysing the declaration: "If Saddam failed to address the discrepancies identified by UNSCOM … would immediately have a powerful argument that the declaration was false and incomplete".
- "the smoking gun: it was unlikely but not impossible, that we would acquire intelligence that caught Saddam red-handed …" Dr Rice thought the chances of that were "very slim".
- "Pattern of deceit": building up "a comprehensive picture of Saddam's obstruction and deception. This would consist of the steady accumulation of examples that might be small in themselves but would be telling when taken together".

253. Dr Rice had agreed the US and UK should pursue those strands and:

> "… would like to go to the Security Council around the end of January or early February to make the case that Saddam was not co-operating and the time had come for military action."

254. Before that, Mr Blair and President Bush "should meet to review the evidence and the options".

255. Sir David wrote that Dr Rice was "very irritated" about Dr Blix's reluctance to interview key individuals outside Iraq, and she was "impervious to arguments" that those identified might refuse because of fear for their lives or those of their families. If Dr Blix would not use the powers in resolution 1441, he would "have to go".

256. Sir David reported that he had also "raised the question of British energy companies". He "hoped they would be treated fairly and not overlooked if Saddam left the scene and new oil and gas concessions were being allocated".

257. Dr Rice had responded that:

> "… it would be particularly unjust if those energy companies who had observed the sanctions regime …. were not among the beneficiaries in a post-Saddam Iraq. She knew UK companies belonged in this category."

258. Sir David concluded:

> "Condi's mood has hardened substantially since the NATO Prague Summit in favour of early military action. (This may be fuelled by a President who is increasingly uncomfortable with pressure inside the Republican Party, and riled by Saddam's taunts). She does not expect the inspections process to produce conclusive (perhaps not even convincing) evidence. This is prompting her insistence that we must make clear that the burden of proof is on Saddam, not us … From this evidence I think there is a real risk that the Administration will overdo the pressure on Blix: they might force him into resignation with damaging repercussions …
> "The mood of the Administration could shift again. But on present form they look intent on military action in February/March. We need to ensure that they use the next two to three months to build the strongest possible case that Saddam is in material breach; and then secure the widest possible international coalition of support for action expressed through a second … resolution. We are in for a tough few weeks. Your influence with Bush will be critical."

259. Sir David recommended:

- co-ordinating US and UK reactions to the Iraqi declaration and asking pointed questions exposing its shortcomings, "putting the onus on Saddam to explain and justify";
- impressing on Dr Blix the need for a "robust and energetic inspections regime, including a programme of interview" while discouraging the US Administration from putting such pressure on him that he "denounces them and/or resigns";
- making "maximum efforts to find a smoking gun", ideally "a top level defector … willing to testify publicly about Saddam's WMD programme. Sir Richard Dearlove and Mr Tenet were "on the case";
- building up "the dossier on Saddam's pattern of deception and obstruction, eg pieces of intelligence showing that he is moving equipment around, has destroyed documentation, etc"; and

- "consider an early, steadying phone call from you to Bush; and pencil in a January meeting between you."

260. During a meeting with Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce to discuss military planning on 11 December (see Section 6.1), Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove also briefed Mr Blair on their recent visits to Washington and "on UK attempts to secure credible evidence that the Iraqi WMD declaration was false.[81]

261. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair:

> "… said that we needed to analyse the Iraqi declaration, ask pointed questions about issues which the declaration failed to deal with … encourage Blix to ask these questions of the Iraqis too, and continue to work on securing credible evidence that Saddam was pursuing WMD programmes."

262. Mr Blair would speak to President Bush and possibly Dr Blix in the next few days.

263. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "C [Sir Richard Dearlove] and David Manning were just back from the US and they reported the mood there was far tougher. They [the US] felt Saddam was just messing about and that Blix was hopeless and too soft."[82]

264. In preparation for a conversation with President Bush, Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of the FCO United Nations Department, provided advice on key messages for Mr Blair.[83]

265. The FCO messages were:

- We're working fast on analysing the declaration and identifying discrepancies between it and our intelligence.
- We should not rush to a final judgement. It will be worth taking a little time to build the best possible case against Iraq.
- The UK would adopt a sceptical tone when Dr Blix briefed the Security Council on 19 December.
- The onus was on Iraq to demonstrate it was co-operating fully and UNMOVIC should be encouraged to push hard. Access to information would be crucial.
- The UK should help UNMOVIC to identify personnel who might be able to provide relevant information.
- An omission in the declaration would not "by itself" constitute a material breach.
- It was "much more likely that we shall be able to establish a material breach over time, as we build up a pattern of non-compliance which is sufficiently serious to indicate that Iraq has no intention of full co-operation … We need to encourage UNMOVIC to keep careful data to establish whether there is a pattern of Iraqi behaviour indicating they have no intention of complying".

- It would be important to keep the Security Council united, but that would "not be easy".

266. Cabinet on 12 December was told that the Security Council had decided that Iraq's declaration had to be scrutinised before it was made available to a wider audience to ensure that particularly sensitive information had been excised.[84] An initial discussion of the declaration was expected the following week.

267. Mr Peter Gooderham, Political Counsellor in the British Embassy Washington, reported on 12 December that a US official had told him that he expected the US Administration to decide "probably sometime in mid-January, to lay it on the line that Iraq had 'one last chance' to co-operate".[85] This would be accompanied by "an increasingly overt military build up from early January". Additional measures for putting pressure on Saddam Hussein were also being considered. The US Administration was also considering a public presentation of the evidence against Iraq.

268. The letter was seen by Sir David Manning.[86]

269. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, advised Sir David Manning on 13 December that the Iraqi declaration was "largely based on material already presented to the UN", and that:

> "There appears to have been no attempt to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or refute any of the points made in the UK or US dossiers."[87]

270. The absence of new material was described as "striking, particularly in relation to the biological weapons programme, where UNSCOM have described previous Iraqi FFCDs as deficient in all areas". The DIS had also clarified that Iraq had "only previously admitted to testing VX in aerial munitions, not to any other weaponisation".

JIC ASSESSMENT, 13 DECEMBER 2002

271. A JIC Assessment issued on 13 December warned that any US-led action against Iraq and a subsequent occupation was one of many issues that could draw large numbers to Islamist extremist ideology over the next five years.

272. The Assessment is addressed in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 13 December 2002: 'International Terrorism: The Next Five Years'

At the request of the Cabinet Office, the JIC assessed the threat from international terrorism over the next five years, to inform the UK's counter-terrorism strategy, on 11 December.[88]

The minutes record that the points made in discussion included:

- The paper needed to make a firmer judgement about whether the threat from terrorism would diminish or increase. For instance, "would the terrorists up the ante … by attempting to use CBRN [chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear] weapons"?
- "The paper should make more of the possible links between terrorist groups and the loose network of WMD suppliers."
- In relation to prospects for 2007, the paper should "stress the likelihood of mutation of the threat, and highlight linkages to regional political factors, particularly in the Middle East".

The JIC Assessment judged that Al Qaida would continue to attempt mass effect attacks, and that "Attacks using chemical/biological materials within the next five years are almost inevitable."[89]

The JIC also judged that Al Qaida might "develop radiological dispersal devices or, less likely, improvised nuclear devices" and that "Technology, expertise and materiel could be acquired from state programmes."

The JIC assessed that "Strong Coalition measures in the campaign against terrorism" would "further radicalise at least some young Muslims. Many issues could draw large numbers to the Islamist extremist ideology over the next five years, including US-led action against Iraq and a subsequent occupation."

The Assessment stated: "Major political change in countries like Iraq [... and others] could place elements of state CBRN programmes at the disposal of Al Qaida."

The JIC sustained its Assessment that the UK would "remain a priority Al Qaida target".

Sir David Omand, the Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary and Security and Intelligence co-ordinator from June 2002 to April 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "On 13 December 2002, we warned that US-led action could draw large numbers to the Islamist extremist ideology over the following five years …"[90]

273. Following Mr Blair's meeting with Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, on 13 December, in the margins of the European Council, Sir David Manning reported that President Chirac:

> "… had sounded sceptical about the need for military action in Iraq. He would only support this if Saddam made a huge mistake."[91]

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 16 DECEMBER 2002

274. Following Iraq's declaration, Mr Blair concluded that it was hard to see how conflict could be avoided unless Saddam Hussein started to behave honestly.

275. On 15 December, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the Iraqi declaration and the need for "hard, on-the-ground evidence" to secure international support for military action.[92] They also discussed "flood[ing] the zone with intelligence driven inspections", and an article by Harlan Ullman in the Washington Post which had "correctly" made the point that "if you don't find anything, then there can be no casus belli".

276. Mr Blair sent a note to officials in No.10 on 16 December.[93]

277. On Iraq, Mr Blair wrote that the Iraqi declaration was "plainly inconsistent with our intelligence. The test will be to prove it is false." Mr Blair asked for a report on Dr Blix's "modus operandi" and to see him later that week or in early January if that were possible.

278. Mr Blair wrote:

> "We also need to build on the whole issue of WMD and show its importance. AC [Alastair Campbell] to do a communications note on this, amplifying his earlier one this weekend. But studying the Iraqi declaration, it is hard to see how conflict can be avoided, unless Saddam starts to behave honestly. My sense of Russia and France is that albeit reluctantly, they accept this and will support a new resolution if the breach by Saddam is clear and significant."

279. Mr Campbell's response on 19 December is addressed later in this Section.

280. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair to warn President Bush not to rush to a final judgement. Time would be needed to build the "strongest possible case" against Iraq, and to secure a second resolution.

[93] Note Blair [to No.10 officials], 16 December 2002, [extract 'Iraq'].

281. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that he should make the following points in his discussion with President Bush:

- The declaration was a "sham" which they should expose in the debate in the Security Council later that week.
- "We should build up the strongest possible case over the next few weeks. Try to find the smoking gun. Tough but may not be impossible." A defector "ready to give details of Saddam's WMD programme" would be better than in country interviews.
- "In addition we need to piece together comprehensive picture of Iraqi obstruction and deception to demonstrate pattern of deceit."
- "Do everything possible to maintain international coalition you skilfully built. If there is a clear material breach, believe we can get a second resolution …"
- The UK's military preparations were "beginning to become more public". The US and UK military chiefs needed "to keep in very close step".[94]

282. Mr Blair told President Bush on 16 December that the Iraqi declaration was "patently false".

283. Mr Blair was "cautiously optimistic" that the inspectors would find proof. Sir Richard Dearlove was pursuing that.

284. Mr Blair suggested that he and President Bush should take stock in January.

285. Mr Blair and President Bush spoke on 16 December.[95]

286. Mr Blair commented that the Iraqi declaration "was patently false. We now needed proof that demonstrated it." He and President Bush discussed the need to put the burden of truth on Saddam Hussein, how much time he should be allowed, and the need to avoid a loss of momentum.

287. Mr Blair said that military preparations should continue. He did not think that Saddam Hussein would co-operate. He was "cautiously optimistic that the inspectors might find proof that the declaration was false. We needed something or someone who was in some way involved." Sir Richard Dearlove was pursuing that with Mr Tenet.

288. Mr Blair was "hopeful that this strategy would work; we should take stock in January if it was".

SIR RICHARD DEARLOVE'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 2002

289. During a visit to Washington in mid-December, Sir Richard Dearlove emphasised the need for sufficient evidence to make a convincing case that Iraq had failed to abide by resolution 1441.

290. During a discussion on 15 December, Sir Richard Dearlove told his interlocutor that his impression from his meeting with Mr Blair on 11 December was that "HMG would need clear evidence beyond an audit of the Iraqi declaration, to commit to military action".[96]

291. Sir Richard reported a view that President Bush was relying on Mr Blair's assurances that HMG would be with the US.

292. The report sent to Sir David Manning recorded that Sir Richard had discussed the Iraq declaration and the need for a "road map" setting out the next steps with a number of US officials.[97]

293. Sir Richard had told one US official that, in addition to setting out clearly and persuasively that Iraq had failed to abide by resolution 1441:

> "… we needed to continue on parallel tracks designed to reinforce the case, and for HMG, to give the PM sufficient evidence of a breach which the declaration by itself did not. We needed:
>
> - a detailed audit of the declaration
> - to press the interview issue or force Saddam's refusal to co-operate
> - to prepare for the release of intelligence to prove deception
> - to press on with a rigorous inspection regime absent a 'silver-bullet'."

294. Sir Richard had said that "perhaps by the end of January all those elements would have produced sufficient evidence to make the convincing case we needed". A "convincing defector or a revealing site inspection" would be preferable, "but we could not depend on this". He added later that "success was far from guaranteed".

295. In a separate conversation with another official, Sir Richard Dearlove had said that he "estimated the chance of a successful operation to produce a defector or a smoking gun at about 20 percent".

296. In a manuscript comment to Mr Blair, Sir David Manning wrote that "we should go flat out" to find a defector or evidence in a site inspection.[98]

297. Mr Blair replied: "absolutely".[99]

298. In relation to the estimate that the chance of a successful operation to produce a defector or a smoking gun was about 20 percent, Mr Powell commented: "Not good".[100]

299. On the description of a discussion about a possible presentation of intelligence "when conflict was inevitable", including overhead photographs of material being moved and intercepts of conversations about deception operations, Mr Blair wrote "but can't this be used to convince Blix?"[101]

300. A separate copy of the report was sent to Mr Straw's Private Office on 19 December.

MR STRAW'S STATEMENT, 18 DECEMBER 2002

301. In a statement issued on 18 December Mr Straw said that Saddam Hussein had decided to continue the pretence that Iraq had no WMD programme. If he persisted "in this obvious falsehood" it would become clear that he had "rejected the pathway to peace".

302. Mr Straw issued a statement on 18 December stating:

> "We have not yet completed a full analysis. But it is clear, even on a preliminary assessment, that it is not the full and complete declaration requested … and we wish to hear the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA.
>
> "There are some obvious omissions … And it seems that Saddam Hussein has decided to continue the pretence that Iraq has had no WMD programme since UNSCOM left in 1998.
>
> "This will fool nobody. If Saddam persists in this obvious falsehood, it will become clear that he has rejected the pathway to peace laid down in resolution 1441.
> "… we have always said that we would want the declaration tested by hard questions and robust inspections. As that process continues, we will complete a full analysis of the Iraqi documents.
>
> "Saddam can be in no doubt by now that resolution 1441 offers him the final opportunity to comply honestly and openly."[102]

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS, 18 DECEMBER 2002

303. Mr Blair continued to express scepticism about whether Saddam Hussein would comply with resolution 1441; and to emphasise that the UK would if necessary disarm him by force.

304. During Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) on 18 December Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, asked Mr Blair when the Government would make a formal response to the Iraqi declaration and whether he agreed that Secretary Powell's scepticism was well founded.[103] Mr Blair replied that the Government would respond "shortly after the Christmas break"; "most people" were "pretty sceptical", but it was important to study the Iraqi declaration in detail and make a considered response.

305. In response to a question from Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, about military deployments, and a reported comment by Mr Hoon that the Security Council would not be the final judge of whether military action was necessary, Mr Blair stated:

> "… resolution 1441 assumes that there will be a further discussion in the UN Security Council … [I]t has always been our desire to act with the full authority of the … Council. We have always made it clear, however, that, if there were a breach and if, for any reason, the Security Council were blocked in any way, we do not believe it right that that breach should go unpunished … [I]t is important to make sure that we do our level best to work with the UN in any way that we can, but the bottom line – as I have set out from the very beginning – must be that the United Nations route must be the way of dealing with the issue, not the way of avoiding dealing with it … I believe that the UN will support action in circumstances where there has been a breach."[104]

306. Mr Kennedy also asked if the Government would back the US if it decided to take any "pre-emptive unilateral action" before the UN inspectorate had completed its task and submitted its conclusions and recommendations to the Security Council. Mr Blair replied that the US was "bound by the UN resolution, just as we are", and reiterated the points he had made to the Financial Times on 10 December about the nature of the "deal" in resolution 1441.

307. Subsequently, in response to a question from Mr Andrew Selous (Conservative) asking for a "clearer explanation" of whether the purpose of a "possible war" in Iraq was "to protect Iraq's citizens and neighbours from Saddam, to enhance UN authority, or to protect Britain from a future missile attack or Iraqi-sponsored terrorism, Mr Blair responded that those factors were not "mutually inconsistent":

> "The reasons for being prepared to take action … are, first, that Saddam has weapons of mass destruction that threaten his region … if a conflict took place there involving weapons of mass destruction, it is unthinkable that we would not be involved in some way, as we were 10 years ago.

"Secondly, it is important because there is a UN resolution … that Saddam must give up those weapons … [I]f … we were to allow Saddam to breach the UN will and did nothing about it, the consequences would be felt not just in respect of Iraq. We would send a message across the world that this was a serious issue, but one about which we were prepared to do nothing … We are members of the international community and we believe it is important that Britain make sure that Saddam complies with those UN resolutions. That is why Britain has a vital national interest in ensuring that the resolution is implemented."[105]

MR HOON'S STATEMENT, 18 DECEMBER 2002

308. Mr Hoon told Parliament on 18 December that the UK was making contingency preparations, including the deployment of a naval Task Group for exercises; and that there might be additional maritime deployments in the New Year.

309. In a statement to Parliament on 18 December on contingency preparations for military operations against Iraq, Mr Hoon reported that he had "authorised a range of steps to improve readiness".[106] He also referred to the planned deployment of a naval Task Group, led by HMS Ark Royal, to the Gulf and Asia-Pacific region, in early 2003, which remained "available for a range of potential operations if required".

310. Mr Hoon added that the UK was also considering the deployment of "additional maritime forces early in the new year to ensure the readiness of a broad range of maritime capabilities, should they be required".

311. The development of plans for a possible UK contribution to US-led military action after Mr Blair's decision at the end of October to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes, and discussions with the US, are addressed in Sections 6.1 and 6.2.

JIC Assessment, 18 December 2002

312. The JIC's initial Assessment on 18 December of the Iraqi declaration stated that:

- Intelligence from late November indicated that Iraq's aim was to overload UNMOVIC with information.
- Iraq "continued to claim that it has not conducted any illicit WMD or ballistic missile programmes since 1991".

[105] House of Commons, Official Report, 18 December 2002, columns 841-842.
[106] House of Commons, Official Report, 18 December 2002, columns 845-846.

- There had been "No serious attempt" to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or to refute any of the points made in the UK dossier on Iraq's WMD programme.

313. The JIC Assessment addressed the substance of the issues, but the judgement that Iraq had made no attempt to deal with the points in the dossier made the dossier a test for Iraq.

314. That was not its purpose. It was for the UN not the UK to define the bar for Iraq.

315. An 'Initial DIS Assessment' of Iraq's declaration, based on an analysis of the text provided in English and a partial but continuing translation of the key sections written in Arabic, was produced on 16 December.[107]

316. On 18 December, the JIC discussed a draft Assessment, supported by the DIS analysis of 16 December.[108]

317. Comments recorded in the minutes of the discussion included:

- There had been "no significant disagreements of perception or judgement between the UK and the US".
- The declaration was "surprisingly bad"; virtually none of the issues arising from the 1999 UNSCOM report had been answered.
- Further analysis of the annexes "would be an enormous job", and the UK "would have to rely upon seeing the UN translation of much of the Arabic material". That text was "unlikely to contain the missing information".
- There would be "a fuller assessment in due course".

318. The JIC Assessment, 'An Initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration', was issued on 18 December, with the DIS Assessment of 16 December as an Annex.[109]

319. The Key Judgements were:

- The declaration failed "to address the issues outstanding from UNSCOM's report to the UN Security Council in 1999".
- Iraq maintained that it currently had "no proscribed WMD programmes".
- "The majority of information in the declaration" had "already been passed to the UN in some form".
- "The new material so far found" did "not alter UK assessments of Iraq's WMD programmes".

[108] Minutes, 18 December 2002, JIC meeting.
[109] JIC Assessment, 18 December 2002, 'An Initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration'.

- The declaration made "no attempt to deal with the points made in the UK dossier".

320. The key elements of the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 18 December 2002: 'An Initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration'

The Assessment rehearsed the UK's knowledge of Iraq's production of WMD before 1991 and the material which UNSCOM had been "unable to account for", and the judgements in the September dossier.

Intelligence on the declaration

"Intelligence indicated in early November that Iraq was considering a number of options … including a possible admission of a small proportion of its illegal activity. But by late November intelligence indicated that Iraq's declaration would omit references to its banned weapons and that the aim was to overload UNMOVIC with information." A senior Iraqi official was quoted as saying "the declaration would be general and lacking in detail and had been padded out with various scientific reports and studies".

Overview

The declaration was "largely based on material already presented to the UN in previous FFCDs [Full, Final, and Complete Declarations] and other correspondence". "No serious attempt" had "apparently been made to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or to refute any of the points made in the UK dossier". Iraq continued to "claim that it has not conducted any illicit WMD or ballistic missile programmes since 1991". "Little new material … on the nuclear, chemical or biological weapons" had been found; there was "some new material" on missiles.

Chemical weapons

The declaration was based on a June 1996 FFCD and additional information provided to the UN before 1998. Some of that information had not been seen previously by the UK. As well as the "unaccounted for" quantities of agent, precursors and munitions which UNSCOM had identified, the declaration did not:

- "provide a key document detailing the consumption of special munitions in the 1980s" which had been "removed from UNSCOM by the Iraqis";
- "substantiate Iraq's denials … that attempts were made to manufacture and weaponise VX".

The list of "over 30 sites in which chemical activity" took place was "incomplete".

Biological weapons

The declaration reiterated information already provided to the UN, which had already been reviewed. It failed to "provide a technically coherent account of Iraq's biological weapons programme". The declaration provided new material relating to 40 sites which Iraq claimed had no connection with proscribed activity but which were judged capable of supporting a BW programme. It did not mention some dual-use sites previously monitored by UNSCOM. Names of individuals included in previous declarations on biological weapons had been “systematically removed”, although the declaration stated that they would be “provided to UNMOVIC on request”.

It did not:

- “address the issue of unaccounted for growth media”;
- “provide fully documented accounts” of the pre-1991 programmes or “recognition of the military application”;
- “acknowledge any proscribed biological weapons activity post-1991”; or
- “mention … transportable production facilities”.

Nuclear weapons

The declaration was “largely the same as the FFCD” for activity pre-1991 which had been issued in 1998, “with a new extended summary”. It was “accurate” but “incomplete”. It maintained that no weapons-related work had been undertaken since 1998. It did not address whether Iraq had been seeking uranium in Africa.

Ballistic missiles

Most of the data provided related to pre-1991 programmes. The declaration acknowledged “some facilities established since 1998” and “known from intelligence”. It also provided “some limited new evidence of proscribed missile development post-1991”. Two designs were judged to have ranges greater than the limit of 150km.

The “major omissions” were:

- “no attempt to resolve outstanding issues” relating to SCUD missiles;
- “no mention of any post-1998 activity at many missile related facilities, including the al-Rafah engine test stand”, which was “capable of testing engines for missiles with ranges over 1000km”; and
- “no details of recent procurement activity associated with more advanced missile propellant”.

Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs)

- The declaration referred to “aborted attempts” to convert an anti-ship missile into a land attack weapon with a range of 95km. The JIC judged the “system would be suitable for chemical and biological delivery”.
- The declaration claimed that the L-29 aircraft was “a target-drone” and there “was no mention of a chemical or biological agent delivery capability”. The JIC judged that Iraq had “more aircraft” and had “conducted more flight tests than stated”; and that its range was “understated”.
- The declaration provided “limited, but new information on two UAV programmes”, which Iraq claimed had “started after 1998”, that had been included in reports recently passed to UNMOVIC. They would be “used as target drones”. The JIC judged that the UAVs “would have a significantly better performance” than claimed and could be “adapted to chemical and biological agent delivery”.

Conclusion

The JIC concluded that the declaration so far analysed failed to address the outstanding issues from UNSCOM's report to the Security Council in 1999 and "made no attempt to answer any of the points outlined in the UK dossier". Iraq might:

> "… feel they dealt with these points in their previous rebuttal of the dossier. Some of the deficiencies may be addressed in the parts yet to be translated, but this does not look likely."

321. On 20 December, Mr Miller sent Sir David Manning a further DIS overview of the Iraqi declaration.[110]

322. Mr Miller re-stated the key findings outlined in the 18 December JIC Assessment and identified the principal areas of apparent omission. The main new points identified were:

- an admission by the Iraqis that they have delivered 50 Al Samoud missiles to their military. The UK dossier stated that at least 50 of these missiles had been produced and were being deployed to military units;
- details of missile related procurement activities post-1998, which Iraq claims were for permitted programmes. There are no details concerning the origin of the material and equipment procured, some of which we judge were obtained illicitly;
- the document fails to cover refurbishment at potential BW sites."

323. Mr Miller reported that the DIS would continue to analyse the declaration when a full English text was available from the UN. That was likely to be after Christmas.

324. On 18 December, the JIC also discussed a letter of 13 December from Mr Miller on the cohesion of the Iraqi regime.[111]

325. The main point raised was that the fundamental judgement of the JIC of 6 December had not changed, "especially that nothing short of a massive Coalition force was guaranteed to threaten the regime enough to topple it". There were, however, "more areas of pressure building within the regime, although it was still impossible to say how and when it might fracture". The Iraqi people's perceptions of Saddam Hussein's position would be "crucial". The two "tipping points" would be when:

- "people decided that they would be better off without Saddam"; and
- "they decided that he had finally lost control".

326. The JIC "would need to keep coming back to this subject as events developed in the New Year".

Meeting of the US National Security Council, 18 December 2002

In his memoir, War and Decision, Mr Douglas Feith, US Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, described a meeting of the US National Security Council on 18 December 2002, at which the US response to Iraq's declaration was discussed.[112]

Mr Feith described differences of view between President Bush and other members of the Council about the position the US Administration should adopt in response to the discussion of the Iraqi declaration of 7 December in the Security Council on 19 December, and the impact which describing the declaration as a material breach of resolution 1441 would have.

Mr Feith reported that, after some discussion, President Bush stated that he thought "war was inevitable". President Bush was concerned that use of the term material breach would create an expectation of military action and a debate about whether it was sufficient for the US to go to war.

Secretary Powell was reported to have taken a different position; and that he had suggested the US should make its case to the Security Council that Saddam Hussein was not co-operating soon after Dr Blix's report on 27 January 2003.

Mr Feith reported that President Bush had reminded those in the room that the point of the 7 December declaration was to test whether Saddam would accept the "final opportunity" for peace offered by the Security Council; and that he had summed up the discussion by stating:

> "We've got what we need now, to show America that Saddam won't disarm himself."

Cabinet, 19 December 2002

327. In his update to Cabinet on 19 December, Mr Straw suggested that the Iraqi declaration did not meet the requirements of resolution 1441 and that the next step would be increased efforts by the inspectors to find the evidence. The Security Council could be in a position to declare a material breach by 27 January 2003.

328. Mr Hoon informed Cabinet that preparations were being made to be ready for possible military action.

329. Mr Blair promised that there would be an "opportunity to discuss Iraq in the New Year".

330. Mr Straw reported to Cabinet on 19 December that Iraq's declaration did not look as "accurate, full and complete as the resolution required"; and that, in particular, it failed to explain the material which had been "unaccounted for in 1998 such as: 360 tonnes of bulk chemical warfare agent; 3,000 tonnes of precursor chemicals; growth media for biological agent production and 30,000 munitions for the delivery of chemical and biological agents".[113]

331. Mr Straw reminded his colleagues that a false statement did not represent a material breach, "but it could be a contributing factor". The next step would be increased efforts by the inspectors to find the evidence. The inspectors had to report to the UN Security Council on progress by 27 January. By that time, "the Security Council could be in a position to declare a material breach". President Bush would be making his State of the Union speech on 28 January.

332. Mr Hoon informed his colleagues that, "to be ready for possible military action", it was "increasingly necessary to make visible preparations. Contracts for equipment would be let; Reservists and their employers would be consulted; the notice to move for some units would be reduced; and a naval Task Group led by HMS Ark Royal would depart for exercises." The US had not yet finalised its military planning but it was "already building up a formidable force and would be ready to use it".

333. Mr Blair said that "there would be an opportunity to discuss Iraq in the New Year".

334. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, had pointed up the need for more discussion on Iraq.[114]

Security Council, 19 December 2002

335. In response to a briefing from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 19 December, the Security Council agreed to a further discussion early the following month, after members of the Council had completed their analytical work.

336. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported overnight on 17/18 December that Dr Blix would tell the Security Council on 19 December that it could not have confidence that the declaration "disposed of" the question of Iraq's WMD holdings but that he could not say Iraq definitely had WMD; there was more work to do and the ball was in Iraq's court.[115]

337. On 17 and 18 December, Secretary Powell and Mr Straw discussed the pressure on the US Administration to say "something strong" (in response to Dr Blix's briefing to Members of the Security Council) and the need to catch Iraq "red-handed".[116]

338. Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei briefed Members of the Security Council on 19 December on inspections in Iraq and their preliminary assessment of Iraq's declaration.[117]

339. Dr Blix reported on the speed of UNMOVIC's build-up of operations in Iraq and that it had inspected 44 sites, including eight newly declared locations.[118] Access to the sites, including those previously designated by Iraq as sensitive or Presidential, had been "prompt", and assistance had been "expeditious". The location of artillery shells and containers with mustard gas, which had been placed under UNSCOM supervision in 1998, had been identified and they would be sampled and eventually destroyed. Dr Blix reported that Iraq had formally been asked to submit the names of all personnel currently or formerly associated with some aspect of Iraq's programme of weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles by the end of the year; and for legislation implementing resolutions, notably laws prohibiting engagement in the development, production or storage of proscribed material.

340. In his "necessarily provisional" comments on the declaration, Dr Blix stated that Iraq continued to state that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq when the inspectors left in December 1998 and that none had "been designed, procured, produced or stored in the period since then". While individual Governments had stated that they had "convincing evidence to the contrary", UNMOVIC was, at that point, "neither in a position to confirm Iraq's statements, nor in possession of evidence to disprove it".

341. During the period between 1991 and 1998, Iraq had submitted many declarations which had "proved inaccurate or incomplete or was unsupported or contradicted by evidence". The statements by Iraq were not sufficient to create confidence that no weapons programmes and proscribed items remained: the statements needed to be "supported by documentation or other evidence" which would allow them to be verified.

342. The overall impression was that "not much new significant information" had been provided which related to proscribed programmes; nor had "much new supporting documentation or other evidence been submitted". Iraq had provided new information on:

- missile activities, including a series of new projects at various stages of development, which Iraq claimed were permitted;
- a short-range rocket manufactured using 81mm aluminium tubes; and
- the "Air Force" document[119] relating to the consumption of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq war.

New material had been provided "concerning non-weapons related activities".

[118] UN Security Council, 19 December 2002, 'Notes for briefing the Security Council regarding inspections in Iraq and a preliminary assessment of Iraq's declaration under paragraph 3 of resolution 1441 (2002) – Hans Blix, Executive Chairman UNMOVIC'.

[119] A document found by an UNSCOM inspector in a safe in Iraqi Air Force headquarters in 1998. It gave an account of the expenditure of bombs, including chemical bombs, by Iraq in the Iran-Iraq war which raised questions about Iraq's previous accounts. Iraq had taken the document from the inspector.

343. There were also inconsistencies and areas which needed clarification, including:

- the omission of information on imports of bacterial growth media;
- declaration of the development of a variant of the Al Samoud missile which had exceeded the permitted range in test flights; and
- a lack of supporting evidence to address unresolved issues identified in the 1999 UNSCOM and Amorim reports.

344. In conclusion, Dr Blix stated that, if Iraq failed to provide evidence supporting its statements, the inspectors could not guarantee that all possibly concealed items and activities would be found; but they would make attempts at concealment more difficult.

345. A statement by the President of the Council said that the members had noted the contents of the briefing and expressed their intention to have a further discussion "early in January after all members of the Council finish their own analytical work" and more regular briefings from UNMOVIC and the IAEA.[120]

346. In his remarks to the Security Council, Sir Jeremy Greenstock drew on the statement issued by Mr Straw on 18 December. He gave examples of weapons and materials which had not been accounted for in the declaration and added that:

> "The declaration fell well short of providing compelling evidence that Iraq wishes to establish a new co-operative relationship with UNMOVIC and the Council. On the contrary, it suggested that Iraq had no intention of complying with SCR 1441, or taking the pathway to peace laid down in that resolution. We wanted to see … the discrepancies probed rigorously … In short, we were very disappointed that Iraq had not taken the 1441 opportunity. I would not speculate what this meant. But Iraq now had to be 100 percent pro-active in co-operating with the inspectors in accounting for every remaining doubt. Withholding this quality of co-operation risked bringing into play the second part of OP4 of 1441."[121]

347. Sir Jeremy Greenstock also reported that Dr ElBaradei had appealed to Member States to offer whatever information they had to assist UNMOVIC and the IAEA in reaching credible conclusions on Iraq's weapons programmes.

348. Sir Jeremy described the meeting as a "surprisingly low key affair, largely because the non-permanents had only had the declaration for 36 hours". Some of them were insisting that they see the un-excised version.

349. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix had told the press that there was little new evidence in the declaration and what was new generally related to non-weapons programmes. Iraq was co-operating on process but much more was needed on substance. There were open questions which had not been answered with evidence. Iraq had missed an opportunity in its declaration, but could still provide information.

350. Mr Campbell recorded that Mr Blair was "worried about Blix's comments that we had not been helping enough with the intelligence".[122]

351. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director General Defence and Intelligence, advised Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 19 December that the UK was passing intelligence to UNMOVIC but "We had not found a silver bullet yet."[123]

352. Mr Straw issued a statement which said that the declaration failed to meet Iraq's obligations and that there could not, therefore, be any confidence in Iraq's claims that it had no WMD.

353. In a statement issued after the reports to the Security Council, Mr Straw said that they showed:

> "… clearly that Iraq has failed to meet the obligations imposed on it by Security Council resolution 1441, which requires them to make a full and complete disclosure of their weapons of mass destruction … as Dr Blix has said, this means that we cannot have confidence … to put it very mildly – that Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction as it has claimed. This now means that Iraq faces even greater responsibilities to comply fully with the inspectors and co-operate fully with the United Nations if military action is to be avoided. This disclosure does not of itself trigger military action … but it is a very serious failure to comply, and a clear warning has to go out to Iraq that they now have to co-operate fully with the United Nations and its inspectors as is required of them by international law."[124]

354. Secretary Powell warned that Iraq was "well on its way to losing its last chance", and that there was a "practical limit" to how long the inspectors could be given to complete their work.

355. Secretary Powell gave a press conference on 19 December stating that the Iraqi declaration did not address Iraq's stockpiles or supplies of chemical and biological agents and the procurement and use of high-strength aluminium tubes that can be used in a nuclear weapons programme: "Most brazenly of all, the Iraqi declaration denies the existence of any prohibited weapons programs at all."[125] There was a "pattern of systematic holes and gaps". The US was "disappointed, but … not deceived … On the basis of this declaration, on the basis of the evidence before us, our path for the coming weeks is clear."

356. Secretary Powell proposed a four-step approach in the coming weeks to:

- audit and examine the Iraqi declaration "to understand the full extent of Iraq's failure to meet its disclosure obligations";
- conduct interviews with scientists and other witnesses outside Iraq;
- intensify UN inspectors' efforts inside Iraq; and
- consult the Security Council and US allies on how to compel Iraq to comply with the terms of the resolution.

357. Secretary Powell stated that the United States, and he hoped other Council members, would "provide the inspectors with every possible assistance, all the support they need to succeed in their crucial mission". Resolution 1441 had called for "serious consequences for Iraq" if it did not comply. So far, Iraq was "well on its way to losing its last chance". There was "no calendar deadline", but there was "a practical limit to how much longer you can just go down the road of non-co-operation and how much time the inspectors can be given to do their work … This situation cannot continue."

358. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell had spoken before the press conference about Mr Straw's remarks on the BBC's Today programme earlier that day. Mr Straw said that he had "repeated [the] long standing position that [the UK] would prefer a second resolution, with the usual Kosovo caveats".[126]

359. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell also discussed the need for the White House to be clear about Mr Blair's position.

360. In a letter to Mr Straw's Private Secretary, Mr Ehrman wrote:

> "With the American military machine now increasingly set on auto-pilot towards war, the nightmare scenario of the UK having to decide whether to join US military action without a second SCR is only made more likely …"[127]

361. Sir Christopher Meyer reported on 19 December that there was "some fairly intensive kremlinology going on in the White House about the British political scene … What did Tony Blair need to be able comfortably to go to war?".[128] The current US view "which could change, was that a second SCR was attainable". Sir Christopher had told a senior US official that "a spring war looked as close as possible to being inevitable without actually being inevitable".

The need for a communications strategy

362. Mr Campbell advised Mr Blair that a statement would be needed early in the New Year bringing all the strands of the strategy on Iraq together to set out the UK Government's position and to counter the sense that the UK was acting for America.

363. Mr Campbell suggested that the statement should communicate the "big picture" and provide the basis for addressing difficult questions: Why Iraq? Why now? And why us? That should include the UK's definition of material breach.

364. Mr John Williams had written to Mr Campbell on 2 December in response to a request for "strategic public objectives on Iraq, setting out our aims, and working through the difficult issues".[129] Mr Williams provided two papers, one on "Public Objectives" for public use and one on "Media Tactics". Both had been approved by Mr Straw.

365. The paper on "public objectives" drew on the strategic objectives agreed by Mr Blair and sent to Ministers on 22 October (see Section 3.5).

366. Production of a document setting out the UK objectives and the need to be more "in control of the agenda" was discussed at meeting of an Iraq Strategy Group chaired by Mr Campbell on 10 December and subsequently.[130]

367. In response to Mr Blair's request of 16 December, Mr Campbell wrote to Mr Blair on 19 December setting out the need to explain the UK's strategy and seeking Mr Blair's views.[131]

368. Mr Campbell wrote: "Iraq is moving up a gear as an issue and as we enter the New Year we need to step up our communications efforts."

369. Mr Campbell recommended that the objectives approved in October should be published as soon as Parliament returned on 7 January, with a statement in the House of Commons from Mr Blair alongside publicity generated by the FCO Heads of Mission Conference. The statement would set out the strategic framework for the Government's overall approach and draw together the diplomatic, political and humanitarian strands of the strategy on Iraq as well as addressing issues of proliferation and terrorism. It would "give us all the big picture to communicate and give us a handle for the difficult questions as we go".

[131] Minute Campbell to Prime Minister, 19 December 2002, 'Re: Iraq Communications'.

370. Mr Campbell argued that the communications strategy "should be rooted in where we think we will end up which currently looks like a military conflict that ends in Saddam falling". The major steps and key messages envisaged by Mr Campbell were:

- Iraq's declaration would be "shown to be false – requires strategy which … emphasises our determination to ensure Saddam Hussein understands … this is his last chance and that we are trying our hardest to make the process work … We need to guard against the sense that we are looking for the process to fail, rather than looking for the process to succeed;"
- a "UN discussion" where the tone would be one of "regret that he [Saddam] failed to take the chance" and with the "UK at heart of coalition building around key arguments";
- a "Military build up" which moved from the "current argument that 'sometimes the only way to avoid conflict is by making it clear willing to use force if necessary' to 'we did not want war, but Saddam Hussein has rejected the peaceful path to disarmament'";
- "Military conflict: This is the last resort. Now we need to get the job done"; and
- "Post conflict: We're there to help for the long term."

371. A "specific communications plan for the Iraqi people" was being developed which would emphasise Iraq's territorial integrity and make it clear that "we are gunning for Saddam's people at the top, not the 'ordinary' people". In Mr Campbell's view they would "actually prefer a 'regime change' message to a more subtle 'disarmament' message".

372. Mr Campbell argued that the UK needed a "clear sense of a UK Government position that is our own … not merely an echo" of the US position and counter the sense that the UK was acting for America. The UK had to "communicate better the threat and relevance to the UK". The UK position "should be that the issue of Iraq/WMD has to be addressed, we worked hard to get [the] UN route … and we're working hard to make that route work. But Saddam has to understand this is his last chance, and in the meantime we carry on military preparations."

373. Mr Campbell wrote that the US tone was "dismissive" on inspections; the UK had to be deliberative. The UK needed to "set out our own definition of material breach. The closest we have is Jack [Straw]'s statement that 'material breach means something significant: some behaviour or pattern of behaviour which is serious'". In Mr Campbell's view, the media confused "material breach and trigger".

374. Other points made by Mr Campbell were that the UK needed to:

- "… rebut the 'poodle charge' by answering more clearly the questions – Why Iraq? Why now? And why us?";
- "… put over to the public" that we are in charge of our military preparations, separate from the Americans, "though obviously linked". The fact that the US/UK had hugely superior military was likely to have the most impact on Iraqi opinion "so we have agreed MOD should step up their military preparedness briefing";

- rebut negative stories, including the "charge that the conflict is all about oil";
- "… make more of the issue of WMD more generally, and make the link (largely unbelieved here or in the US) with terrorism. It is a theoretical link, not yet an actual one, and the US, in continuing to make claims of an actual link, risk being counter productive"; and
- have "better answers to the charge of double standards re Israel, which is the single biggest impediment to effective communications in the region".

375. Mr Campbell concluded that there was "a big job of work to do" which would "require a lot of input" from Mr Blair and set out a list of potential communications opportunities in January.

376. Mr Campbell also set out the arrangements he had put in place to "implement a major communications strategy, including:

- a weekly strategy meeting;
- daily reviews;
- daily US conference calls;
- CIC [Communications and Information Centre] reactivated;
- excellent output by the Islamic Media Unit;
- a small but effective presence in Amman (media route to Baghdad); and
- good co-operation with the Agencies."

377. Mr Campbell also sent Mr Blair an "agreed Iraq strategy document", advising him that it showed "a lot of work has been done, and we have the outlines of a good communications strategy".

The absence of a "smoking gun"

378. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell on 30 December that the US and UK should develop a clear "plan B" postponing military action on the basis that inspections plus the threat of force was containing Saddam Hussein.

379. On 24 December, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that the UK was:

> "… clear that a second resolution should be sought if justified. Such an approach was essential from the point of view of UK politics. Although we had not sought or received definitive legal advice, I thought it would be hard going with our Attorney General if there were no second resolution. It would be especially difficult for us without a second resolution except in a 'Kosovo-equivalent situation' (where we had a majority in the Security Council but were vetoed by one P5 Member only)."[132]

[132] Letter Straw to Manning, 24 December 2002, 'Conversation with Powell: Iraq'.

380. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed again the importance of Mr Blair making that point when he next spoke to President Bush. They also discussed that it would be hard to see how there could be a second resolution, and even harder to justify military action, if the inspectors failed to find anything.

381. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke twice on 30 December. In their first conversation, they discussed the possibility that the military would be ready to take action but there would be no casus belli.[133]

382. In their second conversation Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the likelihood that, when the UN inspectors reported to the Security Council on 27 January, they would report that they needed more time to complete their work.[134]

383. Mr Straw said it was:

> "… perfectly possible that a clear casus belli could have been presented by 27 January, in which case we would get a second resolution and military action would go ahead. But there was a sufficient possibility that we would not be in that position. We should therefore develop a clear 'plan B' for the President and the Prime Minister in which military action was postponed on the basis that inspections plus the threat of force was containing Saddam."

384. Mr Straw said he would discuss that further with Sir David Manning and Mr Ricketts.

Resolution 1452

On 30 December, the Security Council adopted resolution 1452, adjusting the Goods Review List approved in resolution 1409 (2002) and deciding to conduct a thorough review of the List and the procedures for its implementation.[135]

Russia and Syria abstained in the vote:

- The Russian representative stated that the text was too restrictive.
- The Syrian representative stated that Iraq's co-operation with the weapons inspectors and constructive approach on resolution 1441 (2002) should lead to the lifting of sanctions, not the addition of further restrictions.[136]

Advice for Mr Blair in early January 2003

385. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair on 3 January 2003 that there was an urgent need to lower expectations that military action against Iraq was inevitable.

386. The UK should emphasise that the preferred strategy was peaceful disarmament and that decisions would not be taken at the Security Council on 27 January.

387. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell's view was that it would be rash to bank on an assumption that the inspectors' reports to the Security Council on 27 January would provide grounds to trigger a further meeting of the Security Council and a resolution authorising the use of force.

388. There was a need for private discussions with the US on the strategy in the event that the inspections failed to produce an "early and large smoking gun".

389. Mr Straw's view was that a peaceful solution was, on balance, more likely than conflict.

390. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 3 January 2003 about the need urgently to lower public expectations, in the UK and abroad, that:

> "… the die will be cast at the Security Council meeting on 27 January. If we are not careful, the necessary military build up will allow the media to set us up for a fall … when and if the out come … is far from an authorisation for war. Your speech to the Diplomatic Service Conference on Tuesday [7 January] is therefore very important in setting the scene for the next three weeks."[137]

391. Mr Straw wrote:

> "… a lot of effort is being made by the … agencies to provide Blix and ElBaradei [with leads drawing on intelligence reports] … to enable them to upgrade their inspections over the next three weeks. It is possible that this will produce a big smoking gun, sufficient for Blix and ElBaradei to point in their 27 January report to a breach of obligation by Iraq sufficient to trigger OPs 11 and 12 of [resolution] 1441, a further meeting of the Security Council, and a resolution authorising the use of force … But, in my view (shared by Powell) it would be rash to bank on this. So far, reality has not matched the expectation generated by the intelligence …
> "Scenarios just as likely as a clear material breach by 27 January are:
> (i) an indication from Blix/El-Baradei that they have been broadly satisfied with the level of co-operation by Iraq, and have so far found nothing of any significance but will continue looking;

(ii) concerns by them of some lack of co-operation, and in respect of some of their finds, but in neither case adding up to a casus belli to satisfy a majority on the Security Council."

392. Mr Straw suggested the UK's messages should be:

- to emphasise that our preferred strategy continues to be … disarmament by peaceful means, through the UN system;
- the 27 January meeting is not and never has been a decision deadline …
- whatever the inspectors say to the 27 January meeting, decisions, particularly on military action, would not be taken then."

393. Mr Straw warned Mr Blair that the UK would be "faced with the argument that the finds prove that inspection is working: we will be told to let them continue and destroy what they find rather than going to war".

394. Mr Straw suggested that the UK needed "to discuss very privately with the Americans over the next few weeks our strategy if inspections produce no early and large smoking gun". The purpose would be to explore whether the US could or would maintain the position of continuing inspections and a military build-up at a high state of readiness "for weeks or even months".

395. Mr Straw stated that there were signs that President Bush recognised that going to war "without a publicly convincing trigger, and without a second UNSCR, could well be politically worse for him … as well as acutely difficult for us". Secretary Powell had told Mr Straw that "if there was an insufficient case for a second resolution, there would equally be an insufficient case for the US to go unilateral".

396. Mr Straw offered to discuss the issues with Mr Blair.

397. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Straw had:

"… called me a couple of times over the holiday and emphasised the importance of TB [Mr Blair] not positioning himself so that no war looked like failure."[138]

398. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that in "very early January [2003] he had bumped in to two journalists" who had asked about the odds of avoiding war, and that he had replied "60/40".[139] That reply then "found its way into the newspapers". Mr Straw stated that he had formed that "provisional judgement" from his own reading of the Iraqi regime's behaviour:

"… by its own terms it acted with some rationality. I could not believe that, faced with the near certainty of military action if it failed to comply with 1441, the regime could fail to appreciate that its very survival depended on full compliance, and that this would be relatively straightforward for them to prove – unless they had something terrifying to hide. In the event, however, my optimism proved unfounded."

399. Asked to explain the basis for his optimism, Mr Straw responded in his statement for the Inquiry in January 2011 that:

"… a key foundation … was that the United States had committed itself to dealing with Saddam by working through the United Nations …

"This was coupled to emerging evidence that, while by no means sufficiently, the inspectors were beginning to make some progress …

"Additionally, there were indications from the United States that it was moving closer to committing itself to going for a second resolution. My optimism at the time was therefore also in part based on the hope of a unified Security Council position, in the form of a second resolution. I believed at the time, and I still believe today, that confronting Saddam Hussein with this clear united position from the international community … would have presented us with the best way to deal with Iraq peacefully."[140]

400. Mr Straw confirmed that he was aware that Mr Blair was more sceptical than he was, but in early 2003 his instinct was more optimistic that there would be compliance.[141]

401. Mr Straw wrote in his memoir that he "wanted to pull back on the idea of a 'rush to war' and in particular avoid Hans Blix's next report, due on 27 January, being the decisive moment". At the beginning of 2003, he was "optimistic about a peaceful resolution" and, when he had been asked about "the odds of avoiding war" by journalists from The Times and the Sun on 3 January, he had replied "Sixty/forty".[142]

402. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that the US was close to giving up hope on the UN route and that President Bush was in danger of being driven by the tempo of his own military build-up.

403. The UK should continue to seek to persuade the US that more time was needed to build the case against Saddam Hussein and improve the odds for a second resolution.

404. Sir David Manning provided a note for Mr Blair's return to office on 4 January, which stated that there had been "no major developments while you have been away. But we need to focus hard on inspections, and military planning in the next few days."[143]

405. On inspections, Sir David advised:

> "My sense is that the Americans are close to giving up hope that UNMOVIC can deliver results. We should urge them to stick with it. UNMOVIC only reached full strength at Christmas … The inspectors needed targeted support; and time to build up operating skills. Even so, it's true that the chances of them finding a smoking gun are relatively small which is why we need a defector if we can get one. But this too, needs time.
> "The Americans are in a hurry; perhaps too much of one. This colours their approach to UNMOVIC and makes them impatient … Too much looks like hurried improvisation, half thought out strategy, with fingers crossed that Saddam will collapse in short order …"

406. Sir David concluded that there was a danger of the US being driven by the tempo of the military build-up and understandable preference to fight in the spring not the summer. In his view, "more time" was needed "to build the case against Saddam and improve the odds for a second resolution".

407. In a manuscript note on Mr Straw's letter of 3 January, Sir David Manning told Mr Blair that Washington was "aware of the pitfalls and thinking in terms of a second resolution".[144]

408. Sir David Manning discussed potential developments before Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 27 January with Dr Rice on 3 January. "Emphasising that he was speaking personally", he told Dr Rice that he was:

> "… convinced that we needed a second resolution; and that we would only get one if we could produce convincing evidence that Saddam was in breach. Supposition would not be enough. Apart from the problem of the Security Council, we would not be able to get endorsement from the House of Commons for military action …"[145]

409. Sir David suggested the pursuit of a three-part policy:

- compiling a register of intelligence reports that pointed to specific locations where Saddam Hussein might be hiding WMD, or documents relevant to the WMD programme, and trying "to persuade Dr Blix to mount co-ordinated surprise inspections [...] It was much too early to assume that the inspection route would yield nothing";
- urging Dr Blix to state publicly that there were numerous gaps and unanswered questions in the declaration: "By demanding that Saddam produce the missing pieces we would be putting the pressure back on him in a way which his apologists would find difficult to counter"; and

- staying closely engaged with the Arab world and exploring the recent suggestion that Saddam Hussein should be given an ultimatum to leave Iraq.

410. Returning to the issue of a second resolution, Sir David wrote that he had repeated that it would be needed:

> "… if we were to take military action. This was not because our determination to deal with the Iraqi problem had diminished in any way. Rather it was about the political realities in the UK."

411. Sir David Manning recorded that the UK must now work closely with the Americans over inspections and approaches to Dr Blix. He knew that the FCO and SIS were working on that and he had asked for advice by 8 January, "on the best way forward", which he could show to Mr Blair.

412. Sir David and Dr Rice had also discussed the possibility of a meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair.

413. Sir David recommended that Mr Blair should read the record of the conversation in full and that it had been "helpful on a second resolution".[146] Dr Rice had been very keen that President Bush and Mr Blair should meet at the end of January.

414. Describing this conversation, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that Dr Rice had told Sir David Manning that:

> "… she had been giving considerable thought to this whole issue over the Christmas holidays and had decided that a second resolution was necessary for American interests, that the American public were not necessarily fully on board for an attack on Iraq and the use of the American military and this was something that she felt the President would need to consider very carefully."[147]

415. After the conversation with President Bush on 16 December and the meeting of the Security Council on 19 December, Mr Blair also reviewed the position on Iraq in the light of likely US actions.

416. By the time Mr Blair returned to the office on 4 January 2003 he had concluded that the "likelihood was war" and, if conflict could not be avoided, the right thing to do was fully to support the US.

417. Mr Blair focused on the need to establish evidence of an Iraqi breach, persuade opinion of the case for action, and finalise the strategy with President Bush at the end of January.

[147] Public hearing, 27 November 2009, pages 66-67.

418. In a meeting overseas in early January, SIS1 told Mr Blair that the body of available evidence was "highly damning" but "none of the reports could yet be termed a silver bullet".[148] Mr Blair had been "surprised and pleased" that so much had been accumulated, but he needed some more evidence that Saddam Hussein was in breach (of resolution 1441), which he (Mr Blair) could use as the basis for personal assurances to Cabinet, the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP), and to key allies such as President Chirac and President Bush and regional leaders. As a result, SIS1 recorded that Mr Blair had asked for a "stocktake", including an assessment of the likelihood that the UNMOVIC process would produce that kind of evidence.

419. On 4 January, Mr Blair sent a long note to officials in No.10.[149]

420. On Iraq, Mr Blair stated:

> "We start from behind. People suspect US motives; don't accept Saddam is a threat; worry it will make us a target. Yet the truth is removing Saddam is right; he is a threat; and WMD has to be countered. So there is a big job of persuasion. We need the following in place:
>
> (i) most obviously, the evidence of breach of the UN resolution leading hopefully to a new resolution. Time is short. We need either evidence of actual WMD; or documentation concealed; or an eye witness account of the programme. We are making efforts on all three. But one or more needs to be in place. [...] our biggest hindrance, is the intimidation Saddam is exercising. Those who might co-operate are being told very clearly their families will die. So even though we all know the declaration … is a lie, proving the lie will be hard. I need an early meeting on this with C.
> (ii) We need to set out the WMD case generally; publish evidence of it; and have some high profile interdiction of WMD material. People just totally underestimate the WMD threat.
>
> (iii) We need to link WMD and terrorism. The truth is the two coming together, is only a matter of time. But people need to understand that if we don't act, the world will be more unsafe.
> (iv) We need to prepare a very clear statement of guarantees for the Iraqi people, setting out territorial integrity etc; and I assume without Saddam we could lift sanctions.
> (v) We need to work out the post-Saddam scenario. Are we going to identify him, and his close associates only, as fit for removal, in the hope of having the regime crumble; or are we going to be more forward. By instinct, I favour making it clear: removing Saddam is the immediate task; the new government has to be stable; and we can move forward in time … There must be as little as possible vested interest in resistance.

(vi) We need to be sure the military plan is viable. I need a meeting on this and our military's assurance that the plan can work. This is no small undertaking.

(vii) We must strive to move the MEPP forward …

(viii) We have got to show sensitivity to any humanitarian fall-out from war. Britain should take the lead on this, working with the UN."

421. Mr Blair believed it would be "sensible to go to Washington late January in order to finalise the strategy".

422. There is no evidence that Mr Blair had seen Mr Straw's minute of 3 January or Sir David Manning's minute of the same day before he wrote his note of 4 January.

423. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that, in December 2002 and during a short winter break in January 2003, he had "tried to work out what was the right thing to do". He was:

> "… past expediency, past political calculation, past personal introspection. I knew this could be the end politically. I just wanted to know: what is the right thing?
>
> "I could see by now … that barring something unanticipated, the likelihood was war. We could opt out … I was sure … and stay out of the conflict, coming in only for the aftermath. We had many allies by then. Thirteen out of 25 EU countries were onside … But many were taking the route of avoiding the initial fighting."[150]

424. At Chequers over Christmas 2002, he had asked himself:

> "What did I truly believe? That Saddam was about to attack Britain or the US? No. That he was a bigger WMD threat than Iran or North Korea or Libya? Not really, though he was the only leader to have used them. That left alone now, with these inspections ending the same way as the last, he would threaten the stability of the region? Very possibly. That he would leach WMD material or provide help to terrorists? Yes … Was it better for his people to be rid of him? For sure. Could it be done without a long and bloody war? You can never be sure of that. Did I want more time? Yes, but to allow me to probe every other way of doing it, rather than because I believed the nature of his regime would ever change. Would a new Iraq help build a new Middle East? I thought that was possible.
> "Did I think that if we drew back now, we would have to deal with him later? … yes, there was no other way that this man with his past was going to be anything other than a source of instability. At some point, especially if strengthened now, he would be back to his old tricks.

> "So, in or out? In I concluded. And, if in, better in fully and not partly. I still thought it possible to avoid war. I still thought it possible that other alternatives, diplomatic or through a coup, of some sort (there was much private Arab talk about such a thing), could be available to avoid conflict. I was determined at the least, to try to persuade the Americans to get more time. But I had said I would be with them, and if conflict could not be avoided, I would be in with the whole and not half a heart."

Public statements, 7 and 8 January 2003

PUBLICATION OF THE UK'S POLICY OBJECTIVES

425. The UK's policy objectives in relation to Iraq were published by Mr Straw on 7 January.

426. Mr Blair's Note of 4 January was discussed at Mr Blair's Monday morning meeting with No.10 staff on 6 January.[151]

427. Subsequent discussions and decisions on the military plan, and planning for humanitarian assistance and a post-conflict Iraq, are addressed in Section 6.

428. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "TB was pretty sure there would be a war, or that in any event Saddam would go, and war remained the likeliest if not the only way of that coming about."

429. Mr Campbell added:

> "On Iraq, pretty much everyone was emphasising how little support there was, how little understanding there was of a real threat, but he [Mr Blair] was in pretty defiant mood on that too, said the threat was real and people would come round."

430. Mr Campbell wrote that he had talked to Mr Blair and then agreed in a conference call that the policy objectives should be published. In Mr Campbell's view: "These strategy papers were as much about internal understanding as publicity."

431. Mr Bowen informed the FCO on 6 January that Mr Blair had decided to publish the policy objectives for Iraq.[152]

432. The objectives were published in a Written Ministerial Statement by Mr Straw on 7 January.[153]

433. Mr Straw stated that he had "made clear to the House on a number of occasions" that the policy on Iraq was "to ensure that Iraq" complied "with its obligations under relevant … Security Council resolutions … including by giving up its weapons of mass destruction". He "thought, however, that the House would now appreciate a more detailed statement of the Government's objectives".

434. The "prime objective" was:

> "… to rid Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and their associated programmes and means of delivery, including prohibited ballistic missiles … as set out in UNSCRs. This would reduce Iraq's ability to threaten its neighbours and the region, and prevent Iraq using WMD against its own people. UNSCRs also require Iraq to renounce terrorism, and return captured Kuwaitis and property taken from Kuwait."

435. Iraq's failure to comply with the "will of the international community" as expressed by the UN was "thereby perpetuating the threat to international peace and security".

436. Mr Straw also stated that a "further objective" was "to maintain the authority of the United Nations by demonstrating the Security Council's effective response to the challenge posed by Iraq's non-compliance"; and that "Success in achieving our prime objective should help deter the proliferation of WMD and BM [ballistic missiles] more generally."

437. Mr Straw identified that the six "immediate priorities" were to:

- support UNMOVIC/IAEA inspectors in Iraq;
- enable UNMOVIC/IAEA to ensure long-term Iraqi compliance;
- maintain international solidarity behind the UN Security Council.
- preserve regional stability;
- continue to make military plans in case military action was needed; and
- continue to support humanitarian efforts to relieve suffering in Iraq.

438. The objectives were based closely on those approved by Mr Blair in October 2002, as was the definition of the post-conflict end state:

> "We would like Iraq to become a stable, united and law abiding state, within its present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security, abiding by all its international obligations and providing effective and representative government to its own people."

439. A reference to achieving the end state "as rapidly as possible" was omitted. Other changes included the addition of a statement that the objectives were "consistent with wider government policy", including:

- "Efforts to resolve other causes of regional stability, including the MEPP";
- "Wider political engagement with Arab countries and the Islamic world";

- "Efforts to counter the proliferation of WMD"; and
- "The elimination of terrorism as a force in international affairs".

440. Mr Straw also stated:

> "To achieve our objectives we will act in conformity with international law, including the United Nations Charter and international humanitarian law."

441. Mr Straw concluded that the Government was "working intensively with our allies and partners to secure the peaceful disarmament of Iraq's WMD by means of UNMOVIC/IAEA inspections". He also warned that if the Iraqi regime did not comply, it would, as resolution 1441 made clear, "face serious consequences".

MR HOON'S STATEMENT, 7 JANUARY 2003

442. On 7 January, Mr Hoon announced a decision to deploy additional maritime forces, including an amphibious capability, and an order to enable the call-out of Reservists.

443. This was presented as a necessary part of a policy of maintaining the pressure on Saddam Hussein to persuade him to disarm. Mr Hoon stated that no decision had been taken to commit UK forces to military action; and no "justification" for military action had been identified.

444. In an oral statement on Iraq on 7 January, Mr Hoon commended the policy objectives to the House of Commons.[154]

445. Mr Hoon also stated that the Government was "restating" its "full and active support" for the UN inspections and was "looking to them to investigate urgently the gaps in Iraq's declaration" of its WMD programmes, which failed "to give a satisfactory account of Iraq's activities".

446. Mr Hoon added that, while the Government wanted Iraq "to disarm voluntarily", it was "evident" that this would not be achieved unless Saddam Hussein was presented with "a clear and credible threat of force".

447. Mr Hoon concluded:

> "None of that means that the use of force is inevitable … no decision has been taken to commit those forces to action … But … as long as Saddam's compliance with … resolution 1441 is in doubt … the threat of force must remain and it must be a real one."

448. The details of military deployments in the announcement are addressed in Section 6.1.

[154] House of Commons, Official Report, 7 January 2003, columns 23-39.

449. Mr Hoon did not respond to an observation from Mr Bernard Jenkin (Conservative) that "It now seems unlikely that the UN inspectors will find any weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Saddam Hussein has had too much time to conceal them and to destroy the evidence."

450. Asked by Mr James Paice (Conservative) about the "huge task to convince the British people that they are doing the right thing", Mr Hoon replied that it was:

> "… not possible to secure overwhelming public support for military action before the explanation for that military action has been given and, therefore, before the justification for that military action has been identified. We have not yet reached that point in the process, and unless and until we do I accept that we cannot explain the justification for military action."

451. Other points made by Mr Hoon in response to questions included:

- The Iraqi declaration was "seriously short on detail and lacks in particular any significant reference" to the conclusions reached by UNSCOM in 1999.
- If Saddam Hussein left Iraq, there "would be a different regime as far as the international community was concerned". The removal of weapons of mass destruction from the control of the regime would be a "prerequisite".
- Military action would be necessary "because every other avenue has been exhausted" and the opportunities offered by resolution 1441 had been "spurned by the Government in Iraq".
- There was no "inevitability about conflict".
- The position of the US was "no different" to that of the UK, "it agreed to a United Nations process and it wants that process to be properly implemented and enforced".

MR BLAIR'S SPEECH TO THE FOREIGN OFFICE CONFERENCE, 7 JANUARY 2003

452. As recommended by Mr Straw and Mr Campbell, Mr Blair used his speech to senior diplomats and others on 7 January to set out the importance for the UK of remaining "the closest" ally of the US.

453. Within that context, Mr Blair stated that if Iraq defied the UN, the US should not be "forced to take on this issue alone".

454. In his speech to the Foreign Office Conference on 7 January about Britain's place in the world, Mr Blair stated that "people all over the world" wanted the "universal values" of freedom, human rights, the rule of law and democracy, alongside "justice, the opportunity for all".[155] The world had an "overriding common interest to make progress with order"; and that the threat was "change through disorder, because then the consequences of change cannot be managed".

---

[155] The National Archives, 7 January 2003, PM Speech to Foreign Office Conference in London.

455. Mr Blair set out seven principles to guide the UK. The first was that the UK:

> "… should remain the closest ally of the US, and as allies to influence them to continue broadening their agenda. We are an ally of the US not because they are powerful, but because we share their values … Anti-Americanism … is a foolish indulgence. For all their faults and all nations have them, the US are a force for good …
> "… it is massively in our self-interest to remain close allies …
>
> "But we should use this alliance to good effect … People listen to the US … they want the US to listen back.
>
> "So for the international community, the MEPP is … important … the UN is important.
>
> "The US choice to go through the UN over Iraq was a vital step, in itself and as a symbol of the desire to work with others …
> "The price of British influence is not … to do what the US asks. I would never commit British troops to a war I thought was wrong or unnecessary. Where we disagree … we disagree.
>
> "But the price of influence is that we do not leave the US to face tricky issues alone. By tricky, I mean the ones which people wish weren't there, don't want to deal with, and … know the US should confront … So if the US act alone, they are unilateralist … International terrorism is one such issue … WMD is another … [A]t my first meeting with President Bush I said this was the key issue facing the international community. I believe this even more today … But no one can doubt the salience of WMD … and the importance of countering it …
>
> "So when as with Iraq, the international community through the UN makes a demand on a regime to disarm itself of WMD and that regime refuses, that regime threatens us. It may be uncomfortable … unless the world takes a stand on this issue of WMD and sends out a clear signal, we will rue the consequences of our weakness.
>
> "America should not be forced to take on this issue alone. We should be part of it. Of course it should go through the UN – that was our wish and what the US did. But if the will of the UN is breached then the will should be enforced.
> "Jack Straw has today set out for Parliament … our policy objectives on Iraq.
> "So when the US confront these issues, we should be with them, and we should, in return, expect these issues to be confronted with the international community, proportionately, sensibly and in a way that delivers a better prospect of long-term peace, security and justice."

456. Mr Blair's seventh principle identified the need to "reach out to the Muslim world". Mr Blair stated: "The reason there is opposition over our stance on Iraq has less to do with any love of Saddam, but over a sense of double standards. The MEPP remains essential …"

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS, 8 JANUARY 2003

457. In PMQs on 8 January Mr Blair reiterated his position that if Saddam Hussein did not disarm voluntarily he would be disarmed by force, but he declined to speculate about the circumstances when that would be necessary.

458. Iraq and reports of differences between Mr Straw and Mr Hoon were raised by several Members of Parliament during Prime Minister's Questions on 8 January.[156]

459. Mr Blair consistently reiterated his position that Iraq must comply with the Security Council resolutions and "must be disarmed of all weapons of mass destruction". If Iraq did not do so willingly, it would "have to be done by force".

460. Mr Blair declined to respond to questions from Mr Iain Duncan Smith about whether he agreed with Mr Straw's view that the prospects of military action were "60:40 against".

461. Mr Duncan Smith also commented that "one cannot half prepare for war. Not for the first time, the Government are sending different messages to different audiences …"

462. Referring to Mr Hoon's statement the previous day, Mr Blair replied:

> "We have made every preparation that we should make … It is completely wrong to say that British troops are half prepared for any action. That is nonsense."

463. In response to questions from Mr Charles Kennedy about whether Britain would be involved if the inspectors failed to produce concrete evidence of weapons of mass destruction but the US "nonetheless" decided to go ahead with military action, Mr Blair replied that he was "not going to speculate on the circumstances that might arise". The weapons inspectors were "in Iraq to discover whether there has been a breach of the UN resolution" and they should be "allowed to do their work".

464. Mr Blair also told:

- Mrs Anne Campbell (Labour) that she was "right to say that people have anxieties about the possibility of conflict in Iraq" and that British troops "should never" be put into action "unless it is necessary to do so", but he "believed passionately that the issue of weapons of mass destruction and the related issue of international terrorism" were the "key security threats" facing the UK and that it was "only a matter of time before those issues come together"; and

---

[156] House of Commons, Official Report, 8 January 2003, columns 162-166.

- Mrs Patsy Calton (Liberal Democrat) that it was his "duty to explain" why he thought it was "necessary in certain circumstances to commit British troops to war". If Saddam Hussein was "in breach of the United Nations' will and we refused to act as an international community" it would "send a signal to Saddam that we would do nothing to prevent him from building up weapons of mass destruction" and "a signal that we were not serious about the issue of weapons of mass destruction". He understood why people felt that it was "a very distant threat", but what was dangerous was to do nothing: we would "rue the consequences of that weakness later".

465. Mr Blair had an internal meeting on Iraq with No.10 officials after PMQs on 8 January.[157] Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had said that, if Dr Blix found nothing and the UN gave no specific sanction, it was going to be very hard to do. Mr Blair felt that we had to be out there fairly soon making the case, that it was only a matter of time before Al Qaida get their hands on WMD unless we show how serious we are at dealing with the WMD issue. He was clear that it was the right thing to do, but also accepted that there was not much support.

Cabinet, 9 January 2003

466. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 9 January that there would be an opportunity for an "in-depth" discussion on Iraq the following week.

467. Mr Straw was overseas on 9 January.[158]

468. Mr Blair told the Cabinet on 9 January that the inspection process was fully under way and:

> "The report to the UN Security Council on 27 January was in no sense a deadline, rather a first report of [the inspectors'] findings. Meanwhile, the build up of military forces was necessary to sustain the pressure on Iraq."[159]

469. Points made during the discussion included:

- the inspections process had its own integrity and should not be compromised;
- inspections were being conducted against the background of a concerted Iraqi plan to disperse and conceal WMD, including threats to execute Iraqi experts involved with such programmes if they divulged information to the UN inspectors;
- the onset of summer in Iraq did not constitute an absolute deadline by which military action would have to be taken; and

- the MEPP had to be taken forward and efforts were continuing to hold a conference with the Palestinians on reform in London the following week.

470. Mr Hoon reported his visit to Turkey and the sensitivities about actions involving Iraq.

471. Commenting on the preparations for the deployment of military forces to the Gulf, Mr Hoon told his colleagues that no decisions had been taken to launch military action. Nor had the US finalised its military planning. Some changes to forces assigned to Operation FRESCO, to provide an emergency fire fighting capability during the firefighters' strike, would be necessary to keep options open.

472. Mr Blair concluded that the future behaviour of Saddam Hussein in responding to UN pressure was "unpredictable". The UK was "right to continue with its military preparations". It should also maintain the focus on the fight with international terrorism and preventive measures at home. Media reports of a rift within the Cabinet were "nonsense". Cabinet the following week would "provide the opportunity for an in-depth discussion of Iraq".

473. In the press briefing after Cabinet, the Prime Minister's Official Spokesman said that Mr Blair had "underlined his view that the weapons inspectors in Iraq had to be given the time and space to do their job properly", and that "while 27 January was an important staging point in the process, it should not be regarded in any way as a deadline".[160]

474. The Spokesman also said dismissed press reports that Mr Blair had authorised an attack on one Secretary of State by another.

475. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that there had been a discussion about comments by Cabinet Ministers and the need to avoid giving personal opinions.[161] Ms Short had accused Mr Hoon and the MOD of briefing against Mr Straw. She had also asked for a discussion of the military options because she did not believe that UK forces were needed.

476. In his memoir, Mr Robin Cook, Leader of the House of Commons, June 2001 to March 2003, wrote that three newspapers that morning had carried a story demanding Mr Straw's resignation, and a claim that Mr Blair had authorised attacks by Mr Hoon.[162] Mr Cook did not believe the story. He wrote that in Cabinet Ms Short had deplored the attacks and he had said that Mr Straw was "doing a great job in keeping the Iraq crisis in the UN track".

477. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that "the presentation to … Cabinet was still – nothing was inevitable. We are pressing the UN option. No decisions on military action, whereas you can see that, at another level, the decisions on military action were hardening up quite considerably."[163]

Security Council, 9 January 2003

478. In response to the briefing to the Security Council by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 9 January, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that members of the Security Council wanted time for the inspectors to reach a view.

479. As agreed on 19 December, Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei gave an informal update of their assessment of the Iraqi declaration and the progress of inspection activities to the members of the Security Council on 9 January.[164] Dr Blix understood that the meeting was intended to allow members of the Council to comment on Iraq's declaration.

480. Dr Blix stated that, if UNMOVIC had found a "smoking gun" or if there had been any impediment to their inspections, it would have been reported to the Council. Iraqi officials had "sought to construe the prompt access given to inspection teams and the fact that no weapons of mass destruction or other proscribed items have been found as confirmation" that there were none in Iraq; but the matter was "not … that simple". Prompt access was "an indispensible element of transparency" as part of a process of peaceful disarmament, but it was:

> "… by no means sufficient to give confidence that nothing is hidden in a large country with an earlier record of avoiding disclosures. Iraq is very familiar with the fact that only declarations supported by evidence, will give confidence about the elimination of weapons. In this respect we have not so far made progress."

481. Commenting on the "issues on which doubts exist as to whether all proscribed items or activities had been eliminated", identified by UNSCOM and the Amorim report in 1999 (see Section 1.1), Dr Blix added that UNMOVIC was "not bound by every conclusion in these reports". But they did give Iraq a "clear idea of questions, which need to be answered and of doubts, which must be dispelled by very active efforts". His "overall impression" remained that Iraq's declaration was "rich in volume but poor in new information" and "practically devoid of new evidence on such issues".

482. Dr Blix said that "to create confidence that it has no more weapons of mass destruction or proscribed activities relating to such weapons, Iraq must present credible evidence". That could be "of the most varied kind", including "interviews by knowledgeable persons who are not subjected to intimidation". He had "not asserted … that proscribed items or activities" existed; but if they did "Iraq should present them in our presence". There was "still time" for that. There was "no way the inspectors" could "close a file by simply invoking the precept that Iraq cannot prove the negative". In "such cases", the inspectors "must conclude, as they have done in the past, that the absence of the particular item is not assured".

483. Dr Blix listed a series of inconsistencies between the declaration and earlier Iraqi declarations which had been described as full, final and complete, in addition to the issues he had highlighted on 19 December, including in relation to special munitions, imports of missile engines and solid missile fuel and VX. He also stated that UNMOVIC did not feel that Iraq had "made a serious effort" to provide lists of personnel engaged in proscribed programmes.

484. Dr ElBaradei reported that good progress had been made in re-establishing knowledge of Iraq's capabilities and that "no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear-related activities" had been detected and the IAEA's verification activities were "an important deterrent to the resumption of such activities".[165]

485. Further work would be necessary before the IAEA could draw definitive conclusions, including in relation to reports of Iraqi attempts to import uranium after 1991, the relocation and consumption of dual-use materials, and the attempted purchase of prohibited aluminium tubes, which appeared to be "consistent with the reverse engineering of rockets" and "not directly suitable" for the manufacture of centrifuges. Dr ElBaradei emphasised the importance of active co-operation from Iraq.

486. A press statement issued by the President of the Security Council stated that the members had "listened with the utmost attention and interest"; and that they had "reiterated their full support for the work and action of Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei and to the continuation of inspection activities".[166]

487. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the discussion had been "relatively low key". Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had made "clear that the Iraqi declaration is inadequate and that Iraq needs to co-operate more pro-actively".[167] There had been more than 250 inspections at more than 200 sites. Sir Jeremy had noted that Iraqi co-operation in giving access was "satisfactory", but "more passive than active". Iraq had to be pro-active to prove it had no WMD. He had "hoped the pace could accelerate".

488. Sir Jeremy also reported that Ambassador John Negroponte, US Permanent Representative to the UN, had again described the Iraqi declaration as a material breach and stated that a continued failure to co-operate actively would constitute a further one.

489. In a subsequent conversation with representatives of EU Missions in New York, Sir Jeremy had stated that it was "clear that Council members wanted a steady, intensifying process which would give the inspectors time to provide either positive or negative proofs"; and that "if the inspections proceeded normally, with increasing intensity, there would be no need to rush to an early military judgement (although the US response … was unpredictable)". The timetable set out in resolution 1284 (1999) was "still obligatory"; and that the UK believed Iraq was concealing evidence.[168]

Growing pressure to find evidence of Saddam Hussein's non-compliance

490. With indications of concerns in Washington about becoming trapped in the UN and tensions between the UN timetable and the military build-up, the UK focus on the need to find convincing evidence that Saddam Hussein was not complying with the obligations set out in resolution 1441 and preceding resolutions intensified.

491. Mr Blair had a meeting with Sir Richard Dearlove on the afternoon of 9 January.[169] There is no No.10 record of the meeting.

492. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary recorded Sir Richard's view that it had been a good meeting at which Mr Blair had emphasised the importance of being able to demonstrate that the Iraqis were in material breach of resolution 1441.

493. In response to a question from Mr Blair about the likelihood of being able to find a "silver bullet" that would demonstrate a material breach, Sir Richard was reported to have said that "he felt the odds were 50/50". That was "higher than the US estimates but he simply could not guarantee a successful outcome".

494. Sir Richard had also reported that Mr Blair's parting words were: "Richard, my fate is in your hands."

495. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

- C told Mr Blair that Dr Blix "knew he was being 'cat and moused' but he was not on a mission. He was sure that Saddam was lying but he had to establish that for himself. C felt that we had a better chance of finding the breaches than the US."
- Mr Blair had said, "half in jest", "My future is in your hands."
- "The nightmare scenario, or one of them, was a discovery that was sufficient for the US but not for us."

- "C said the other risk was that we found the evidence of the breach before the US was ready to go to war … if the inspectors had another month with genuine access, the picture would be pretty clear. We were now pushing the line that they needed time and space to do the job."[170]

496. Asked about the comment that Mr Blair's future was in his hands, Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that he thought Mr Blair "was beginning to understand that he was in a tough position vis-a-vis the inspection issue".[171]

497. In response to a further question, Sir Richard stated:

> "No, I think when the Prime Minister says something like that – the one thing if you are head of SIS is you have to be quite robust, and not be sort of put off by such comments.
>
> "I think the problem for the Prime Minister at that point in time is it's much more important to him domestically that UNMOVIC has a success than it is to the US Administration."

498. A report of a discussion between Adm Boyce and General Richard Myers, Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, stated that the US could stay poised for military operations for 3-4 months.[172]

499. Sir David Manning wrote to Mr Powell that this was a "much better timeline as far as inspections are concerned. Whether Bush will buy it is another matter."[173]

500. When Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke on 11 January, they discussed reporting in both the UK and US, including a Washington Post article criticising Secretary Powell for trapping the US Government in the UN route and Mr Blair's comments that 27 January was not a deadline which would be widely noted in Washington.[174] There was a need to synchronise the military planning and politics. It was improbable that the inspectors' reports to the Security Council on 27 January would provide sufficient evidence for a second resolution, and the negotiation of such a resolution would take weeks.

501. Mr Blair sent a note to No.10 officials on 12 January.[175]

502. On Iraq, he wrote:

> "We need to go back to the basic principle: the UN has made a decision; that decision must be upheld. The inspectors inspect; if they find a breach, then the UN should pass a new resolution. If it does, how can anyone dispute the case for war? If the UN doesn't, despite a breach, then we are in the same positions as we were at the time of Kosovo. But the integrity of the UN process has to be upheld.
>
> "We have two immediate weaknesses in our case:
>
> - people think we will go to war even if no breach is found. That is not correct.
> - people don't really believe WMD or Saddam are real threats."

503. Mr Ricketts was in Washington on 13 January.[176] He reported to Mr Straw's Private Secretary that his overriding impression was that:

> "… there is still a good deal of uncertainty and confusion, but that all accept we are entering a critical four weeks, in which the tensions between the political/UN track and the military build-up will come to a head … the President is getting impatient and wants a basis for moving against Iraq sooner rather than later.
> "There are conflicting pressures in all directions … the press are full of the drum-beat of military build-up. With the sense that war is close, people want to rally round the President. On the other hand there is still a lot of uneasiness … White House letters are running nine to one against the war.
>
> "… there will be big pressure on President Bush to say something powerful in the State of the Union message on 28 January. I was assured … this would not be a declaration of war. But equally no-one thinks that he will want the present uncertainty to drag on … there is no work in hand on how to sustain the present strategy over a period of months.
> "Blix will be the fulcrum in the coming weeks … All I talked to were determined not to allow Saddam to put us back in the position where the onus was on the inspectors to find something …"

504. Mr Ricketts reported that the US was considering a presentation setting out "the evidence of Saddam's bad faith" soon after 27 January to "challenge the Security Council to go for a second resolution". Views amongst US officials on the wisdom of that were mixed.

505. Mr Ricketts' minute was copied to Sir David Manning and others.

506. In the context of a "flurry of comment … in the UK media" and Mr Blair's press conference later that day, Sir David told Dr Rice on 13 January that Mr Blair would point out that Saddam Hussein was "wasting the UN opportunity with every day that he failed to comply".[177]

507. Discussing the difficulty of finding a smoking gun, Sir David told Dr Rice:

> "… we should not give up on looking for hard evidence. The discovery of the rocket motors[178] might not be a breach of 1441, but it was important evidence that Saddam was determined to thwart international controls. It told us much about his approach and vindicated our claims that he was a liar."

508. Sir David reported that he had:

> "… rehearsed again our need for a second resolution before moving to military action. There would be support here for action against Iraq if sanctioned by the UN. But it would be very hard, and probably impossible, for us without another resolution. The domestic politics were too difficult."

509. Sir David asked Dr Rice if the US would be content to let the inspections run until the end of February; he "understood the military pressures" but it "would be important to UK and wider European opinion to see the strongest possible case". The UK "would want … time to build this". Sir David added that "the stronger the case, the easier the President would find it to secure international support and a second resolution".

510. Sir David concluded that "at present it seems unlikely that there will be enough evidence" by 27 January, "to persuade the Security Council to start work on the second resolution".

MR BLAIR'S PRESS CONFERENCE, 13 JANUARY 2003

511. In public, Mr Blair emphasised that the inspectors had only just started work and there was no point in imposing an "arbitrary timescale".

512. Mr Blair's press conference on 13 January was dominated by questions on Iraq.[179]

513. In his opening remarks, Mr Blair stated that, while the threat seemed to some people to be remote, he passionately believed Iraq must be disarmed of its weapons of mass destruction; the authority of the United Nations must be upheld; and rogue states and terrorist organisations shown that "when we say we intend to deal with the issue of weapons of mass destruction, we mean it". The UN had "given Saddam [Hussein] a chance"; he should take the peaceful route and disarm.

514. In response to questions, Mr Blair stated:

- Inspections were the right process, but the inspectors had only just started their work and reached their full complement the previous week. There was no point in putting an "arbitrary timescale" on their task. Saddam Hussein had a duty to co-operate. In Mr Blair's view, Iraq's declaration of 8 December was false and it was the inspectors' job to find out the truth and report their findings.
- If there was a breach, there would be a further discussion at the UN and the UK expected the UN to honour its undertakings and for its authority to be upheld.
- The trade in chemical, biological and nuclear weapons posed a direct threat to Britain's security. Without a stand, it was simply a matter of time before terrorism and weapons of mass destruction came together. Iraq was important because it was known that Saddam Hussein had the weapons and had used them before. It had been "chosen" by the UN and the UN "had to be a way of resolving this and sending a signal to the whole of the world that this trade will not be tolerated, that people who have these weapons in breach of UN resolutions, will be forced to disarm".
- The "discussion" on Iraq had "begun against the background of sanctions eroding, of us being unable to be sure that we were really preventing Saddam acquiring these weapons and of intelligence to the British Security Services … I don't think they would be advising me this if they weren't doing this honestly and properly. There is no doubt at all in our mind that Saddam has been trying to rebuild that arsenal of chemical, biological and potentially nuclear capability …"
- Indicting Saddam Hussein was "kept under consideration" and "reasonable arguments" had been made by Ms Ann Clwyd, Vice-Chair of the Parliamentary Labour Party and Chair of INDICT (see Box later in this Section), and others. It would be a decision for the Attorney General "but we have to weigh up a number of different considerations as to whether it is worth such a prosecution. But I don't think that should divert us from the main issue … which is … whether it is necessary to change the regime in Iraq in order to disarm them of weapons of mass destruction."
- There was "no point in speculating" about what might happen if the US wanted to take action before a smoking gun had been found; whatever happened, Saddam would be disarmed.
- The way to avoid military action would be for Saddam "to agree to make an honest declaration of what he has and have it destroyed".

LORD GOLDSMITH'S DRAFT ADVICE, 14 JANUARY 2003

515. As agreed with Mr Powell on 19 December 2002, Lord Goldsmith handed his draft advice on resolution 1441 to Mr Blair on 14 January.

516. The draft advice stated that a further decision by the Security Council would be required to revive the authorisation to use force contained in resolution 678 (1990) although that decision did not need be in the form of a further resolution.

517. Lord Goldsmith also wrote that there would be no authorisation for military action in the event of a veto by one of the P5.

518. Lord Goldsmith's draft advice[180] and No.10's response, including Mr Blair's statements that military action would not be ruled out if a further resolution in response to an Iraqi breach was vetoed, are addressed in Section 5.

Mr Annan's comments, 14 January 2003

At a press conference on 14 January, Mr Annan stated:

> "We are all aware … of Council resolution 1441 (2002) and the legislative climate surrounding the passage of that resolution. We will have to assume … that the members of the Council acted in good faith; that the issue is disarmament and that they will do whatever it takes to disarm; and that if the disarmament were to succeed and we were to agree that Iraq has been stripped of its weapons of mass destruction, then that should be the end of the story. If, on the other hand, it were to come out that Iraq continues to defy, and that disarmament has not happened … the Council will have to face up to its responsibilities and take the necessary action. But, of course, this is the understanding and the spirit of the resolution, which I hope we will all respect."[181]

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS, 15 JANUARY 2003

519. During PMQs on 15 January Mr Blair answered a number of questions on Iraq.[182]

520. Mr Alan Beith (Liberal Democrat) asked what would happen if the inspectors reported on 27 January that they needed more time to complete their work, and whether a statement made by Mr Blair's official spokesman that the inspectors would be given the time and space they needed reflected President Bush's view. Mr Blair initially referred to remarks made in his press conference on 13 January, including that he was not going to speculate on "arbitrary timetables", and to remarks made by Mr Annan on 14 January that, if Iraq continued to defy the UN and disarmament hadn't happened, the Security Council would have to "face up to its responsibilities and take the necessary action".

[182] House of Commons, Official Report, 15 January 2003, columns 673-682.

521. Pressed by Mr Beith to answer the question in the light of the very serious consequences of military action before the case for it had been made, Mr Blair replied that before the adoption of resolution 1441, many people had insisted that the US would "not bother with" the UN and "would not give the process a chance to work". "That had not been the case". Mr Blair added that "the single most dangerous thing we could do at the moment", which would in his view "increase the likelihood of conflict, would be to send out a signal of any weakness in our determination to see the mandate laid out by the UN carried through".

522. Asked by Mr Iain Duncan Smith whether the Government's position was that a second resolution was preferable or, as Ms Short had said, essential, Mr Blair replied:

> "… we want a UN resolution. I have set out continually, not least in the House on 18 December [2002], that in circumstances where there was a breach we went back to the UN and the spirit of the UN resolution was broken because an unreasonable veto was put down, we would not rule out action. That is the same position that everybody has expressed, and I think it is the right position. However … it is not merely preferable to have a second resolution. I believe that we will get one."

523. In response to further questions from Mr Duncan Smith about differences within the Cabinet, Mr Blair emphasised that the UN route had been chosen "very deliberately" because it was "important" that Saddam Hussein was "disarmed with the support of the international community". He hoped that the House would unite around the position that, if the UN resolution was breached, "action must follow, because the UN mandate has to be upheld".

524. The Government's position was that a "second UN resolution" was "preferable", but it had:

> "… also said that here are circumstances in which a UN resolution is not necessary, because it is necessary to be able to say in circumstances where an unreasonable veto is put down that we would still act."

525. Mr Mohammad Sarwar (Labour) asked whether any breach of resolution 1441 should be a matter for the weapons inspectors and the Security Council, not President Bush and the US Administration; and whether unilateral US action would be defying the United Nations. Mr Blair replied that the UN inspectors "should be allowed to do their job", but they had only been able to return to Iraq because of the "firm stand" that had been taken. It was "important" to "continue to send that signal of strength". If Saddam Hussein believed "for a single instance that the will of the international community has abated … the consequences of either conflict or prolonged conflict" would be "increased".

526. Asked by Mr Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru) how it could possibly be right to risk the lives of British service men and women "on a venture in Iraq that does not have the backing of international law, or the support of the majority of the British people", Mr Blair replied:

> "… let us wait and see what happens in the coming weeks in relation to the United Nations … [I]t is right that we are prepared to take action if necessary … because weapons of mass destruction – the proliferation of … weapons and ballistic missile technology … are a real threat to the security of the world and this country …. [W]e have to deal with North Korea, but that is not a reason for failing to deal with Iraq.
> "The truth is that this issue of weapons of mass destruction is a real threat to the world. I believe … that it is only a matter of time before it is linked with international terrorism. Does anyone believe that, if we do not take a stand … now in respect of weapons of mass destruction, some terrorist group is not in future going to get hold of that material and use it.
>
> "This is a difficult time. I understand the concerns that some people have, but sometimes the job of a Prime Minister is to say the things that others do not want them to say but we believe are necessary to say because the threat is real and if we do not deal with it the consequences of weakness will haunt future generations."

527. Other points made by Mr Blair included that, if Saddam Hussein wanted to avoid conflict, he could "comply with the UN resolution, co-operate with the inspectors, tell us where this material is, and have it destroyed as it should be. Conflict would then be avoided … The choice is now for Saddam."

Concern that the US might act at the end of January

528. Sir David Manning was assured by Dr Rice on 15 January that the US would not take any further action with the Security Council until after the planned meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush at the end of January.

529. Sir David told Dr Rice that public opinion had to be convinced that the inspections process was serious and had produced serious evidence. The UK needed timelines for decisions no earlier than March or April.

530. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice on 15 January.[183]

531. In the context of a visit to Washington by Dr Blix the previous day, Sir David and Dr Rice discussed the relationship between the timelines for inspections set out in resolutions 1284 (1999) and the requirements of resolution 1441. Sir David thought that the issue could be "finessed"; and suggested that, when they met on 17 January, Mr Blair might encourage Dr Blix to report to the Security Council "at regular intervals" about Saddam Hussein's compliance. Although that "was not stipulated in the resolution", it would be "hard for anyone to object" if Dr Blix agreed. The provisions of resolution 1284 could "run in parallel". Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed whether Dr Blix could be encouraged to call for Saddam Hussein's full co-operation to resolve the issues in his report to the Security Council.

532. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed the "immediate tasks" for Dr Blix, including:

- an audit of Iraq's declaration;
- an energetic programme of site inspections;
- a process of interviews without minders; and
- whether he should destroy proscribed items.

533. They also discussed Iraq's deceptions and concerns about whether UNMOVIC could ensure that information about future inspections did not reach Iraqi officials.

534. Sir David commented that, "as far as the battle for public opinion was concerned", the UK:

> "… needed hard evidence that Saddam had WMD if we could possibly get it, which meant allowing time for us to acquire and deploy the intelligence. There was a suspicion in the UK that we were rushing our fences. It would be very difficult to persuade people … that [the Security Council on] 27 January should do more than take note of Dr Blix's report … [I]t was too soon to try to use it as the moment when we could demonstrate that the inspection system had failed."

535. Sir David asked Dr Rice about developments in her thinking about how the US Administration would handle the meeting and immediate follow-up. Dr Rice replied that Secretary Powell would not present the US case on Iraq's deception until after the meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair on 31 January. President Bush would "not want to give the impression that he was presenting the Prime Minister with a fait accompli".

536. Sir David reported that he had welcomed that assurance, and pointed out that Mr Blair had taken a very robust line at his press conference on 13 January; but "there was nevertheless a great deal of uneasiness and opposition to Government policy … We had to take account of this …"

537. Sir David added that he had "repeated that this meant there was a premium on producing hard evidence if we could, and allowing the inspection process more time. This was also necessary if we were to get the support we needed for a second UNSCR."

538. Responding to Dr Rice's view that President Bush would want to take advantage of the current military window, Sir David had stated that he "realised this", but "additional days and weeks mattered in the battle for public opinion … the UK needed timeline[s] for decisions that were no earlier than March or April, not January or February."

539. Sir David reported that, in the context of a discussion about France's arguments for more time and that war should be avoided to prevent a conflagration in the Middle East, Dr Rice had said President Bush "was not prepared to wait for months and months". Sir David's view was that:

> "If military action proved necessary, it would be better to do it sooner rather than later in terms of managing our relations with the Arab world … the argument for not rushing our fences applied much more strongly to Western … countries. We had to convince our public opinions that the inspection process was serious, that it had produced serious evidence, and that this was the basis for a second resolution."

540. Sir David commented that he was "encouraged" by the response to his arguments about "the political pressures and realities … and the need for time and evidence".

541. Mr Straw warned Sir David Manning on 16 January that the momentum in Washington was to do something soon after 27 January, and it was being assumed that Mr Blair would be with President Bush.

542. Mr Straw recommended that Mr Blair should speak to President Bush.

543. Sir David Manning agreed, reiterating his advice that more time was required.

544. On 16 January, Mr Straw discussed the UK's need for more time and "decisions no earlier than March and April rather than January and February", as Sir David Manning had told Dr Rice the previous day, with Secretary Powell.[184]

545. Reporting the conversation to Sir David, Mr Straw warned that the momentum in Washington to do something soon after 27 January was "running very high". It might be "virtually impossible" for the US to follow the timetable of "no deadlines" set out in resolution 1284.

546. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that there had been "unanimous support" for Mr Blair's position "after a good discussion in Cabinet".

547. Mr Straw also advised that assumptions were being made that Mr Blair would be with President Bush "in any event". The US could not create a Coalition without the UK; and it would be hard to imagine the US taking military action without the UK.

548. Mr Straw recommended that Mr Blair should talk to President Bush in the middle of the following week "before the draft State of the Union speech is put to bed".

549. Sir David Manning told Mr Blair that he agreed with Mr Straw's recommendation, commenting that it would be easier for the UK if there were "major inspection successes".[185] He also wrote: "Giving ourselves until March/April is a luxury we can afford to get this right – particularly if the US [think] Saddam will rapidly collapse when the blow comes."

Cabinet, 16 January 2003

550. As promised by Mr Blair on 19 December 2002, Cabinet discussed Iraq on 16 January 2003.

551. Mr Blair told Cabinet that the strategy remained to pursue the United Nations course. The inspectors needed time to achieve results. If Iraq was not complying with the demands of the UN, a second resolution would be agreed.

552. Mr Straw stated that there was a good prospect of achieving a second resolution. While sticking to the UN route, the UK should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. Mr Blair repeated the latter statement in his concluding remarks.

553. At Cabinet on 16 January, Mr Blair said that:

> "… he wanted to make the United Nations route work. The inspectors were doing their job inside Iraq and he was optimistic that they would discover weapons of mass destruction and their associated programmes which had been concealed. They needed time to achieve results, including from better co-ordinated intelligence. If Iraq was not complying with the demands of the United Nations, he believed the … Security Council would pass a second resolution."[186]

554. Mr Blair told his colleagues that evidence from the inspectors would make a veto of a second resolution, by other Permanent Members of the Security Council, "less likely":

> "Meanwhile, British and American forces were being built up in the Gulf. If it came to conflict, it would be important for success to be achieved quickly. The [military] build up was having an effect on the Iraqi regime, with internal support dwindling for President Saddam Hussein …"

555. Mr Blair concluded by telling Cabinet that:

> "The strategy remained to pursue the United Nations course. He would be meeting President Bush to discuss Iraq at the end of the month, after Dr Blix had reported to the Security Council on 27 January."

556. Mr Straw said that:

> "… he was aware of anxieties about the possibility of having to diverge from the United Nations path. There was a good prospect of achieving a second resolution. Many had been doubtful about achieving the first resolution; in the event, the … Security Council vote had been unanimous. While sticking with the United Nations route we should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. Voting decisions in the Security Council could be driven by domestic politics, not the demands of the international situation."

[186] Cabinet Conclusions, 16 January 2003.

557. Mr Straw added that:

"In his recent contacts with the Muslim and Arab world, all could see the benefit of Saddam Hussein's demise. He had utterly rejected the notion that we were hostile to Islam … Saddam Hussein had attacked his own people and his neighbours – all of whom were Muslims."

558. Ms Short told the Cabinet that "keeping to the United Nations route would hold the Government's support together. She had been reviewing humanitarian scenarios for Iraq and concluded that extra resources would be required, given the other humanitarian priority of Southern Africa."

559. Ms Short added that the possibility "of chemical and biological weapons being used inside Iraq, and their effect on local civilians", was a "particularly worrying scenario". The involvement of the United Nations would be "essential" for the management of the aftermath of military action: it would "provide legitimacy for the political and economic reconstruction of Iraq, including the use of oil revenues. Work on the aftermath should be taken forward urgently."

560. Points made during the discussion were:

- Communication "needed to be improved, on the basis of a core script". The message was "complex but should start from first principles; part of the message was that the policy flowed from our own national interest and respect for international law". A "small proportion of the population would always be opposed to military action, the political battle was for the centre ground which could be won by argument".
- Although Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon were "best able to speak from an informed position, since they had access to the intelligence, Cabinet members more generally needed to speak up for the Government's policy on Iraq".
- The "leadership of the United States was not widely trusted" in the UK "but President Bush's resolve was weakening the Iraqi regime".
- "[T]he inspectors had only recently started their work and it was unreasonable for opponents to assert that the absence of evidence so far meant that military action was unjustified; once evidence of weapons of mass destruction was produced, the public mood would change dramatically".
- Maintaining internal cohesion within the UK "was important, not least in respect of the Islamic community".
- "[P]ushing the Middle East Peace Process forward remained an important part of our policy, as was stability in the region".

561. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said:

> "… the strategy based on the United Nations route was clear, although the uncertainties loomed large and there was a natural reluctance to go to war. It was to be expected that the public would want the inspectors to find the evidence before military action was taken. Pursuing the United Nations route was the right policy, but we should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. The priorities for the immediate future were:
> - improved communications, which would set out the Government's strategy and be promoted by the whole Cabinet;
> - preparatory work on planning the aftermath of any military action and the role of the United Nations in that, which should in turn be conveyed to the Iraqi people so that they had a vision of a better life in prospect; and
> - contingency work on the unintended consequences which could arise from the Iraqi use of weapons of mass destruction, environmental catastrophe or internecine strife within Iraq."

562. Mr Campbell wrote that Cabinet was "fine". In addition to the points recorded in the minutes, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had said that:

- Russia was "closer to the Americans" than it said publicly and France did "not particularly want to be left on the outside": "But it was going to be tough."
- "In the meantime we build up our troops, and make sure that if it does come to conflict we are able to get it over quickly."
- "… we had to stay close [to the US] publicly to maximise influence privately."[187]

563. Mr Campbell also wrote:

- Mr Cook had said that "we were in a tremendous position in the UN", thanks to Mr Blair. The prospect of getting a second resolution was stronger if we did not rule out doing without one.
- Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister and Deputy Leader of the Labour Party, had "done a very passionate wind-up"; the "discussion showed that there was no real division 'so let's stop pretending there is". The briefings had to stop. The [Labour] Party didn't "like the idea of intervention but sometimes we have to make difficult judgements".

564. The discussion at Cabinet on 16 January took place at a key point in the development of the UK's position on Iraq and focused primarily on the role of inspections, forthcoming diplomatic activity at the UN, the need for effective communication of the Government's position, and a high level discussion of some of the possible consequences of military action.

565. Mr Blair's decision not to reveal that he had received Lord Goldsmith's draft advice, or that it concluded a further determination by the Security Council that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations would be required to provide the legal basis for military action, is addressed in Section 5.

THE DECISION TO DEPLOY GROUND FORCES

566. Despite the imminence of the formal decision to offer a significant land contribution Cabinet was informed only that forces were building up in the Gulf. There is no evidence of any discussion of the nature and scale of the likely UK contribution of ground forces or their imminent deployment.

567. The formal proposal for the deployment was sent to Mr Blair later that day. The absence of any formal collective discussion of the proposal by senior Ministers before it was approved by Mr Blair is addressed in Sections 6.2 and 6.5.

568. Nor did Cabinet discuss the strategic implications of making such a military contribution, including the risks associated with military action and the potential responsibilities which might be incurred.

569. The need for such a discussion is addressed in Section 7.

570. Although Mr Blair had said on 24 October 2002 that Cabinet would, "in due time" be able to discuss the military options, and he had said on 9 January that the discussion on 16 January would be an "in-depth discussion" of Iraq, Cabinet was not told that the imminent deployment of a large scale ground force to southern Iraq was under serious consideration.

571. The development of thinking in the MOD on the options for deploying a large scale ground force for operations in southern Iraq, including the presentation to Mr Blair on 15 January and his response, and the way in which the decision was then taken to deploy UK forces, is described in detail Sections 6.1 and 6.2.

572. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 16 January seeking agreement to the "key role in southern Iraq" proposed by the US for the UK:

> "Important questions remain to be resolved … But the role proposed for the UK is a sensible and significant one, and I recommend that with certain qualifications, we accept it. We need to decide quickly.
>
> "If you agree, I propose to announce the composition and deployment of the force in an oral statement on Monday 20 January."[188]

573. Copies of the letter were sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull.

[188] Letter Hoon to Blair, 16 January 2003, 'Iraq: UK Land Contribution'.

574. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 17 January, flagging up three major issues: targeting; the response to any Iraqi use of WMD; and the need for greater clarity on thinking and plans for the aftermath.[189]

575. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair: "Good questions. But I don't think they affect your decision in principle."[190]

576. Mr Blair replied: "agreed".[191]

577. Late on 17 January, following a telephone conversation, Sir David replied to Mr Watkins that Mr Blair was "content to proceed on the basis of the Defence Secretary's recommendations" and that he would be grateful "if you and the FCO would now take things forward as proposed".[192]

578. Mr Hoon announced the deployment of UK ground forces, which would "include the headquarters of 1 (UK) Armoured Division with support from 7 Armoured Brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and 102 Logistics Brigade", in an oral statement in Parliament on 20 January.[193]

579. Asked whether Cabinet on 16 January might have been an opportunity for some of the points from the MOD briefing on military options to be mentioned, Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that Mr Blair was:

> "… very reluctant to discuss the military options …
> "I could see he didn't want key discussions of where we were going, through the North or the South and who was going to bring what forces to bear where, and there is some sense in that. But the strategic choices that they implied … didn't get discussed either. For example, the fact that if you have ground forces you become an Occupying Power. I don't remember someone saying 'Wouldn't it be better if we just halted at Option 2, because then we will not be involved in being an Occupying Power?' ..."[194]

580. Lord Turnbull subsequently added that Cabinet was given "Week by week progress reports on the state of play of the inspections … That's the bit they were actually rather well-informed about, much more so than on the military side."[195]

581. The absence of a collective discussion on the implications of the military deployment is addressed in Section 7.

Mr Blair's meeting with Dr Blix, 17 January 2003

582. In a meeting on 17 January, Mr Blair urged Dr Blix to tell Baghdad that this was their last chance and the US was serious about military action. If Iraq was co-operating, the inspectors would need more time; if it was not, it would be better to make that clear soon.

583. Reporting on the discussion in the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 15 January, Mr Paul Johnston, Head of the FCO Security Policy (Sec Pol) Department, informed Mr Straw that it was UK information which had led to the discovery of SA-2 (Volga) engines, but "It was not yet clear whether they constituted a material breach."[196] The MOD was considering providing additional interviewers to support UNMOVIC, "whose resources were stretched. Evidence from Iraqi scientists might be the most likely basis for an eventual material breach."

584. Mr Johnston also reported that the FCO was addressing "how far and how fast the US might push to bring matters to a head in the Security Council if, after 27 January, the Americans became concerned that 'business as usual' had set in". Mr Blair's visit to the US at the end of January might be too late to influence the immediate US reaction to the Council discussion. Mr Blair might try to call President Bush the following week.

585. In preparation for Mr Blair's meeting with Dr Blix on 17 January, the FCO advised No.10 that:

- Dr Blix had made a "sound start in getting UNMOVIC operational"; the UK had provided "considerable support, which we believe is beginning to show fruit".
- UK intelligence had helped UNMOVIC to discover illegally imported rocket engines.
- The key message was the need for UNMOVIC to intensify its inspections, not to focus exclusively on infrastructure, which was "often easy to conceal or move around", and to focus on interviews, both formal and informal, of Iraqi scientists.
- The UK had doubts about the practicality of interviews outside Iraq but was looking at ways to try to overcome those.
- Expectations were "running high" for the 27 January meeting. The UK was making clear that it was "not a deadline but a status report". After that, while the "strategy outlined in 1284" would give UNMOVIC "60 days to identify key disarmament tasks", the UK wanted to use the next phase to "put maximum pressure on Iraq to co-operate in answering all unresolved questions, eg, including use of mobile laboratories".
- The UK thought Dr Blix should offer to brief the UN Security Council more regularly, perhaps once a fortnight. That would include reporting illegal imports for consideration of further action "even if there is no proven link to illegal programmes".[197]

[197] Letter Davies to Rycroft, 15 January 2003, 'Prime Minister's Meeting with Hans Blix, UNMOVIC'.

586. In response to a request from Sir David Manning for advice on interviews by UN inspectors in Iraq, Mr Scarlett provided a brief co-ordinated with the FCO, SIS, DIS and OD Sec.[198]

587. Mr Scarlett wrote that Iraq had deployed many subterfuges to interfere with the interview process conducted by UNSCOM in the 1990s. Despite those efforts, UNSCOM had "found interviews an extremely important tool, particularly on the biological warfare programme, where the availability of other types of information was limited".

588. Mr Scarlett described measures currently being taken by Iraq to ensure that interviews did not "succeed in uncovering prohibited activity". The UK had provided a database with about 6,000 names although information on individuals involved in WMD activities post 1991 was limited. The UK was in the process of providing a shortlist of "priority" candidates for interview, and had offered advice on interview techniques. So far, only the IAEA had conducted two formal interviews; both had taken place in Iraq and the individuals had asked for Iraqi officials to be present.

589. Mr Scarlett concluded that interviews had the "potential, if conducted effectively, to uncover gaps in Iraq's cover story". Iraq was "worried about this prospect". The UK was concerned that UNMOVIC and the IAEA lacked "the expertise necessary to use this important tool effectively". Mr Blair should press Dr Blix on the continuing need for effective interviews.

590. In their meeting on 17 January, Mr Blair urged Dr Blix to "give Baghdad a strong message that this was their final chance and that the US were serious about military action".[199] Mr Blair also underlined "the importance of the inspectors carrying out interviews without minders" and offered UK help in identifying potential interviewees.

591. Following further discussion of recent developments including the finds of shells and documents the previous day, Mr Blair stated that "if Iraq was co-operating then the inspectors would need time to continue their work. But if Iraq was not co-operating it would be better to make that clear soon after 27 January, before the end of February."

592. Dr Blix said:

> "[A]lthough the Iraqis gave prompt access, they did not seem sincere. They did things for the media, eg a 12,000 page declaration that contained no new substance … The Prime Minister concluded that if there were a major find Blix would report it immediately, and if there were not a major find before 27 January Blix would report then that his overall assessment was a lack of substantive co-operation. Blix agreed. He thought the Iraqis would prefer to deny access to the inspectors than to be caught red-handed; he would of course report either to the Security Council."

Security Council, 20 January 2003

593. Mr Straw warned a meeting of the Security Council on 20 January that patience with Iraq had nearly run out.

594. In a joint statement issued on 20 January, following a meeting in Baghdad to take stock of inspections, UNMOVIC and the IAEA reported some progress on detailed issues, including that "persons asked for interviews in private" would be "encouraged to accept".[200]

595. Mr Campbell wrote that, at the No.10 morning meeting on 20 January, Mr Blair was "becoming increasingly worried about Iraq. The whole question was what we did if and when the US went without the UN."[201]

596. France as President of the Security Council had proposed a special, Ministerial-level meeting of the Council on 20 January, to discuss counter-terrorism.

597. In his speech to the Security Council, Mr Straw stated:

> "… we have to expose the connection between the terrorists who respect no rules, and the states which respect no rules. It is the leaders of rogue states who set the example: brutalise their people; celebrate violence; provide a haven for terrorists to operate; and, worse than that, through their chemical and biological weapons … provide a tempting arsenal for terrorists to use …
> "So … action to stop rogue states' proliferation is as urgent as action to stop terrorism … wherever we can, we should use diplomatic means to get proliferators to comply as we are with North Korea … But there comes a moment when our patience must run out.
> "We are near that point with Iraq … so the moment of choice for Iraq is close. He [Saddam Hussein] must either resolve this crisis peacefully, by the full and active compliance with his Security Council obligations and full co-operation with inspectors, or face the 'serious consequences' – the use of force – which this Council warned would follow when it passed [resolution] 1441."[202]

598. Mr McDonald reported that Mr Joschka Fischer, the German Foreign Minister, had told Mr Straw in the margins of the discussion that Germany would not vote for a second resolution, even if there was clear evidence of a material breach; and that there were no circumstances in which Germany would be involved in military action.[203] Asked if he really meant no circumstances, such as "some flagrant breach, a large find, the murder of an inspector", Mr Fischer replied that that "was different", and Germany "might" vote for a second resolution.

599. In remarks to the press, Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, condemned unilateral use of military force and stated that, as long as progress was being made through inspections, France saw no reason to choose military intervention.

600. In his press conference after the meeting, Mr de Villepin stated that Iraq could not be separated from other proliferation issues, and what was done on Iraq:

> "… must apply to all the other crises. If war is the only way to resolve the problem, we're immediately forced down a blind alley. The international community must clearly demonstrate initiative and imagination. We must also maintain international unity. Unilateral military intervention must be perceived as a victory for the maxim 'might is right', an attack against the primacy of the law and international morality."[204]

601. Mr de Villepin stated that the international community had chosen inspections, and Iraq had to understand that it was "high time that she co-operated actively". Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes had "essentially been halted, even frozen". In his view, Iraq could be disarmed by peaceful means.

602. In response to questions, Mr de Villepin stated that there was a choice between continuing with co-operation and "military intervention because we are impatient". France believed that "nothing today justifies envisaging military action". The inspectors had been working for "fewer than 60 days" and progress was "satisfactory", although there was more that could be done to seek Iraq's active co-operation.

603. Mr de Villepin raised questions about the legitimacy and effectiveness of any US unilateral military action, and warned of the potential consequences for a united Iraq and a stable and safe region in the Middle East. France's view was that it would "take us down a path where we would have no control over the gains and benefits".

604. Asked if France would use her veto, Mr de Villepin responded that President Chirac had "said from the outset" that France would not "join in military action" that did not have:

> "… the support of the international community, UN support. Moreover we believe military intervention would be the worst solution, and that the use of force can only be a last resort, implying that all other avenues have been exhausted. If that point is reached, France, as a Permanent Member of the Security Council, will shoulder her responsibilities, remaining true to her principles … so long as progress can be made through co-operation with inspectors, there is no reason to choose … military intervention …"

605. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that Mr de Villepin's comments about the unilateral use of force "had effectively denounced the US".[205] That had "soured relations especially with Colin [Powell]".

606. Mr Straw also wrote that the special Ministerial meeting of the Security Council, and the three that followed in a seven-week period, were "among the most serious and dramatic meetings in which I have ever been involved".

The positions of other members of the Security Council

607. President Bush stated on 21 January that it was clear Saddam Hussein was not disarming and time was running out.

608. Sir David Manning was assured by Dr Rice that the US wanted a second resolution.

609. In a press conference following a meeting with leading economists at the White House on 21 January, President Bush was asked if he was frustrated by the French "saying that they would block a UN resolution authorizing force on Iraq". He replied that Saddam Hussein possessed "some of the world's deadliest weapons" and posed "a serious threat to America and our friends and allies". The world, including France, had come together "to say he must disarm". But he was "not disarming", he was "delaying … deceiving … asking for time". He was "playing hide-and-seek with the inspectors". The US "in the name of peace" would "continue to insist" that he did disarm.[206]

610. Asked when he intended to take a decision about whether the inspection process had any real hope of disarming Saddam, President Bush replied:

> "It's clear to me now that he is not disarming … Surely we have learned how this man deceives and delays. He's giving people the run-around … time is running out … Make no mistake … he will be disarmed."

611. President Bush concluded that Saddam Hussein had:

> "… been given ample time to disarm. We have had ample time now to see that … he's employing the tricks of the past …
> "He wants to focus the attention of the world on inspectors. This is not about inspectors; this is about a disarmed Iraq …
> "… this looks like a rerun of a bad movie and I'm not interested in watching it."

612. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that President Bush's remarks were a "clear message that [the US was] losing patience with the UN, and they had pretty much decided it was going to happen and that was that". Mr Blair "felt there had definitely been a change in mood and it was pretty bad"; President Bush needed to do more to make it an international coalition.[207]

613. Secretary Powell wrote in 2012:

> "In January 2003, as war with Iraq was approaching, we needed to present our case against Iraq to the public and the international community. By then the President did not think that war could be avoided. He had crossed the line in his own mind, even though the NSC [National Security Council] had never met – and never would meet – to discuss the decision."[208]

614. Following the debate at the UN on 20 January, Sir David Manning spoke again to Dr Rice.[209] He reported that opinion polls in the UK showed that "over 60 percent" of those questioned would "accept" military action if mandated by a second UN resolution, but the figures "plummeted to near single figures without one". He reported that he had been assured that the US Administration wanted a second resolution.

615. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that the "vast majority" of the Security Council believed that the inspectors should be given more time, although many were also sceptical of Iraqi co-operation.

616. Sir Jeremy Greenstock chaired an informal discussion of Security Council members on 21 January, which he described as to report on the discussion between Dr Blix and Mr Blair on 17 January. Sir Jeremy had stated that the UK continued to feed the inspectors with information on a "one way basis" and there was a "good chance" that, as the inspectors got closer to Iraq's proscribed activities, more information would come out of the system:

> "Iraq was therefore taking an amazing risk by trying to conceal its WMD. The Iraqis had to realise that there was only one way to avoid complete disarmament through military action – much more pro-active co-operation. If they did not provide that co-operation they would themselves be choosing to realise the threat of military action."[210]

617. Sir Jeremy reported that Ambassador Negroponte had stated that the situation could not be allowed to drag on; and that he was talking about days, not weeks or months. It was for Iraq to prove to the Council it was complying, not the other way round. The French Deputy Permanent Representative had argued that simply saying that co-operation was insufficient was not enough; demonstrable, precise evidence was needed to justify war, not become a prisoner of the military build-up. That could be hours, but it could also be months or years.

618. Sir Jeremy stated that the "vast majority" of Security Council members believed that "inspections should be given more time, although many are also sceptical of Iraqi co-operation".

619. In a separate telegram, Sir Jeremy Greenstock warned that "the terms of the Iraq debate are not moving in our favour … most Council members are focused on giving more time to inspections not on the Iraqi failure to disarm".[211] He highlighted key areas for discussion at the Security Council meetings on 27 and 29 January, and wrote: "If UNMOVIC can produce the evidence of Iraqi biological or chemical weapons in particular … we have a very good chance of turning Council opinion back towards a second resolution."

620. Sir John Holmes, British Ambassador to France, advised that the gap between the UK and French positions was "unbridgeable". President Chirac was strongly opposed to war and thought it would have disastrous consequences. France also questioned the level of threat posed by Iraq.

621. On 21 January, Sir John Holmes wrote to Sir David Manning setting out his perspective on the French position.[212] Sir John Holmes acknowledged that France would try "to avoid having to veto" and noted that "opportunities to push Chirac in our direction may arise as circumstances change".

622. Sir John reported that President Chirac strongly opposed war and that for him preventing it was more important than disarming Saddam Hussein. It would be very difficult to persuade President Chirac to:

> "… support a second resolution and participate in war short of a new and evident casus belli. He may well accept the pain of exclusion from the action than change this position, though he has yet to face up to this choice and hopes to avoid it. The driving force of Chirac's policy is to avoid a war at almost any cost. He does not believe it is necessary/proportionate to the real threat. He fears disastrous consequences in the region for the MEPP, for the US-Western image more widely, and for further fuelling of terrorism …"

623. Sir John reported that terrorism was perceived as the most urgent threat which the French thought was in danger of being neglected. President Chirac was also "seriously concerned" about the effect on the world economy and the impact of that on France's economic recovery. Beyond those concerns, Sir John described President Chirac as wanting to demonstrate a different, multilateralist world view and preserve French influence through keeping the main decisions in the Security Council. President Chirac did not really believe Saddam Hussein was a threat although WMD more widely were.

624. Sir John Holmes described French tactics as to "encourage international pressure against the war, to argue for more time, to help the inspectors do their work, and to put more pressure on Saddam to co-operate". Sir John advised that President Chirac did not believe there was anything seriously incriminating to find; a view which [212] Letter Holmes to Manning, 21 January 2003, 'Iraq: French Thinking'.

Sir John reported was "widely shared here". Secondly, President Chirac thought Iraq's concealment techniques would be "too good for the inspectors". Thirdly, if inspectors did find something, the French were bound to argue, at least in the first place, that it showed the inspections were doing their job, making war unnecessary.

625. Sir John predicted that:

> "If Saddam manifestly blocks the inspectors, with or without a major find, but more obviously with, the French will probably concede that he has had his chance and blown it, vote for a second resolution … and take part [in military action].
>
> "If the inspectors find something big, the French will first argue for the continuation of inspections; but if it is a plausible smoking gun, and it is clear the US (and we) are committed to military action, again they will probably commit to a second resolution and to take part. But they will try everything to find alternatives …
>
> "If there is no major obstruction and no smoking gun, France will oppose a second resolution (while trying to avoid having to veto) and stay out of military action, though they would probably at the end of day try to sound neutral … Continuing Iraqi deception and only passive co-operation … will almost certainly not be enough to persuade them to change this in the short term …"

626. Sir John wrote:

> "As things stand, there is a relatively narrow window of circumstances in which the French would take part fully in military action: a clear casus belli and a second resolution. This looks to me possible in the next few weeks but not probable. Short of that, they will not go with the Americans, though they could stop short of outright opposition and be ready to do something to help eg backfilling."

627. Sir John added that "The consequences for France of not being there if the US go are painful for them to contemplate", including being on the wrong side of the argument if the action is an obvious rapid success. But:

> "There would be consolations if the Americans had no or few allies … And if it all went wrong, they would be on the right side of the argument."

628. Addressing the implications for UK policy, Sir John wrote that "the gap between the Prime Minister's convictions and Chirac's is, for the present, unbridgeable". He saw "no alternative to massaging our differences … and staying within shouting distance of each other".

629. Sir John concluded that, if the UK and the French (and Germans) diverged over military action, the consequences would depend:

> "… on the circumstances and the success of the war. But the implications for the successful pursuit of our European policy … could be severe … So if any chance emerges in the next few weeks of bringing our positions together, we should grab it with both hands."

630. In advance of the Security Council meeting on 27 January, Mr Straw and the FCO were concerned to identify a strategy which would allow more time for the strategy of coercion to work.

631. Mr Straw visited Washington and repeated the political arguments for trying to get a second resolution on 23 January.[213]

632. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the inspectors' reports to the Security Council on 27 January, the need to "shift the burden of proof to Iraq" and the need to ensure there were no differences between the US and UK.[214]

633. Mr Straw made the case for a second resolution in his subsequent meeting with Mr Dick Cheney, US Vice President, telling him that "the key question was how to navigate the shoals between where we were today and a possible decision to take military action".[215] The UK would be "fine" if there was a second resolution; and that it would be "ok if we tried and failed (a la Kosovo). But we would need bullet-proof jackets if we did not even try". In response to Vice President Cheney's question whether it would be better to try and fail than not to try at all, Mr Straw said the former.

634. In the subsequent discussion, Mr Straw stated that:

- The composition of the Security Council since 1 January "made matters more difficult".
- If there were "a half decent statement" from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei (to the Security Council on 27 January), "which enumerated Iraqi shortcomings, we would have the beginnings of a further material breach as defined by OP4 of [resolution] 1441. We could then use a period of time – weeks not months – to negotiate a second resolution." The text of such a resolution would "write itself".
- The effort of getting a second resolution "would help the UK and – he thought – the US to nail the canard that the US was operating outside the international community. It would also help with the 'day-after'."
- Mr Blair "felt strongly that diplomatic effort could make the military effort easier. If the international community was united, then the Arabs could go to Saddam with a strong message that he had either to go or his regime would face destruction. Arab leaders were desperate to get rid of Saddam. A second resolution would embolden them." If the international community was split, that would "embolden Saddam Hussein".
- People in the UK had a "sense of the UN as a legitimator of action". Vice President Cheney said the same was true in the US.

635. Vice President Cheney made a number of points, including:

- A French veto "wouldn't hurt one bit in the States".
- Secretary Powell had felt "bushwhacked" at the meeting of the Security Council on 20 January, and the position of Germany was "increasingly fragile".
- The US Administration "had not yet figured out next steps", which would "to some extent" depend on what happened on 27 January.
- It "would clearly be preferable to get a second resolution". There was a "sense in the US that a process was unfolding", "But there was no prospect of the inspectors working properly unless the party inspected was willing. The burden of proof was on the Iraqis and they were not delivering."
- There was "a timing problem. The idea that we could let it drift through months of discussion was not on. Troops were already in place. The weather was a factor … If we backed off now, or sat there for months, the Saudis and others would back off. It would be one more example of bold talk and no action. We would never get them gingered up for action again."
- President Bush "could not let a charade continue at the UN"; and he "could not let France and Germany dictate policy". He would have thought France had "a vested interest … in preserving the status of the Security Council", but "Instead, they were allowing the Council to be a place not of action but of restraining legitimate US action."
- Once military operations started, "the Iraqi regime was likely to fall apart quickly": "Iraqis would reveal all the WMD now hidden away."
- The US Administration "had not yet resolved" whether it wanted a second vote or not.

636. At the end of the meeting, Mr Straw:

> "… discussed the Kosovo model and its limitations. The tactics of tabling a text in the knowledge of a likely veto were very delicate. But we might also face the situation where France or Germany tabled a resolution to give the inspectors more time. We would have to veto but that would put us on the back foot. Last autumn, the knowledge that the US and UK had a text in play had deterred others from tabling an alternative [...] …"

637. Mr Straw's comments on proceeding with military action if the UK tried and failed to obtain a second resolution prompted Mr Wood to write to Mr Straw.[216] That correspondence and Lord Goldsmith's subsequent correspondence with Mr Straw are addressed in Section 5.

[216] Minute Wood to PS [FCO], 24 January 2003, 'Iraq: Legal Position'.

638. On a flight from Washington on 23 January, Mr Ricketts, gave Mr Straw an outline of a strategy which Mr Blair could put to President Bush.[217]

639. The key messages were that the strategy was working, but it needed more time. That would have three strategic advantages:

- The military build-up was "already producing signs of fracturing in the regime … We might be able to achieve our objectives without firing a shot";
- Inspections "were beginning to produce results".
- The UK was working with "moderate Arabs" to "get Saddam out using the leverage of a second resolution".

640. Mr Ricketts stated that:

- In the present circumstances, it was clear that there would not be the nine votes in the Security Council needed for a second resolution.
- Without a "dramatic new fact", Mr Ricketts did not see how a second resolution could be achieved "in the next few weeks".
- "UK politics [made] it essential to have a second resolution".

641. In Mr Ricketts' view, the US and UK had to "contrive the circumstances" in which they could "carry a broad coalition and domestic opinion with us. Going without the UN carried the big price of resentment in the Muslim world, including increased terrorism/ risk of being stuck for years with the burden of rebuilding post-Saddam Iraq." Working with the UN would allow Iraq to be "rebuilt with international support" which would allow the UK "to exit", and would be a "powerful message for other would-be proliferators. That prize is worth taking time over."

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 24 January 2003

642. Mr Blair decided on 23 January to ask President Bush for a few weeks' delay to maximise the chances of finding a "smoking gun" as the basis for a second resolution.

643. Mr Campbell wrote that on 22 January he and Baroness Morgan, Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations, had "banged on" about the need for the US to be on a "broader international route" and that Mr Blair:

> "… sensed the inspectors would not necessarily come out with what was needed for absolute clarity, so we would have to face the prospect of going in without a UNSCR. Chirac was making it clearer than ever that he would be against war come what may, even with a smoking gun."[218]

[218] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

644. Mr Campbell also wrote:

- He had also discussed the problems for the UK caused by the US focus on their domestic audience with the US.
- Baroness Morgan had warned Mr Blair that the PLP needed UN support, and they had to see real evidence.
- Mr Blair had been "pretty clear that we couldn't peel off from the US without very good reason".

645. In a meeting with Sir Jeremy Greenstock and No.10 officials to discuss the handling of Iraq in the UN Security Council in the coming weeks, at 9.30am on 23 January, Mr Blair set out an approach which included:

- There was a need "if we could possibly get it" for "hard proof" that Saddam Hussein was "lying over his WMD, to bring public opinion to accept the need for military action"; and that inspections would need to be given time.
- In their planned meeting (on 31 January), Mr Blair would seek to convince President Bush to delay a decision to start military action for a few weeks.
- Confirmation was needed that the assumption that the Arabs, and in particular the Saudis, would only favour military action on the basis of a second resolution, was correct.
- The "extra time should be used to maximise the chances of the inspectors finding a smoking gun or of being seriously obstructed (the inspectors should be encouraged to inspect sites which we knew the Iraqis would want to block)".
- The "less optimal outcome would be no smoking gun and no serious obstruction but a series of regular Blix reports that he was not satisfied with the level of Iraqi co-operation".
- The "extra time would also give the Arabs the opportunity to press Saddam to go into exile".
- The argument needed to be made that "the inspectors were not supposed to be a detective agency … South Africa was a model of how it could be done."[219]

CABINET, 23 JANUARY 2003

646. Mr Blair told Cabinet that a "big debate was developing over the value of the inspections route" and that he would "report back" after his meeting with President Bush at the end of January.

647. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 23 January that his meeting with Dr Blix on 17 January had confirmed that Iraq was not co-operating fully with the UN.[220] The Security Council meeting on 27 January would not be a "trigger date"; the "inspectors had to continue their work". The military build-up was under way and Saddam Hussein was "under increasing pressure".

[220] Cabinet Conclusions, 23 January 2003.

648. Mr Blair also said that "A big debate was developing over the value of the inspections route." He would "report back to colleagues on the outcome" of his meeting with President Bush.

649. Sir Richard Dearlove advised on 23 January that the US had "in effect" taken the decision to use force against Iraq.

650. In response to a request from Mr Blair for briefing on US planning, Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary sent Sir David Manning an update, advising that a decision had "in effect" been taken to use force against Iraq.[221] The US military would be ready in mid-February.

MR BLAIR'S NOTE TO PRESIDENT BUSH, 24 JANUARY 2003

651. In a Note to President Bush on 24 January, Mr Blair told President Bush that the need for a second resolution was overwhelming, and that inspectors should be given until the end of March or early April to carry out their task.

652. Mr Blair suggested that, in the absence of a "smoking gun", Dr Blix would be able to harden up his findings on the basis of a pattern of non-co-operation from Iraq and that would be sufficient for support for military action in the Security Council.

653. In addition, Mr Blair framed his argument in the context that extra time would be crucial to make a better case and work up coherent plans for the "aftermath" of a conflict and to secure international support.

654. Mr Blair sent a Note to President Bush on 24 January, setting out the dilemma, as he saw it, in the absence of a "smoking gun".[222]

655. Addressing the question "What's the problem?", Mr Blair wrote:

> "If we delay, we risk Saddam messing us about, sucking us back into a game of hide and seek with the Inspectors where, unless they find 'the smoking gun', the thing drags on for ever until we give up or get distracted.
> "On the other hand, at present there is not support for a second UN resolution; and Blix is not yet in a clear and unambiguous position on Iraqi non-co-operation."

656. Mr Blair wrote that the arguments for proceeding with the second resolution, "or at the very least a clear statement" from Dr Blix which allowed the US and UK to argue that a failure to pass a second resolution was in breach of the spirit of 1441, remained in his view, overwhelming. He cited six reasons:

- It would be "the best protection" in the event of "a military hitch" or a protracted campaign.

[221] Letter PS/C to Manning, 23 January 2003, [untitled].
[222] Letter Manning to Rice, 24 January 2003, [untitled], attaching Note [Blair to Bush], [undated], 'Note'.

- Given the risk of casualties, military and civilian, “doing this in the context of international opposition would be very tough”.
- Arab opinion wanted “it done”, and wanted “it done quickly”, but they were assuming a second resolution: “Without one they will be in a real bind, especially if parts of Europe, Russia, China, etc were all vociferous in their opposition.”
- Saddam Hussein would be “emboldened by a lack of international support for us and weakened by its existence”. If he believed international opinion was against the US and UK, he might hunker down in Baghdad.
- Internecine fighting in Iraq when a military strike destabilised the regime would be the “biggest risk”: “They are perfectly capable, on previous form, of killing each other in large numbers.” The US and UK “would need the backing of the international community and preferably the UN to handle it”; without that the US and UK would “get the blame for any fighting”.
- If they forfeited the UN route, the US and UK would lose the high ground. They had “invested huge capital” in that and it had given everyone “a big comfort blanket”. If that were taken away, it would be “about US power, naked and in your face”. There were “big majorities against action without UN backing everywhere, even in the UK” and “even in the UK Cabinet”. That would be “so in spades” if the UN inspectors appeared to be asking for more time and the US and UK were refusing.

657. Addressing the “way through”, Mr Blair wrote:

> “In truth, the world is in contradiction. No one is really prepared for war, except us. But equally no one believes Saddam is telling the truth. In part we are victims of our own success. Your strength … has forced Saddam to let inspectors back in; has made him seem weak and back in his box. So, everyone asks: why bother?
> “But they also know, deep down, WMD is an issue and that given half a chance Saddam would be at it again. And they don’t want, ideally to fall out with the US. But to avoid falling out, they need some cover.”

658. Mr Blair described the position of France and Germany as being that the inspectors were in Iraq “to play hide and seek”, and “they should stay as long as it takes for them to find anything without any obligation on Saddam other than not to hinder them”.

659. The “true view”, however, was that resolution 1441 gave Iraq a “duty” to “co-operate fully: not just in access, but in being open, honest and transparent about where WMD was and actively helping the inspectors to seize and destroy it”. Dr Blix accepted that view:

> “… if things carry on as they are, then he will say that there is not full co-operation though there is not either the absence of any co-operation; but as he continues to demand Iraq fully co-operates and they continue to refuse, this pattern of non-co-operation – even in the absence of any ‘smoking gun’ is sufficient for him to harden up his findings; and I think it will be sufficient for us.”

660. Mr Blair added:

> "ie in the US/UK view, the failure … fully to co-operate is enough now and technically we are right. 27 January should be crunch time. But we won't carry other people … However, if Blix carries on reporting non-co-operation, makes increasing demands, and hardens his findings with each stage, I think we will carry people – even without the 'smoking gun' – shortly."

661. Mr Blair stated that military action starting at the end of March/early April would not be "a big military problem": "But the extra time could be crucial in carrying international opinion" with the US and the UK, provided they had defined clearly the true role of the inspections and Dr Blix was behind the proposal.

662. Mr Blair's proposal was for:

- a report on 27 January stating that Dr Blix was not satisfied and identifying specific questions for Iraq to address;
- the US and UK to set out "the true role" of the inspectors and get Dr Blix's support, saying that they believed "Iraq is in breach but even so, out of deference to allies, we are prepared to give the inspectors some time";
- Dr Blix to agree to report every two weeks;
- the US and UK to make it clear that, if by the time of the late March report there was not a definitive change of Iraqi attitude, the US and UK would take the issue back to the UN and expect action; and
- regular reports from Dr Blix in February and March to build "a clear pattern of deceit".

663. Mr Blair argued that the disadvantages of that strategy would be military delay but "only, effectively, for a month". The advantages would be "huge", including:

- The US and UK could "build a case based on the Inspectors not just our own judgement".
- Dr Blix might find "the smoking gun".
- Saddam "might crack".
- There would be "a far better chance of a second resolution" which would give them "a clear run with public support".
- The Saudis and other Arabs could "build support for their strategy to push Saddam out".
- It would provide time, which Mr Blair believed was needed, "to work up more coherent post-Saddam and 'aftermath' plans".
- It would also provide time "to make a bigger case on WMD and the link with terrorism".

664. Mr Blair concluded: "In parallel we should of course maintain our rhetoric and step up military preparations."

665. Mr Campbell wrote that the Note was "a very well made, carefully constructed argument that made sense", and that President Bush had read it before the telephone call with Mr Blair.[223]

666. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice about the Note.[224] He reported that it was clear that the White House had a different perspective about the advantages of moving to military action as soon as possible and the importance of a second resolution, including for securing support from Arab governments.

667. In his subsequent conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair pursued the proposals in his Note and explained his political difficulties.

668. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush later that day, he set out the strategy in his Note and his view on the dilemma they faced.[225] The international community was "not yet ready" for a second resolution, but an operation without one would be "much tougher".

669. Mr Blair said that it was possible that the inspectors would find a smoking gun, but he was "not relying on that". In his view, even if there were no smoking gun and the Iraqis were giving the inspectors access, Dr Blix:

> "… would say that they were not co-operating sufficiently. Saddam had to co-operate actively with identifying and destroying all his WMD … So in our view Saddam was already in breach of 1441. But the international community was in denial. Our case would strengthen if there were a series of Blix reports that Iraq was not co-operating. We needed to give the inspectors more time to firm up the case."

670. Mr Blair proposed setting a clear deadline. Unless there were full co-operation by then, we would seek a second resolution: "If this were not achievable, military action would follow anyway." Military preparations and diplomatic work to build international support should continue.

671. Later Mr Blair argued that "we needed to look reasonable" and that the deadline for the start of military action should be delayed to the end of March.

672. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had been clear that there was no international political support "without Blix finding a smoking gun and we needed more time". The inspectors should be given another month. Mr Blair was "sure that in time we could turn opinion". President Bush was "pretty clear there would have to be war, because he did not believe Saddam would ever comply, or that the inspectors would be allowed to do their job".[226]

673. The record of the discussion confirms Mr Campbell's account.[227]

674. In response to a question from Mr Campbell about whether he thought President Bush "had basically decided there was going to be a war," Mr Blair had said "if that call was anything to go by, pretty much", Mr Blair hoped that "he could keep things on a multilateral track but it was not going to be easy. He was facing a very tough call indeed, about as tough as they get."[228]

675. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair "was confident that we could get Bush to the position where he stayed [action] long enough for a second UNSCR"; and that there was also "a real danger that the Attorney General would resign if he thought the plan was disproportionate force".

676. Mr Campbell reported that Mr Blair had told a political Cabinet on 24 January that "it was important to stay with the Americans". He had emphasised "closeness as a way of influencing the debate there" and said "he wanted to do a big … diplomacy round" before his meeting with President Bush. Mr Blair had also:

> "… set out what he saw as the political and other realities. He felt that Bush deserved praise for showing strength in forcing Saddam to the position of getting the inspectors in, but … we didn't have enough international support and we needed time to build it."

677. Describing the political Cabinet on 24 January, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Prescott had said more Cabinet Committee discussion on policy was needed.

678. In a conversation with Mr de Villepin on 24 January, Mr Straw said that it was "important for everyone to keep to the process" set out in resolution 1441.[229] That was "the guide against which we could test whether the inspectors had been able to do their job or not". He restated the UK's preference for a second resolution.

679. Mr Straw said that "how France played its hand had major consequences". It was vital to take the UN route. Citing the League of Nations in the 1930s, he said that "failure by the UN would lead to questions about its legitimacy". After complaining about the US approach, Mr de Villepin stated that if in the end it was decided force was needed, "France would join in".

INDICT

INDICT was established in 1996.[230] Although it was UK based, the non-governmental organisation (NGO) operated with funding from the US Congress granted under the auspices of the Iraq Liberation Act 1998. INDICT advocated the establishment of an ad hoc International Criminal Tribunal to try Saddam Hussein and leading members of his regime on charges of genocide and torture, war crimes and other crimes against humanity. Founder members included a number of notable Iraqi exiles including Dr Ahmed Chalabi and Mr Hamid Al Bagali (who was later appointed Iraqi Ambassador to the UN), and Ms Clwyd.

INDICT focused its attention on Saddam Hussein and a dozen senior members of the Iraqi regime including Mr Tariq Aziz, the Deputy Prime Minister.[231]

Ms Clwyd wrote to Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Attorney General, in September 2000, enclosing a copy of Leading Counsel's opinion which advised that there was "a powerful body of evidence that Saddam Hussein and Tariq Aziz were party to, and criminally responsible for … detentions" and that there was "direct evidence that implicates Saddam Hussein and Tariq Aziz in issuing threats to detain the hostages".[232]

Counsel advised that, subject to the consent of the Attorney General being obtained, both Saddam Hussein and Tariq Aziz could be charged in the UK with the offence of Hostage Taking, contrary to section 1 of the Taking of Hostages Act 1982. That was an offence prosecutable in the UK whether committed "in the United Kingdom or elsewhere" regardless of the nationality of the offender.

Lord Williams wrote to Ms Clwyd on 22 March 2001 notifying her of his refusal to grant his consent to the prosecution.[233] He explained the basis of his decision as:

> "I have concluded in respect of Saddam Hussein that there is at present no realistic prospect of a conviction. There are two elements to my assessment. I have concluded that Saddam Hussein, as Head of State of Iraq, would presently be entitled to assert immunity from criminal prosecution. Moreover, I am not satisfied in any event that the evidence as submitted to me is sufficient to provide a realistic prospect of a conviction.
> "Whether the court would uphold any claim of immunity that may be asserted by Tariq Aziz is in my judgement less clear. However, leaving that issue aside, I am not satisfied that the evidence at present submitted by INDICT provides a realistic prospect of conviction for the offences which appear to me to fall to be considered."

In October 2002, INDICT submitted further advice from Leading Counsel to Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, again seeking consent to the prosecution of Saddam Hussein, Tariq Aziz and on this occasion two others, Mr Ali Hassan Al-Majid (who was said to have been appointed the Governor of Kuwait) and Mr Taha Ramadan, the Vice President of Iraq, (characterised by INDICT as the "second most powerful man in Iraq").[234] All were alleged to have committed offences of hostage-taking in 1990.

Lord Goldsmith wrote to Ms Clwyd on 24 January 2003.[235] He stated that he was not prepared to consent to a prosecution on the "theoretical possibility" that Saddam Hussein's "current immunity could at some point lapse" particularly, in the light of the Yerodia[236] decision which implied that the formal grant of his consent might itself contravene the basis of his immunity. Lord Goldsmith was not satisfied, moreover, that the evidence submitted by INDICT provided a realistic prospect of conviction.

Lord Goldsmith did not express a view as to whether Tariq Aziz might continue to enjoy immunity. In his case, and with regard to Ali Hassan Al-Majid and Taha Ramadan, he did not consider the evidence to be sufficiently cogent or persuasive for there to be a realistic prospect of a conviction and Lord Goldsmith refused consent in each case.

Lord Goldsmith closed his letter with the following paragraph:

> "My conclusions on the material provided, focus only on the question of exercising criminal jurisdiction against individuals in the domestic courts. They have nothing to do, of course, with the quite separate question of whether the international community may in due course consider it worthwhile to establish an international tribunal, depending on how the international situation develops. An international tribunal can be set up on a basis that overrides Sovereign immunity. But this is not a matter for me and it would not be right for me to speculate as to how the situation will develop over the next few weeks or months."

Mr Blair's interview on BBC's Breakfast with Frost, 26 January 2003

680. Mr Blair decided to use an interview on Breakfast with Frost on 26 January to set out the position that the inspections should be given sufficient time to determine whether or not Saddam Hussein was co-operating fully. If he was not, that would be a sufficient reason for military action. A find of WMD was not required.

681. In an extended interview on the BBC's Breakfast with Frost programme on 26 January, Mr Blair set out in detail his position on Iraq.[237]

682. Asked whether Dr Blix should be given more time, Mr Blair stated that the inspectors had "to be given the time to do the job", but there was "confusion" about what that job was. The time they needed was to certify whether Saddam Hussein was "fully co-operating or not". Saddam had to provide information on "exactly what weapons material" he had, "allowing the inspectors to inspect it, monitor it and shut it down". If they were not able to do that job, Saddam would have to be disarmed by force. That should not take months, but Saddam was not co-operating.

683. Pressed as to whether non-compliance rather than evidence of weapons of mass destruction justified "a war", Mr Blair replied that he "profoundly" disagreed with the idea that a refusal to co-operate was of a "lesser order". He added:

> "… what we know is that he has this material … we know there is something like 350 tonnes of chemical warfare agent. We know there is something like 30,000 special munitions for the delivery of chemical and biological weapons.
> "He hasn't even told us where those old leftovers from 1998 are … we know … that there is an elaborate process … of concealment …
> "… the people that the inspectors want to interview … are being told, by the Iraqi authorities, they can only come for interviews with an Iraqi … minder, and only be interviewed in certain places.
>
> "And we know also from intelligence that these people's families are being told that if they co-operate and give any information at all they will be executed.
>
> "… if he fails to co-operate in being honest and he is pursuing a programme of concealment, that is every bit as much a breach as finding, for example, a missile or chemical agent."

684. Asked whether there would be "another dossier" setting out what UK intelligence had discovered, Mr Blair stated:

> "… we have the intelligence that says that Saddam has continued to develop these weapons of mass destruction; that what he's doing is using a whole lot of dual-use facilities in order to manufacture chemical and biological weapons; and … that there is an elaborate programme of concealment … forcing the inspectors to play a game of hide and seek."

685. Asked if he had sufficient evidence to back action, Mr Blair replied:

> "… I've got no doubt at all that he's developing these weapons and that he poses a threat but we made a choice to go down the UN route …
>
> "… our judgement, the American judgement … is that Saddam has these weapons, but the purpose of the inspectors … is … to report back to the UN and say whether he is fully co-operating or he's not."

686. Asked whether a second resolution was needed, required or preferred, Mr Blair replied:

> "Of course we want a second resolution and there is only one set of circumstances in which I've said that we would move without one … all this stuff that … we're indifferent … is nonsense. We're very focused on getting a UN resolution …
> "… you damage the UN if the UN inspectors say he is not co-operating, he's in breach, and the world does nothing about it. But I don't believe that will happen …"

687. Mr Blair reiterated his arguments that the world had to take a stand to disarm Iraq so as to send a message to other countries that were potentially developing weapons of mass destruction that they had to take the international community seriously. Delay would make it more difficult to deal with the issue: in his view it was "only a matter of time before international terrorism and these types of weapons come together".

688. Asked what was the most important item on the agenda for his meeting with President Bush, Mr Blair replied:

> "To agree the right strategy for the future and to … explain … yet again why it is important to deal with this issue."

689. Mr Blair concluded in relation to Iraq that:

> "… when America is taking on these tough and difficult questions our job is to be there. Not be there at any price, not be there without saying how we think the thing should be dealt with, but being there in the difficult and tricky times, not simply … as fair weather friends."

690. Mr Scarlett and SIS1 provided material for use during the interview. This is addressed in Section 4.3.

691. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that the UK problem was that President Bush "seemed hell-bent on war and we looked like we were doing things from a US not UK perspective".[238]

692. Mr Campbell added on 27 January: "Despite yesterday people were still applying the yardstick that the inspectors would have to find WMD rather than simply that Saddam had to co-operate."[239]

693. Mr Vladimir Putin, the Russian President, told Mr Blair on 27 January that inspections needed more time.

694. President Putin contacted Mr Blair on 27 January to discuss the differences in the international community's approach to North Korea and Iraq.[240] On the former, the strategy was to pursue a negotiation, including contacts between the US and North Korea. Mr Blair agreed to discuss that with President Bush, and that:

> "We need to bind the North Koreans into an agreement that preserved their dignity while ensuring that they could not develop their weapons."

[240] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 27 January 2003, 'North Korea and Iraq: Prime Minister's Phone Call with Putin, 27 January'.

695. On Iraq, President Putin's view was that the purpose of the military build up was to put pressure on Iraq, not a preparation for war. Russia was doing the same through diplomatic means and had managed to ensure that the Iraqis gave permission for scientists to go abroad to be interviewed and searches of private homes. UNMOVIC and the IAEA had some questions, but they were procedural, there were no complaints that Iraq was interfering with the inspections. The inspectors should be allowed to continue their work. He trusted the inspectors and they should be given more time.

696. Mr Blair agreed that the inspectors should have time to do their job, but it was "crucial" that it "did not become a game of hide and seek". Iraq had to help the inspectors; Saddam Hussein was obliged to give them positive co-operation, not just access. He would discuss the issues with President Bush and then speak to President Putin again.

697. President Putin emphasised that it was a very important conversation and concluded that Saddam Hussein should comply with all his obligations and the inspectors' requests; he must accommodate our demands. Moscow was not interested in covering for Iraq if it had weapons or was seeking to acquire them. If Iraq had any weapons, they must destroy them and comply with the inspectors.

698. Mr Campbell wrote that the call was "encouraging"; President Putin was "really losing patience with Saddam".[241]

699. In an interview before the reports to the Security Council on 27 January, Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, told Al Jazeera that he strongly doubted that the Council would authorise military action against Iraq: "the chances … are practically nil".[242]

Security Council, 27 January 2003

700. Dr Blix reported to the Security Council on 27 January that Iraq appeared to have decided in principle to co-operate on process, but an Iraqi decision to co-operate on substance would be "indispensible" for the inspectors to complete their tasks.

701. Iraq's declaration of 7 December did not provide new evidence which would eliminate or reduce the unresolved issues identified in 1999.

702. In his report to the Security Council on 27 January, Dr Blix rehearsed the disarmament process since 1991 and identified three "important questions" for the Security Council:

- "[H]ow much [prohibited material and activity] might remain undeclared and intact from before 1991"?
- "[W]hat, if anything, was illegally produced or procured after 1998, when the inspectors left"?
- How to prevent "any weapons of mass destruction be[ing] produced or procured in the future"?[243]

703. Dr Blix reported on UNMOVIC's activities and gave an assessment of the extent of Iraq's co-operation with those activities, including its declaration of 7 December 2002.

704. Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC shared "the sense of urgency felt by the [Security] Council to use inspection as a path to attain, within a reasonable time verifiable disarmament of Iraq". UNMOVIC's capability was "growing". It had 260 staff members of whom 100 were inspectors. It had conducted about 300 inspections at more than 230 sites, of which 20 were sites which had not been inspected before. A training programme in Vienna would create a pool of 350 qualified experts from which inspectors could be drawn.

705. Dr Blix reported: "It would appear from our experience so far that Iraq has decided in principle to provide co-operation on process, namely access." Iraq had "on the whole co-operated rather well so far … access has been provided to all sites that we wanted to inspect and with one exception it has been prompt". There had, however, been "some problems" in two areas: Iraq's refusal to guarantee the safety of U2 flights to provide aerial imagery and for surveillance during inspections; and helicopter operations, although that had been "solved". There had also been "some recent disturbing incidents and harassment".

706. Dr Blix stated that an Iraqi decision to provide co-operation on substance was "indispensible" to bring "the disarmament task to completion". OP9 of resolution 1441 required Iraqi co-operation to be "active". It was "not enough to open doors". Inspection was "not a game of 'catch as catch can'. Rather … it is a process of verification for the purpose of creating confidence."

707. Dr Blix reported: "In the fields of missiles and biotechnology, Iraq's declaration contains a good deal of new material and information covering the period from 1998 and onward. This is welcome."

---

[243] UN Press Release, 27 January 2003, Security Council briefed by Chief UN Weapons Experts on First 60 days of Inspections in Iraq (SC/7644).

708. But Dr Blix stated:

> "One might have expected … that Iraq might have tried to respond to, clarify and submit supporting evidence regarding the many open disarmament issues, which the Iraqi side should be familiar with from the UNSCOM document S/1999/94 of January 1999 and the so-called Amorim Report of March 1999 … These are the questions which UNMOVIC, governments and independent commentators have often cited."

709. UNMOVIC had found "the issues listed in those two documents as unresolved, professionally justified". The reports pointed to:

> "… lack of evidence and inconsistencies … which must be straightened out, if weapons dossiers are to be closed … They deserve to be taken seriously by Iraq rather than being brushed aside as evil machinations of UNSCOM. Regrettably, the … declaration, most of which is a reprint of earlier documents, does not seem to contain any new evidence that would eliminate the questions or reduce their number."

710. Dr Blix set out examples of questions and issues that needed to be addressed in some detail, including:

- UNMOVIC had information indicating that Iraq had worked on purifying and stabilising the nerve agent VX, and had achieved more than it had declared. This conflicted with the Iraqi account that the agent had only been produced on a pilot scale, had been destroyed in 1991, and was never weaponised. There were also questions to be answered about the fate of VX precursor chemicals.
- Iraq had provided a copy of the "Air Force" document it had withheld in 1998. It indicated that 13,000 chemical bombs were dropped by the Iraqi Air Force between 1983 and 1988. Iraq had claimed that 19,500 bombs were consumed during that period. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, UNMOVIC "must assume these quantities are now unaccounted for".
- The discovery of "a number of 122mm chemical rocket warheads in a bunker at a storage depot southwest of Baghdad". The bunker was relatively new, which meant "the rockets must have been moved there in the past few years, at a time when Iraq should not have had such munitions". Iraq had stated that they were "overlooked from 1991 from a batch of 2,000 that were stored there during the Gulf War. That could be the case. They could also be the tip of a submerged iceberg. The discovery of a few rockets does not resolve, but rather points to, the issue of several thousands of chemical rockets that are unaccounted for." Iraq had subsequently found four more chemical rockets at a storage depot in al-Taji. The warheads were "empty".
- Inspectors had found "a laboratory quantity of thiodiglycal, a mustard gas precursor".

- There were "strong indications that Iraq produced more anthrax than it declared, and that at least some of this was retained after the declared destruction date. It might still exist."
- Iraq had not declared "a significant quantity of bacterial growth media" which had been included in Iraq's submission to the Amorim panel. This omission appeared "to be deliberate as the pages of the resubmitted document were renumbered". The quantity of growth media involved would "suffice to produce … about 5,000 litres of concentrated anthrax".
- The Al Samoud 2 and Al Fatah missiles "might well represent prima facie cases of proscribed systems" but further technical consideration would be necessary before reaching a conclusion on the issue.
- Iraq had refurbished its missile production infrastructure, including a number of casting chambers which were capable of producing motors for missiles with ranges greater than the 150km limit.
- Iraq had illegally imported 300 rocket engines which might be for the Al Samoud 2, chemicals used in propellants and other potentially proscribed items.

711. Dr Blix questioned Iraq's claims that there were no more documents about its activities. After the discovery of documents in the home of a scientist "relating to the laser enrichment of uranium", UNMOVIC could not "help but think that the case might not be isolated and that such placements of documents is deliberate to make discovery difficult". He warned that: "Any further sign of the concealment of documents would be serious."

712. Dr Blix also questioned whether Iraq had provided a complete list of the names of personnel who had worked on proscribed programmes, and pointed out the difficulties of interviewing individuals "in private". He reported that UNMOVIC had asked 11 individuals for interview in Baghdad and that none of them would speak without the presence of an Iraqi official.

713. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had found no evidence that Iraq had revived its nuclear weapons programme but it was still investigating a number of issues and Iraq needed to shift from passive to pro-active support.

714. Dr ElBaradei called for a few months to verify Iraq's nuclear disarmament and to demonstrate that the inspection process worked as a central feature of the international nuclear arms control regime.

715. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had conducted 139 inspections at some 106 locations, with a "focus on areas of concern identified by other States, facilities identified through satellite imagery as having been modified or constructed since 1998, and other inspection leads identified independently".[244] They had been able to "gain ready access and to clarify the nature of the activities" at those facilities. "No prohibited nuclear activities" had been identified.

716. Dr ElBaradei described the Iraqi declaration as "consistent with our understanding of Iraq's pre-1991 nuclear programme". Iraq had not provided "any new information relevant to … questions which had been outstanding since 1998". While those questions did "not constitute unresolved disarmament issues", further clarification was needed.

717. The IAEA had been conducting "exhaustive analysis of supporting information". Dr ElBaradei also reported difficulties in securing private interviews with the three individuals the IAEA had approached.

718. Iraq's unsuccessful attempts to procure high-strength aluminium tubes which Iraq had indicated were related to a programme to reverse engineer conventional rockets, had been a particular focus. The IAEA had concluded that the tubes "would be consistent with" use in a conventional rocket programme. They "would not be suitable for manufacturing centrifuges" without modification. The IAEA was "still investigating" the issue, but the attempt to acquire such tubes was "prohibited" by resolution 687 (1991).

719. The IAEA was investigating how "dual-use" material had been relocated or used, including the "HMX" high explosive which had been removed from IAEA seals at the end of 1998. Dr ElBaradei stated that it would be difficult to verify how that had been used.

720. The IAEA was investigating reports of Iraqi efforts to import uranium but it did "not have enough information, and … would appreciate more".

721. Dr ElBaradei stated that the IAEA had "begun in the last few weeks to receive more actionable information from States", and he called on those that "had access to such information to provide it … so that the inspection process can be accelerated and additional assurances generated".

722. Dr ElBaradei emphasised the need for Iraq to "shift from passive support … to pro-active support". He cited as an example the retrieval of documents relating, "in part, to Iraq's pre-1991 efforts to use laser technology for enriching uranium". It was "urgent and essential" for Iraq "on its own initiative, to identify and provide any additional evidence that would assist the inspectors in carrying out their mandate".

723. Dr ElBaradei warned that there was:

> "… a window of opportunity that may not remain open for very much longer. Iraq should make every effort to be fully transparent … The international community will not be satisfied when questions remain open … the world is asking for a high level of assurance that Iraq is completely free from all such weapons, and is already impatient to receive it."

724. Dr ElBaradei stated that the presence of international inspectors in Iraq "continues to serve as an effective deterrent to and insurance against resumption of programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction, even as we continue to look for possible past activities".

725. Dr ElBaradei concluded:

> "… we have to date found no evidence that Iraq has revived its nuclear weapons programme since the elimination of the programme in the 1990s … [O]ur work is steadily progressing and should be allowed to run its natural course … [W]e should be able within the next few months to provide credible assurance that Iraq has no nuclear weapons programme. These few months … would be a valuable investment in peace because they could help us avoid a war. We trust that we will continue to have the support of the Council … to verify Iraq's nuclear disarmament through peaceful means and to demonstrate that the inspection process can and does work as a central feature of the international nuclear arms control regime."

726. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that, in subsequent informal consultations of the Council, there was general scepticism that Iraq had "co-operated adequately", but also a desire for more time.[245]

727. Sir Jeremy reported that Ambassador Negroponte had delivered a pre-prepared statement saying that there was nothing in either Dr Blix or Dr ElBaradei's reports which gave hope that Iraq ever intended to comply with resolution 1441 and that the time was fast approaching when the Security Council would have to demonstrate it meant what it had said.

728. Sir Jeremy stated that the Council had heard "a catalogue of unresolved questions". The "onus was on Iraq to prove the zero it had declared" and to provide "substantive evidence". Iraqi co-operation had been "limited and grudging" and looked like "a carefully considered policy of withholding information and obstruction". UNMOVIC and the IAEA needed to conduct more intrusive inspections and "carry out more productive interviews to unravel the facts".

729. At a later meeting, Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had provided answers to specific points raised in the informal discussion, including:

- Dr Blix had complained about the number of Iraqi minders for inspections.
- There had been demonstrations during inspections but UNMOVIC had not been intimidated.
- Dr Blix felt that there was a determination at a high level to co-operate on process but "on substance, Iraq simply said the outstanding questions were nonsensical". Unless that changed, he was "not optimistic of solutions".

---

[245] Telegram 152 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 28 January 2003, 'Iraq: Informal Consultations to Consider Blix and El-Baradei Reports'.

- Dr Blix said that interviews with minders were not "without value", but "a long pattern of refusals to attend private interviews would be hard to interpret as anything other than intimidation".
- Denial of access to a private house would be a serious matter.
- Dr ElBaradei said that the documents found at a private home "looked like a scientist's personal collection of papers over 30 years". They had "not added to IAEA knowledge and it was impossible to judge whether this was an example of hidden documents".
- The IAEA had no authority to force people to give interviews.

730. Sir Jeremy commented that the day had been important and a good foundation for "a harder debate on 29 January". He concluded:

> "If we play this carefully, and can win a bit more time, we might be able to construct a bit more of an edifice."

731. In a press statement on 28 January, Mr Straw published "a list of 10 key questions" from Dr Blix's report.[246] Mr Straw also stated:

> "The conclusion is now inescapable that Iraq is in material breach of resolution 1441. We want to see the matter resolved … by peaceful means … The regime does not have long to change its behaviour fundamentally. We cannot let Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi regime get away with never-ending deceit and delay."

732. Russia emphasised the need for political efforts through the Security Council to disarm Iraq.

733. In a press conference in New York after the meeting, Mr Sergei Lavrov, Russian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Russia believed the inspections were "going well" and a spokesman for the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Moscow stated: "only inspections can give an answer to the international community's question about whether Iraq has weapons of mass destruction".[247] Mr Igor Ivanov told US NBC that Russian diplomats would try to find a solution which would preserve the Security Council's unity.

734. Sir Roderic Lyne, British Ambassador to Russia, reported that all Russian officials were playing down the significance of the reports to the Security Council, "emphasising that they were only preliminary findings". Russia was keeping its options open on future handling of the issue "while calling for the inspections to continue".

[247] Telegram 28 Moscow to FCO London, 28 January 2003, 'Russia/Iraq: Russian Response to UNSC Reports'.

735. During a visit to Kiev on 28 January, President Putin stated that international security was "a more important issue than Iraq" and that any steps on the Iraqi problem must be taken through the Security Council. Iraq was co-operating so far but:

> "… if Iraq begins to create problems for the inspectors, Russia can change its position and reach an agreement with the US on developing different, tougher decisions in the Security Council."[248]

736. In a separate statement, Mr Igor Ivanov stressed that inspections must continue, but that Iraq must co-operate actively, giving the inspectors "every possible assistance". There were "a lot of unclear questions" remaining about chemical and biological weapons. He criticised Iraqi officials who had stated that Iraq might attack Kuwait in the event of a war. That did not promote "the necessary conditions for continuing political efforts to settle the Iraq situation". Russia was firmly opposed to military action both against Iraq and from its territory. Unilateral action against Iraq would split the anti-terrorist coalition. Russia would direct its efforts to "thinking how to avoid a veto" and finding a solution that would preserve the important unity of the Security Council. If Iraq committed "flagrant violations" of resolution 1441, the Security Council should consider "the possibility of additional steps" to meet the requirements of the resolution.

737. Sir Roderic Lyne commented that the two statements "seemed to mark a shift in Russian rhetoric on Iraq".

President Bush's State of the Union address, 28 January 2003

738. In his State of the Union address on 28 January, President Bush set out his view that Iraq's actions demonstrated it had decided not to take the final chance to disarm. Saddam Hussein had shown "utter contempt" for that offer; he was deceiving the international community, not disarming. The US would not wait to act until the threat from Iraq was imminent.

739. President Bush announced that the US had asked for a meeting of the Security Council on 5 February at which Secretary Powell would present information and intelligence on Iraq's illegal programmes.

740. In his "State of the Union" address on 28 January, President Bush emphasised the threat of terrorism to the US and others, the potential threat from Iraq in that context, and the need to disarm Iraq.[249]

741. President Bush's detailed statements about the threat posed by Iraq are set out in the Box below.

---

[248] Telegram 32 Moscow to FCO London, 29 January 2003, 'Russia/Iraq: Putin/Ivanov Statements'.
[249] The White House Press Release, 28 January 2003, President Delivers "State of the Union".

Extracts from President Bush's State of the Union address, 28 January 2003

President Bush stated:

> "Today, the gravest danger in the war on terror, the gravest danger facing America and the world, is outlawed regimes that seek and possess nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. These regimes could use such weapons for blackmail, terror, and mass murder. They could also give or sell those weapons to terrorist allies, who would use them without the least hesitation.
>
> "This threat is new; America's duty is familiar …
>
> "America is making a broad and determined effort to confront these dangers …
>
> "Different threats require different strategies …
> "Our nation and the world must learn the lessons of the Korean peninsula and not allow an even greater threat to rise up in Iraq. A brutal dictator with a history of reckless aggression, with ties to terrorism, with great potential wealth, will not be permitted to dominate a vital region and threaten the United States.
> "Twelve years ago, Saddam Hussein … agreed to disarm … For the next 12 years, he systematically violated that agreement. He pursued chemical, biological and nuclear weapons … Nothing to date has restrained him from his pursuit of these weapons – not economic sanctions, not isolation from the civilized world, not even cruise missiles strikes on his military facilities.
>
> "… the United Nations Security Council gave Saddam Hussein his final chance to disarm. He has shown instead utter contempt … The … UN inspectors … were not sent to conduct a scavenger hunt for hidden materials … The job of the inspectors is to verify that Iraq's regime is disarming. It is up to Iraq to show exactly where it is hiding his banned weapons, lay those weapons out for the world to see, and destroy them as directed. Nothing like this has happened.
> "The United Nations concluded in 1999 that Saddam Hussein had biological weapons sufficient to produce over 25,000 litres of anthrax – enough doses to kill several million people. He hasn't accounted for that material. He has given no evidence that he has destroyed it.
>
> "The United Nations concluded that Saddam Hussein had material sufficient to produce more than 38,000 litres of botulinum toxin …
>
> "Our intelligence officials estimate that Saddam Hussein had the materials to produce as much as 500 tonnes of sarin, mustard and VX nerve agent …
>
> "US intelligence indicates that Saddam Hussein had upwards of 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical agents. Inspectors recently turned up 16 of them – despite Iraq's recent declaration denying their existence …
> "From three Iraqi defectors we know that Iraq, in the late 1990s, had several mobile biological weapons labs …

"The International Atomic Energy Agency confirmed in the 1990s that Saddam Hussein had an advanced nuclear weapons development program … The British Government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa. Our intelligence sources tell us that he has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminium tubes suitable for nuclear weapons production. Saddam Hussein has not credibly explained these activities. He clearly has much to hide.

"The dictator of Iraq is not disarming. To the contrary; he is deceiving. From intelligence sources we know, for instance, that thousands of Iraqi security personnel are at work hiding documents and materials from the UN inspectors, sanitising inspection sites and monitoring the inspectors themselves. Iraqi officials accompany inspectors in order to intimidate witnesses.

"Iraq is blocking U2 surveillance flights … Iraqi intelligence officers are posing as the scientists inspectors are supposed to interview. Real scientists have been coached by Iraqi officials on what to say. Intelligence sources indicate that Saddam Hussein has ordered scientists who co-operate with UN inspectors … will be killed, along with their families.

"Year after year, Saddam has gone to elaborate lengths, spent enormous sums, taken great risks to build and keep weapons of mass destruction … The only possible explanation, the only possible use … is to dominate, intimidate or attack.

"With nuclear arms or a full arsenal of chemical and biological weapons, Saddam Hussein could resume his ambitions of conquest in the Middle East and create deadly havoc in that region. And this Congress and the America[n] people must recognise another threat. Evidence from intelligence sources, secret communications, and statements by people now in custody reveal that Saddam Hussein aids and protects terrorists, including members of Al Qaida. Secretly, and without fingerprints, he could provide one of his hidden weapons to terrorists, or help them develop their own.

"Before September the 11th, many in the world believed that Saddam Hussein could be contained. But chemical agents, lethal viruses and shadowy terrorist networks are not easily contained. Imagine those 19 hijackers … armed by Saddam Hussein …

"Some have said we must not act until the threat is imminent … If this threat is permitted to fully and suddenly emerge, all actions or words, or recriminations would come too late. Trusting in the sanity and restraint of Saddam Hussein is not a strategy, and it is not an option.

"The dictator who is assembling the world's most dangerous weapons has already used them … International human rights groups have catalogued other methods used in the torture chambers of Iraq …

"… tonight I have a message for the brave and oppressed people of Iraq: your enemy is not surrounding your country – your enemy is ruling your country. And the day he and his regime are removed from power will be the day of your liberation.

"The world has waited 12 years for Iraq to disarm. America will not accept a serious and mounting threat to our country …

> "We will consult. But let there be no misunderstanding: if Saddam Hussein does not fully disarm, for the safety of our people and for the peace of the world, we will lead a coalition to disarm him."

742. President Bush also announced that the US would ask the UN Security Council to convene on 5 February to "consider the facts of Iraq's ongoing defiance"; and that Secretary Powell would "present information and intelligence about Iraq's … illegal weapons programs, its attempt to hide those weapons from inspectors, and its links to terrorist groups".

Security Council, 29 January 2003

743. Sir Jeremy Greenstock continued to advise that there was little support in the Security Council for a second resolution.

744. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that only four countries definitely supported a second resolution and that:

> "Things will not move in our direction without some fact or development to give countries the grounds on which to change position, or at least give us more time to … confirm the conclusion that Iraq will not co-operate."[250]

745. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Security Council on 29 January that Iraq was in material breach of resolution 1441 and the Council could not "simply tread water". It would have to "take tough decisions soon".

746. On 29 January, the Security Council met for a second time to discuss the reports delivered by Dr Blix and Dr Elbaradei on 27 January.[251]

747. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the discussion was "a replay of earlier positions", and that "Almost every delegation" had welcomed Secretary Powell's intention to "provide evidence" on 5 February. Most delegations saw the presentation as "feeding in to the inspections process".

748. Sir Jeremy told the Council that, in asking for more time, there was a need to be realistic: "Time would not achieve anything without the co-operation we expected." Iraq had: not given "access to its illegal WMD programmes"; "allowed omissions in the declaration"; and "failed to co-operate". "The inescapable conclusion was Iraq was in material breach of [resolution] 1441."

[251] Telegram 167 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: 29 January Security Council Discussion'.

749. Sir Jeremy said that he was sure others shared the frustration that Iraq was not taking the final opportunity. It was "still not too late – but Iraq had to co-operate now. If it did not, there was no way the inspectors would be able to fulfil their mandate."

750. Sir Jeremy asked a series of questions about how, if the difficulties experienced were a reflection of planned Iraqi resistance, more time would resolve the issues. He added that the Council:

> "… had to realise that it was up against a serious decision under a tight timescale. More time would not help … [W]e had to stay together in insisting the non-compliance had to stop or the Council would no longer be in charge of this process through inspections …"

751. Sir Jeremy reported that he had hammered home that the Council could not "simply tread water" and would have to "take tough decisions soon".

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, 31 January 2003

The US position

752. Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove reiterated the UK's concerns in talks in Washington on 29 January, including a request to delay military action until the end of March.

753. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that he thought the US accepted that a second resolution would be needed, but there was no "agreement to wait until the end of March".

754. Sir Christopher Meyer advised that President Bush would be "pretty implacable" and "impatient", and that he was convinced that the critics of military action would be routed by an early and easy military victory.

755. Reflecting previous difficulties, Sir David Manning and Sir Christopher Meyer both advised Mr Blair that he would need to spell out his message to President Bush in a way which left no scope for "interpretation" in Washington.

756. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice on 27 January about the UK's need for Parliamentary support for military action; and that the only way to get that support would be a second resolution.[252] That would need a delay until the end of March.

757. Sir David did not get the response he had wished. He advised Mr Blair that he would need to speak to President Bush again before their meeting in the US on 31 January.

---

[252] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 27 January 2003, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

758. Sir David Manning visited Washington on 29 January for talks with Dr Rice.[253] He was accompanied by Sir Richard Dearlove.

759. Sir David Manning reiterated many of the points he had made in previous conversations with Dr Rice.

760. Sir David reported that he had informed Dr Rice that, without a second resolution, Mr Blair would not be able to secure Cabinet and Parliamentary support for military action; and that he could be forced from office if he tried: "The US must not promote regime change in Baghdad at the price of regime change in London." Mr Blair was not asking for much time: "weeks not months" and action beginning at the end of March.

761. Sir David reported that the UK was significantly less optimistic than the US about the current level of support for a second resolution authorising military action and the prospects for increasing that support. The UK was anxious not to give the impression that inspections were running out of time; that was needed for more reports from Dr Blix which would carry much more weight internationally than the US and UK view. Mr Blair was in a very different position from President Bush, who already had Congressional authority to act.

762. Sir Richard Dearlove had "briefed in detail on our intelligence" which the US Administration "clearly find very impressive".

763. Sir David had "spelt out the political realities about Iraq extremely bluntly". He thought that the US had accepted a second resolution would be needed but there was no agreement to wait until the end of March. Mr Blair would need to "stick very strongly to the arguments in your Note" and to "spell them out in a way that leaves no scope for … 'interpretation'". A late March date would mean a pretty intensive timetable. He suggested that one possibility would be to review the position again after Dr Blix's next report in mid-February.

764. The minute was sent only to addressees inside No.10 with a private and personal copy sent to Mr Straw.

765. Reporting on the mood in Washington for Mr Blair's visit, Sir Christopher Meyer advised:

> "It is politically impossible for Bush to back down from going to war in Iraq this spring, absent Saddam's surrender or disappearance from the scene. If Bush had any room for manoeuvre beforehand, this was closed off by his State of the Union speech …

---

[253] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 30 January 2003, 'Talks with Condi Rice in Washington on 29 January'.

"… Bush … said in effect that destroying Saddam is a crusade against evil to be undertaken by God's chosen nation: 'this call of history has come to the right people'.

"The target of Bush's messianic appeal was … the anxious and unconvinced in the country at large … The call to rally to the flag, the President and to the military should, on past precedent, evoke an emotional and positive response …

"… The novel element was the promise that Powell would produce fresh evidence of collaboration between Saddam and Al Qaida. For the White House, the key to the questions 'Why Iraq, why now?' has always been the rogue state/WMD/terrorism nexus: not as a worrying possibility in future years, but as a clear and present danger.

"… if Powell goes off at half-cock, it will only reinforce, as Jeremy Greenstock has underlined already, the view that the US is hell-bent on war and short-circuiting SCR 1441.

"The Prime Minister will find on Friday a pretty implacable Bush: impatient, deeply disillusioned with France and Germany, convinced that his – and Mr Blair's – critics will be routed by an early and easy military victory. He is very much influenced by … [the fact] that in the past the US has failed to respond forcibly to multiple provocation and attacks to the detriment of its reputation and standing. This time the US could not back off.

"Unless we have some good ideas for sending Saddam into exile, Mr Blair's task on Friday will be to ensure that we and the US go to war in the best company possible. That means securing the time to assemble the largest possible coalition both for the war itself and for the aftermath. If the notorious smoking gun can be found, this will make things much easier …

"Bush does not look to have the patience to let Blix make the case. I said in an earlier report that exhausting the UN route was likely to mean different things in Washington and London. Bush is undecided about a second resolution: whether it will be worth going for and, if it is, what should be put in it. In other words – as of this morning – Bush has not yet bought into the strategy which the Prime Minister put to him last week."[254]

766. Reflecting the difficulties which had arisen from ambiguity about the messages Mr Blair had given President Bush during their meeting at Camp David in early September 2002, Sir Christopher concluded:

"There are huge expectations here of Friday's meeting and the press are watching like vultures for splits. The Prime Minister will obviously want to reach full agreement with the President on the way ahead in the next few weeks. Unless something changes in the next 48 hours, that will require pressing back very forcefully to secure our interest, on another resolution and timelines. The subsequent agreement will have to be clear beyond doubt in its particulars. After the last Camp David meeting, the hawks immediately started to distort the outcome to their own ends."

[254] Telegram 131 Washington to FCO London, 29 January 2003, 'Iraq: PM's Visit'.

Other views

767. Mr Blair decided to canvass the views of his European colleagues and other allies in advance of the meeting with President Bush on 31 January.

768. A joint statement issued by the UK and seven other European nations on 30 January stated that the international community should remain united in calling for the disarmament of Iraq and that the Security Council should face up to its responsibilities.

769. The leaders of eight European nations – Spain, Portugal, Italy, the UK, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland and Denmark – produced a joint article published on 30 January arguing that Europe and the USA must stand united.[255]

770. The statement set out the importance of the relationship between Europe and America and argued that:

"The transatlantic relationship must not become a casualty of the current Iraqi regime's persistent attempts to threaten world security …

"… success in the … battle against terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction demands unwavering determination and firm international cohesion on the part of all countries for whom freedom is precious.

"The Iraqi regime and its weapons of mass destruction represent a clear threat to world security."

771. The adoption of resolution 1441 had:

"… sent a clear, firm and unequivocal message that we would rid the world of the danger posed by Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction.

"We must remain united in insisting that his regime is disarmed.

"The solidarity, cohesion and determination of the international community are our best hope of achieving this peacefully. Our strength lies in unity.

"The combination of weapons of mass destruction and terrorism is a threat of incalculable consequences.

772. Mr Blair decided to speak to a number of his colleagues to establish their views, particularly about the circumstances in which they would support military action, before his meeting with President Bush.[256] Mr Blair also planned to speak to them again after the visit.

773. Sir Stephen Wall, the Prime Minister's Adviser on European Issues, was also asked to speak to a number of his European counterparts.[257]

774. Mr Blair and Mr John Howard, the Prime Minister of Australia, discussed the position on Iraq on 28 January. Mr Blair said that, militarily, it might "be preferable to proceed quickly", but it "would be politically easier with a UN resolution". He:

> "… intended to tell President Bush that the UN track was working. Blix had said … that Saddam was not co-operating. If he repeated this in reports on 14 February, and perhaps in early March there would be a strong pattern on non-co-operation and a good chance of a second resolution."[258]

775. Mr Blair and Mr Howard agreed that a second resolution would be "enormously helpful". It would be better to try and fail than not to try at all for a second resolution but they should "pencil in a deadline beyond which, even without a second resolution, we should take a decision". Mr Blair said that his instinct was that "in the end, France would come on board, as would Russia and China".

776. President Chirac told Mr Blair that he would not support war unless Saddam Hussein did something unacceptable.

777. In a conversation later on 28 January, President Chirac told Mr Blair that the French position had not changed; they were "against war, unless Saddam did something unacceptable".[259] Although Dr Blix had reported that Iraq was not co-operating, Dr ElBaradei had reported good co-operation. War was "always the worst outcome". Iraq had very little WMD compared with North Korea. The desire to preserve the transatlantic link had to be balanced against the costs of a war.

778. Mr Blair and President Chirac agreed that the inspectors should be given more time. President Chirac thought that the inspectors would find nothing; Mr Blair said it would be "serious if the inspectors continued to report insufficient co-operation, e.g. if the Iraqis refused interviews or denied proper access". They agreed that, "in that case, a second resolution would come into play".

779. President Chirac welcomed Mr Blair's offer to speak again after his meeting with President Bush.

780. Mr Rycroft commented that President Chirac appeared:

> "… to be positioning himself to support a second resolution if the inspectors find WMD or are denied access. But his straight 'non' to the Prime Minster's question about continued Iraqi non-co-operation shows the problem we shall have with the French if we are in the scenario of arguing that a pattern of non-co-operation is a material breach of 1441."

781. A minute from Sir David Manning to Mr Blair records that President Chirac had refused to accept a phone call from Mr Blair for the preceding two weeks.[260]

782. Mr de Villepin spoke twice to Mr Straw on 29 January.

783. In the first conversation, Mr de Villepin questioned why military action should be used against Iraq when 20-30 other countries had chemical weapons. It was hard to explain the threat posed by Iraq when there was almost no risk from the nuclear programme.[261]

784. Mr Straw's response focused on the process in resolution 1441 agreed by the UK and France. In his view, there were "two key questions":

> "… was there a material breach and what action should the international community take. Blix's report had shown that Iraq was in material breach according to the definition set out in OP4. There had been plenty of material breaches in the past which had not led to military action. But, as UNSCR 1441 set out, if there were a further material breach then Iraq would face serious consequences. This could only mean military action."

785. Mr de Villepin responded that, as politicians, he and Mr Straw had to show how military action corresponded to the threat. The issue of material breach had to be faced.

786. Mr Straw countered that "just because the international community was not taking action against other states was not an argument for inaction against Iraq"; and taking action against Iraq "would be a deterrent to other countries". In his view it would be "possible to avoid military action only if the international community remained united in telling Iraq to comply".

787. In the second conversation, Mr de Villepin expressed surprise about the joint article signed by eight European Prime Ministers which Mr Blair had not mentioned to President Chirac.[262]

788. Mr Straw told Mr de Villepin that at the time resolution 1441 was agreed, "everyone knew that a further material breach would trigger a meeting of the Security Council". Mr de Villepin did not agree with Mr Straw's view that Iraq "had committed a further material breach". Mr Straw argued that resolution 1441 had:

"… agreed a 60-day inspection period. Blix had then reported. There would be further discussions in the Security Council. If Iraq changed its behaviour, then good. If not, military action would become inevitable …"

789. Mr de Villepin had stated that France would never be placed in a position where it would agree to a second resolution simply as window dressing for military action; it wanted time to allow the build-up of pressure to work. The US timeframe was too short.

790. Mr Straw said:

"… the more the inspectors found a pattern of non-compliance, the greater the suspicion surrounding Saddam's WMD …

"It would be terrible if, in the case of a clear further material breach, the international community did nothing. It was in no one's interest to see the US act unilaterally. That would mean the international community losing influence over US actions."

791. When Mr Straw asked whether France would consider using its veto, Mr de Villepin "ducked the question".

792. Sir Roderic Lyne advised that Russia would vote in favour of a second resolution in response to a "smoking gun"; but that it might support or abstain on a resolution based on reports of non-co-operation.

793. In a telegram on 30 January, Sir Roderic Lyne advised that Russia was "not nearly as steamed up about Iraq" as France and Germany.[263] President Putin's attitude was "based on a pragmatic assessment of Russia's interests – which means avoiding war if possible, but more importantly not falling out with the Americans and avoiding marginalisation at the UN". Russia was "not talking veto language" and President Putin's remarks were beginning "to prepare public opinion for a vote in favour [of a second resolution]".

794. Sir Roderic wrote that Russia was "in the 'most opposed' group in the Security Council" but Moscow was "not signalling real determination to make difficulties or hold out to the end – rather the opposite". The mood was "a mixture of pragmatism and sullen acquiescence in a presumed outcome".

795. The evidence for those conclusions set out by Sir Roderic included:

- The official Russian line before the reports to the Security Council, about the need for more time and that military action would not be justified, was "ritualistic, carefully moderated and designed not to box Russia in (nor to whip up public emotions)". President Putin's remarks in Kiev had "changed the tune sharply". Mr Igor Ivanov had "swung into line".
- President Putin had told Mr Blair "two years ago that he would not regret the passing of Saddam Hussein", and he had not "pressed hard" since resolution 1441.
- "THE FRANCO-RUSSIAN SYMPHONY" wasn't playing: "Before 1441, Chirac and Villepin were burning up the phone lines to Moscow, and Lavrov and Levitte [Mr Jean-David Levitte, French Permanent Representative to the UN] were (for a while) in bed together in New York. It feels different this time." That was partly because "the Russians thought the French welshed on them in the 1441 end game". The larger point was that President Putin knew that Iraq was the "litmus test" for his strategic relationship with President Bush. President Putin's visit to France and Germany from 9-11 February might "well create the impression of a common front, but under the surface it isn't so".
- "Almost no one" in Russia wanted to see a war in Iraq. The "Russian body politic" was "acutely uncomfortable with US hyperpower and Russian impotence" but there was "less heat" about Iraq than "in France, Germany or Western Europe in general". No one was forecasting that President Putin would "break with the Americans".

---

[263] Telegram 33 Moscow to FCO London, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: Which Way Will Russia Jump?'

- "Keeping the oil price high (though not extreme) and avoiding a post-conflict collapse" was a key Russian interest.
- Russia was "not trying any" political initiatives. It seemed to have "put some pressure" on Iraq, but relations were "not warm".

796. Sir Roderic advised that Russia would:

> "… tuck in behind the French and Germans in the Security Council, with the Chinese, but not lead the pack. They'll support more time for inspections, calls for proof positive, and ploys to get Saddam to concede or step down.
>
> "They will not veto in isolation; probably not veto in Chinese company alone; and in general will do all they can to avoid vetoing. They would rather let through (perhaps on abstention) a distasteful second UNSCR than see the Americans go unilaterally and sideline the Security Council. They would vote in favour of a 'smoking gun' resolution and in favour or abstain (depending on the French vote) on a resolution based on reports from Blix of non-co-operation.
>
> "… It would be awkward but not completely impossible for Putin domestically to be more US-friendly in a vote than … [Germany or France].
> "… If the US goes unilateral, the Russians will make a decent show of grumbling … but they won't be actively obstructive."

797. Sir Roderic concluded that the UK approach should be: "More of the same." The UK "should help the Americans to keep the Russians engaged, including on day after issues". This meant continuing conversations with Russians, including with President Putin and Mr Igor Ivanov. The "bottom line" was that President Putin would not want:

> "… to lose the chips he's staked on Bush. Iraq versus the USA is a no brainer. (Nor does Putin wish to part company with us, in the run-up to his State Visit.)"

798. Mr Straw told Mr Igor Ivanov that the question of a material breach was for the Security Council or individual members. He accepted that resolution 1441 had not set a timetable for inspections.

799. The record of Mr Igor Ivanov's telephone call to Mr Straw on the afternoon of 30 January reported that Mr Ivanov had said it was necessary to address the problems identified in Dr Blix's report, but he saw no problems which could not be resolved by negotiations.[264]

---

[264] Telegram 19 FCO London to Moscow, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conversation with Russian Foreign Minister, 30 January'.

800. Mr Straw agreed that most problems in Dr Blix's report:

> "… could be resolved if Iraq complied. But there could be no doubt that Iraq was in further material breach because of its non-compliance. It was important that Iraq got the message that time had almost run out. It would be stupid of them not to co-operate now."

801. Questioning Mr Straw's statement, Mr Ivanov said: "it was up to the inspectors to say how much time they needed to complete their mission. If they needed five to six months, who were we to say they should not get it."

802. Mr Straw "accepted" that there was nothing in resolution 1441 on the timing. That was: "a matter for the Security Council. But Iraq should have complied over the past two months, or even in the 1990s."

803. Mr Ivanov agreed that:

> "… it was for the Security Council to decide on timing … [T]he previous inspectors had worked for eight years and done a great job. ElBaradei had told … [him] that he needed two more months. Blix needed more time too. The Security Council could give the inspectors time to finish their job.
>
> "… the Blix report had said nothing about a material breach."

804. Mr Straw said:

> "… material breach was not a matter for the inspectors, but for the Security Council or for individual members. If one looked at OP4 … it was very hard to see how Iraq was not now in further material breach."

805. Mr Ivanov agreed that:

> "… it was for the Security Council to decide if there were a further material breach. But, looking at the Blix and ElBaradei reports, Russia saw no reason to declare that Iraq was in material breach. But there was a definite need to seek further co-operation from Iraq."

JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003

806. The JIC assessed on 29 January that retaining WMD was a vital Iraqi interest and that Saddam Hussein was unlikely to agree to relinquish power or go into exile.

807. The JIC predicted that, once military action began, widespread lack of loyalty to the regime would become clear and a hard-fought professional defence of Baghdad was "unlikely".

808. The JIC sustained its earlier judgements on Iraq's ability and intent to conduct terrorist operations.

809. At the request of the FCO, the JIC reviewed current developments in Iraq from Saddam Hussein's perspective and possible Iraqi moves in the coming weeks.[265]

810. The minutes of the JIC discussion on 29 January record that the draft Assessment had been difficult to write given the fast-moving developments and it was important to ensure it reflected the latest information, especially the UNMOVIC perspective.[266] They also recorded that:

> "… it was difficult to predict if and when Saddam might launch pre-emptive strikes, but the paper should try and make a judgement on possible timescales. The trigger would probably be set when Saddam concluded that his fate was sealed, rather than any movements by Coalition Forces. Most of the Iraqi military would probably crumble quickly under attack. Saddam would maintain his hold on of power until then, and there were no indications of possible coups beforehand. Whilst the Iraqi public might welcome the end of Saddam's regime, they were also concerned about the human costs of fighting."

811. The key elements of the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003: 'Iraq: The Emerging View from Baghdad'

Key Judgements

- "Retaining WMD remains a vital Iraqi interest. Saddam might nevertheless consider a last minute tactical declaration of some of his WMD to avert a war, believing that he can rebuild his WMD capability later."
- "Saddam does not appear to realise the severity of the military attack he faces. Senior Iraqi officials, although increasingly convinced of the inevitability of a US-led attack, are unlikely to be telling Saddam about their concerns."
- "Saddam has not lost control or the capacity for rational tactical decisions. He continues to maintain regime cohesion, primarily through intimidation. He is unlikely to agree to relinquish power or to go into exile. He still believes he has a chance of averting military action or, once military action begins, forcing the Coalition to cease hostilities before his regime collapses."
- "Once military action has begun, widespread lack of loyalty to the regime will become clear. Iraqis may not welcome Coalition military forces, but most will at least acquiesce in Coalition military activity to topple the regime, as long as civilian casualties are limited. A hard-fought professional defence of Baghdad is unlikely, although elite military and security elements closely identified with the regime may fight until their positions become untenable."

[265] JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003, 'Iraq: The Emerging View from Baghdad'.
[266] Minutes, 29 January 2003, JIC meeting.

- "Saddam probably believes he has some strong political and military cards to play, even in the face of an inevitable attack. These include exploiting international divisions over war with Iraq and rousing the Arab street. He may use human shields, fire CBW against Coalition Forces, launch a pre-emptive attack on the Kurds, Coalition Forces building up in Kuwait or Israel, or sabotage Iraqi oil wells and water supply."

Inspections

The JIC had "judged in October" that:

> "Saddam was confident he could prevent UNMOVIC from finding any evidence before military options started to close off … and that concealment and dispersal of sensitive items were the basis of Iraq's strategy. [...] But by mid-January there were signs that Iraq was coming under pressure from UNMOVIC finds that were inconsistent with its December 2002 declaration. [...]
>
> "[...] Intelligence is unclear, but it is possible the UNMOVIC discoveries have increased Iraqi uncertainty. Blix's tough statement to the Security Council on 27 January surprised Baghdad and may have increased the regime's concerns about UNMOVIC. Saddam Hussein continues to believe that the possession of WMD is a vital Iraqi interest. [...] Any WMD admission would therefore be tactical rather than indicative of a genuine change of policy."

Reading the outside world

The JIC assessed that:

- Iraqi officials were "increasingly convinced of the inevitability of a US-led military attack".
- Saddam Hussein continued to "give the impression that military action, though increasingly likely," was "not imminent".
- Saddam Hussein's speeches in early January had been "bellicose, calling for bravery and sacrifice in defending the homeland from invaders".
- It was "not clear that Saddam and his officials" had "fully grasped the severity of the military attack they face from the US-led Coalition assembling in the Gulf". [...]
- "Reporting … indicated" that Iraq believed the West was "squeamish about casualties".
- Saddam Hussein was "misreading the international scene". Media reporting of debate in the West might "well lead him to overestimate the impact of opposition to military action on US determination to deal decisively with him".
- Saddam Hussein might "also be unsure whether the aim of the Coalition [was] regime change and disarmament or just disarmament".
- Iraq "continued to seek support from Russia and China as well as Arab and Muslim states. But such attempts to gather Arab and international support appear overambitious."

Iraq and terrorism

Addressing Iraq's capability to conduct terrorist attacks and its possible intentions, the Assessment stated:

- The JIC continued to judge that Iraq's capability to conduct terrorist attacks was "limited, especially outside the Gulf region".
- The JIC had "previously judged that terrorism could be attempted against Coalition Forces during a military build-up if Saddam believed an attack was inevitable. There [had] been no indication that Iraq was behind the recent attack on US contractors … in Kuwait". That had, however, highlighted "the vulnerability of the large numbers of Coalition Forces concentrated in an area as small as Kuwait".
- Iraq might "well seek to use its influence over some smaller militant Palestinian groups to encourage them to strike at US and Coalition interests in the Middle East in the event of a Coalition attack".
- There were "also uncorroborated reports of Iraq assembling teams in various countries to attack UK and US interests in the event of war against Iraq.
- Despite the presence of terrorists in Iraq with links to Al Qaida, there was "no intelligence of current co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida".

Iraqi military preparations

The Assessment stated:

- There were "continuing military defensive preparations, including deployments and reinforcement of military units in the South, West and along the border of the Kurdish autonomous zone" which appeared to be "directed against both the threat of [an] internal uprising and external attack".
- "Since early January part of the Iraqi 4th Corps has moved southwards, including possibly 1,000 troops on the al-Faw Peninsula, apparently in response to the Coalition build-up in Kuwait."
- But Iraq's options for redeployment in the South were "limited": "Any significant redeployment in the South would risk triggering a Coalition attack by breaching the southern No-Drive Zone."
- The regime did "not trust the Republican Guard enough to deploy them in Baghdad, except possibly as a last resort, leaving them exposed beyond the capital's boundaries".
- Iraqi preparations in and around Baghdad were judged to be "of limited utility".
- There had been "no clear indication of any plan for a pre-emptive military strike against the Kurds, neighbouring countries or Israel".
- Saddam Hussein would have "little incentive to launch such a strike while the Iraqi strategy focuses on convincing UNMOVIC that Iraq does not have WMD holdings", but it might "become an attractive option in the face of imminent Coalition military action".
- There was "unlikely" to be "any advance warning of a pre-emptive attack on the Kurds".
- A "pre-emptive limited artillery strike on Kuwait using CBW could be launched in as little as two hours".

- "Preparations for a possible attack on Israel" were "likely to be more extensive and to stretch Iraqi capabilities to the limit".
- There were indications of "plans to sabotage oil fields to prevent them falling into Coalition hands".

Maintaining control within Iraq

The Assessment stated:

- The regime continued to "maintain regime cohesion primarily through intimidation".
- It had "attempted to maintain its hold by claiming" that the return of inspectors had "averted a US attack"; the international community was "intent on disarming Iraq, not on regime change"; the regime was "maintaining 'business as usual': anybody thinking of deserting will face serious consequences".
- Clear signs of dissent or defection might not be seen until the regime was "about to fall".
- Saddam Hussein had "sought to mitigate the regime's unpopularity by promising some measures of liberalisation". Such measures had "little credibility" as the regime had "made them under pressure in the past, then withdrawn them once the crisis has passed".
- There was "little intelligence on Iraqi popular attitudes towards a Coalition attack".
- The JIC judged that "most Iraqis will welcome the departure of Saddam. A few reports suggest that some Iraqis may fight to defend their homeland from what they see as external aggression. [...] Overall we judge that while Iraqis may not welcome military forces, they will at least acquiesce in Coalition military action to topple the regime, as long as civilian casualties are limited."
- Morale in much of the regular army was "low" and "many soldiers" were "reluctant to fight". "But as long as Iraqi security officers remain with military units and able to enforce discipline, fear of execution is likely to keep regular units at their posts."

Saddam Hussein's mindset

The Assessment stated:

- The JIC judged that Saddam Hussein was "still in control" and was "unlikely to relinquish power voluntarily".
- Saddam Hussein would "fear the humiliation of exile, possible assassination and the threat of trial before an international war crimes tribunal". Suggesting to him "that he step down to avert a war would be likely to provoke a murderous rage".
- The prospects for a "Turkish initiative to promote a regional peace plan" did not "look good". There had been "no indication" that Saddam was "preparing to flee". There had been "uncorroborated reports of plans for Saddam's family to seek refuge abroad in the event of a Coalition attack".
- Saddam Hussein was "under increasing pressure" as the inspections regime intensified, UNMOVIC had made "significant discoveries" and the Coalition military build-up continued.
- The JIC judged that Saddam Hussein had "underestimated UNMOVIC's capability to expose his deception". He had "failed to realise that he was facing a situation different from the days of UNSCOM". UNMOVIC's "limited success" highlighted the "risks Saddam took in providing a weak declaration of Iraq's WMD-holdings".

- There was "no sign" that Saddam Hussein was "unstable or losing the capacity to make rational tactical decisions". He might "well believe" that he had "some strong cards left to play".
- Saddam Hussein was "already placing military targets in residential areas to score a propaganda victory in the event of a Coalition air campaign".
- "In the face of an attack, or even before hostilities if he judged that an attack was imminent," Saddam Hussein might take a number of actions, including:
  - making a last-minute declaration of his WMD;
  - taking hostages or exploiting "foreign volunteers from countries such as UK and France as human shields";
  - moving "against the KAZ [Kurdish Autonomous Zone] to provoke a humanitarian crisis and to provide a military distraction";
  - mounting a pre-emptive attack against Israel to "provoke a wider regional crisis and rouse the Arab street"; and
  - inflicting "high enough casualties on any Coalition ground forces, perhaps in Kuwait, including through use of CBW, to halt a Coalition attack and to swing public opinion in the West against hostilities".
- "Once hostilities were underway", Saddam might also:
  - "seek to cause an international outcry over the level of Iraqi or Coalition casualties"; and
  - "pursue a scorched earth policy, including the destruction of oil wells and poisoning the water supply".

The JIC had judged in December 2002 that Saddam Hussein "would initially seek international pressure to halt Coalition action". If that failed, he "would seek to inflict serious casualties on Iraq's neighbours and on Coalition Forces, in order to undermine the Coalition's will to fight on".

In its Assessment of 29 January, the JIC judged that Saddam Hussein still believed he had "a chance of averting military action or, once military action begins, forcing the Coalition to cease hostilities before his regime collapses".

812. Mr Scarlett assured Sir David Manning on 30 January that the intelligence reporting was "consistent and convincing", and there was no evidence that Saddam Hussein was considering the renunciation of WMD.

813. In addition to the JIC Assessment of 29 January, Mr Scarlett sent Sir David Manning his "personal observations on the overall intelligence picture".[267] Mr Scarlett wrote: "Our intelligence reporting has been consistent and convincing. I have not seen a single reference to Saddam even considering the renunciation of WMD to save his regime (and probably his own life)."

[267] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: JIC Assessment and Personal Observations'.

814. The details in the letter are addressed in Sections 4.3 and 6.2.

Cabinet, 30 January 2003

815. Mr Blair held a meeting with senior Ministers to discuss Iraq before Cabinet on 30 January, but there is no official record of what was discussed or the conclusions reached.

816. Iraq was discussed with Mr Prescott, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce in a meeting before Cabinet.

817. Mr Campbell wrote that:

- Mr Straw had told Mr Blair several times that he had to make clear [to President Bush] that the UK could not go ahead without a resolution.
- Mr Straw was also concerned about Lord Goldsmith's reaction to some of the proposed targets for the air campaign, "because he would feel that disproportionate force was being applied".
- Adm Boyce had "warned that he was worried the Americans felt they would be seen as liberators. It just wasn't so. They would be resented."
- Mr Blair was "clear that he wanted" to get President Bush to a second resolution; and he had "got the message that we couldn't do without one".
- Mr Blair felt that "two or three Blix reports, and more time for Arab leaders to push Saddam out" were needed.
- Mr Hoon was "worried"; Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Secretary of Defense, was saying "that the problem with the UN route was that it was open-ended, that other countries just used the process so nothing ever happened".[268]

818. There is no No.10 record of the discussion.

819. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 30 January that he would be discussing the policy on Iraq with President Bush the following day. Saddam Hussein was not co-operating fully and while the inspectors would need time to reach a firm conclusion, that period could not be open-ended.

820. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 30 January that he would be discussing the policy on Iraq with President Bush the following day.[269] The United Nations inspectors "needed to be given clear direction following their report" to the Security Council on 27 January. Saddam Hussein was "not co-operating fully but the pressure on him to do so was increasing. It would take time for the inspectors to come to a firm conclusion, but that period could not be open-ended."

[269] Cabinet Conclusions, 30 January 2003.

821. In the subsequent discussion, the points made included:

- Dr Blix's report could be interpreted as an argument that containment had worked: more explanation was required why we could not continue as before.
- The onus was on Saddam Hussein to explain the discrepancies between the Iraqi declaration and a series of unanswered questions: "about 223 missile motors imported illegally; the production of VX nerve agent; 6,500 missing chemical bombs; 12 newly stored chemical shells; and the refusal to allow [Iraqi] scientists to be interviewed in private" listed by Dr Blix. Resolution 1441 "demanded Iraqi co-operation: it was not for the inspectors to act like detectives to find evidence of Saddam Hussein's guilt".
- The British public was "supportive of the UN route, but was averse to being rushed into war by pressure from the US".
- Military action could precipitate a humanitarian crisis involving internecine strife, the release of Iraqi WMD or the breakdown of the UN Oil-for-Food programme.
- The military build-up continued and there would be announcements on the call-up of Reservists and the Royal Air Force contribution.
- The importance of reviving the MEPP had to be constantly reinforced with the US.

822. Mr Blair concluded that Saddam Hussein "had the choice of either co-operating or being disarmed". The UN route "should be pursued". "More time was needed" to allow the inspectors "to do their job properly and to ensure broad international support". American rhetoric was "weakening the Iraqi regime from within. If military action was required we would need to make clear our commitment to the people of Iraq and to managing the aftermath of hostilities to their benefit. The UN would need to be involved in that process. Military action would be embarked upon only if necessary to enforce the will of the United Nations."

823. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had been "clear that his role was to pull the US into the right position" on a UN resolution; and that he had later left Cabinet to take a call from President Bush, "from which he returned looking very worried".[270]

Mr Blair's conversations with President Bush, 29 and 30 January 2003

824. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on both 29 and 30 January.

825. Mr Blair continued to emphasise that Dr Blix would need time to report a pattern of non-co-operation from Iraq before it would be possible to secure support for a second resolution.

---

[270] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

826. While Mr Blair had proposed on 24 January that inspections, and fortnightly reports to the Security Council should continue until the end of March, the timetable being discussed on 30 January was that a decision on a second resolution could be sought after more reports from Dr Blix.

827. In his diary for 29 January, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "For obvious reasons, Iraq was worrying TB more and more. He wasn't sure Bush got just how difficult it was going to be without a second UNSCR, for the Americans as well as us. Everyone TB was speaking to, including tough guys like [John] Howard, was saying that they need a second resolution or they wouldn't get support. TB felt that was the reality for him too, that he couldn't deliver the party without it."[271]

828. Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair that he should tell President Bush that:

> "Even our closest allies are clear about their own domestic political constraints. They would all much prefer a second resolution if at all possible. You have to have one too …
>
> "… a pattern of non-co-operation would not suffice for a French vote in favour of a second resolution. Our assessment is that there are only four positive votes …
>
> "So it follows that a WMD find or an Iraqi obstruction of the inspectors would transform the international context. Short of that, we need a pattern of Blix reports on Iraqi non-co-operation. This all points to a little more time – weeks not months – as you argued in your Note, to improve the chances of securing a second resolution."[272]

829. The conversation on 29 January was brief.[273]

830. Mr Blair congratulated President Bush for setting out the case on Iraq in his State of the Union address. He told President Bush that he [Mr Blair] was speaking to several colleagues so that he would have a clear picture of their positions before their meeting. Dr Blix's January report had been much better than expected and had helped to change some minds.

831. Mr Blair and President Bush agreed to speak the following day on a secure line.

832. In their telephone conversation on 30 January, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the message that should come out of Mr Blair's visit.[274]

833. Repeating many of the points in his Note to President Bush of 24 January, Mr Rycroft reported that Mr Blair said that:

> "… having consulted other leaders it was clear that the issue was not time for its own sake but time to secure a second resolution. Leaving aside public opinion, a second resolution would help protect us against any unexpected events during a military campaign. Saddam had no intention of complying with 1441 so Bush was right to ensure that this did not drag on. The Prime Minister thought that we needed two more Blix reports, one every two weeks, to build up a pattern of Iraqi non-co-operation. At that point, all other countries including France could possibly come on side for a second resolution. But they would need a reason to change their position, which Blix's reports could provide. For instance, it would be difficult for Putin to support a second resolution next week but he might do so in the future. This could make it impossible for France to attract sufficient support. If they vetoed alone, the French would be the unilateral ones."

834. Following a discussion of President Bush's position, Mr Blair accepted that there would be a need to "maintain a position of strength and exhibit increased confidence in our case. Blix's role would be important."

835. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the need to push hard for peace in the Middle East and dealing with WMD proliferation by countries beyond Iraq.

Mr Blair's meeting with Mr Aznar, 30 January 2003

836. Mr Blair suggested to Mr José Maria Aznar, the Spanish Prime Minister, that a second resolution could be sought in late February, but not earlier.

837. Mr Blair met Mr Aznar in Madrid on 30 January on his way to Washington.[275] The meeting was followed by a press conference.

838. Mr Blair told Mr Aznar that he had told President Bush that a second resolution was politically necessary for the UK. If the inspectors did not find any WMD, the "next best outcome would be for Blix to establish through a second and third report to the Security Council that Iraq was refusing full co-operation". The UK should thereafter, in early March, seek a second resolution when, "assuming strong Blix reports", Mr Blair judged Russia would not object and France would need to choose whether to veto. Mr Blair also suggested allowing time after a second resolution for Arab countries to try to force Saddam Hussein into exile.

839. Mr Blair and Mr Aznar discussed the impact of a veto on the UN and, therefore, the need to avoid one; and whether it would be better to seek a second resolution in mid- rather than late February. Mr Blair argued that the situation could not be allowed to "drag on, but it was important to give it a little longer". He acknowledged that public opinion was moving against military action but suggested it could be brought round. Mr Blair's preference was to wait until the end of February, including to allow further reports from Dr Blix, which would highlight Iraq's non-compliance, and give time to work on Security Council members.

840. Mr Blair thanked Mr Aznar for his role in the joint article and stated that he would propose "a system of communications co-ordination" to President Bush.

841. Asked what would happen if there was no second resolution, Mr Blair responded that "he thought military action would follow anyway, but in far tougher political circumstances"; and "The aftermath would be much easier to handle if the UN had authorised military action and the subsequent rebuilding of Iraq."

Papers produced for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush

842. Mr Blair was sent a number of papers from across Whitehall before his meeting with President Bush.

843. In preparation for the meeting with President Bush, Mr Rycroft sent Mr Blair a pack of "background papers" on 30 January.[276] He added that there would be "plenty of other papers, including JIC papers to give you on the plane".

844. The papers on Iraq were produced by the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.

845. Mr Jim Drummond, the Assistant Head of OD Sec (Foreign Policy), sent Mr Rycroft a minute setting out a "few OD Sec points, just in case they slip through the briefing" provided by the FCO and MOD.[277] Those included:

- the need to agree joint military campaign objectives for publication "shortly before any conflict starts"; the UK should offer a draft;
- an offer of "help on handling Iran";
- the "importance of transparency in the use of oil revenues"; and
- the need for agreement on an "UNMOVIC/IAEA role in finding and destroying WMD post Saddam".

MOD LETTER, 29 JANUARY 2003

846. The MOD drew attention to the implications which any delay in military action beyond the spring would have for its ability to provide a major contribution for military action, and the need for the US and UK to have agreed military objectives.

847. The MOD briefing of 29 January comprised a general update and sections on targeting, "aftermath", and Saddam Hussein's options, including Fortress Baghdad.[278]

[277] Minute Drummond to Rycroft, 28 January 2003, 'Iraq: US visit'.
[278] Letter Williams to Rycroft, 29 January 2003, 'Prime Minister's Briefing – Iraq'.

848. The MOD "line to take" suggested for Mr Blair was that, if military operations were to be delayed beyond April/May, the UK would "struggle to put together this scale of force again for the autumn, especially if the fire strike continues. So militarily we could bear some delay but not too much."

849. The background briefing for Mr Blair advised that, if operations were not initiated in the spring, the UK would "face some awkward choices". Some "key elements of the UK contribution were unique" – including the Commando Brigade, the Air Assault Brigade and a specialist helicopter carrier ship. The MOD suggested:

> "If operations were not going to start until the autumn, we would need to consider bringing some forces back to the UK in the meantime. Our ability to provide a major contribution later in the year will also be severely constrained if the fire strike continues beyond the spring."

850. The MOD also advised Mr Blair that agreement on the objectives for a military campaign would be needed. The development of the UK's objectives and the discussion of the legal basis for the conduct of military operations are addressed in Section 6.2.

851. In relation to targeting, the "line to take" offered to Mr Blair was that the UK was "working up our strategic objectives for a military campaign. We need to relate this to the legal base we establish." It was "Very important that UK and US objectives are aligned soon and in advance of commitment to action so that we can come to a clear and common understanding on targeting issues and the information campaign." That would need "careful handling domestically".

852. The background briefing for Mr Blair explained that the current thinking was that the objectives would be published "close to, or at the start of hostilities". The MOD explained that the military objectives would enable it to "satisfy" itself "that they represent[ed] minimum use of force as required by international law", and to use the CDS Directive to indicate "what military missions are legitimate, including … what targets we can legitimately attack from the air; and plan information operations".

853. A "publicly agreed set of aligned military objectives", being prepared by the Cabinet Office, would enable the UK to participate in a "joined up information operations campaign".

FCO ADVICE, 30 JANUARY 2003

854. The FCO focused on the need for more time in the hope of disarming Iraq without military action and, if that was not possible, support for a second resolution.

855. The briefing paper for Mr Blair prepared by the FCO Middle East Department on 30 January described the objectives for the meeting as:

> "to convince President Bush that:
> - our strategy, though working, needs more time;
> - the military campaign will be very shocking in many parts of the world, especially in its opening phase (five times the bombing of the [1991] Gulf War);
> - a second UN Security Council resolution (i) would greatly strengthen the US's position, (ii) is politically essential for the UK, and almost certainly legally essential as well;
> - we should support Saudi ideas for disarmament and regime change with UN blessing;
> - the US needs to pay much more attention, quickly, to planning on 'day after' issues; and that the UN needs to be central to it."[279]

856. The paper set out a number of key messages for Mr Blair to convey to President Bush reflecting those objectives, including:

- More time would not be "stringing things out: it is patience with a purpose". The disarmament of Iraqi WMD and the departure of Saddam Hussein could be achieved "with wide international support", but we were "not there yet".
- There were three strategic advantages in "letting time work for us":
  - The military build-up was "already producing some signs of fracturing in the regime. We will lose nothing by letting the pressure build. We might be able to achieve our objectives without firing a shot."
  - Inspections were "beginning to produce results … The Iraqis are rattled. They are showing signs of non-co-operation (U2s, interviews). Blix brought this out very clearly in New York … shifting the terms of the debate against Iraq. More time will increase the evidence of systematic failure by Saddam to comply. Before long likely to produce compelling evidence of Iraqi deceit …"
  - The mounting pressure was "finally galvanising moderate Arabs to work with us to get Saddam out using the leverage of a second resolution. We need to build up a plan on the basis of Prince Saud's [Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister] ideas covering who would have to go, and how we would handle a transition to a new group of leaders who would meet Iraq's obligations under our supervision."

[279] Paper FCO [MED], 30 January 2003, 'Prime Minister's Visit to Camp David, 31 January: Iraq'.

- A second UN resolution would be the “Basis for this approach”. It would “transform the politics in the UK, Europe and the wider world” and it “might even produce an implosion in Iraq”.
- It would “take an effort to get the nine positive votes needed”.
- Moderate Arabs might support military action “when the time comes”, but they would need “a second resolution and wider international support for force, as well as being seen to give Saddam Hussein one last chance to climb down”.
- All the trends pointed to “a crunch time around end March”. The FCO did not see how a second resolution could be obtained “in the next few weeks, absent a dramatic new fact”.
- The UK was with the US “100% on the goal; full disarmament by force and regime change if necessary. But we have to contrive circumstances in which we can carry a broad coalition and domestic opinion with us.”
- Working with the UN would “produce a huge prize” in relation to rebuilding Iraq with international support “which allows us to exit”, sending a “powerful message” to other “would be proliferators”, and that domestic opinion would be “more convinced by the legal case”. That was “worth taking time over”.
- There was merit in the Saudis’ idea for Arab League pressure on Saddam to go and the idea of a “UN trusteeship” was “worth close examination”.
- An overall “winning concept” was needed which “should embrace both military action and ‘day-after’ administration in Iraq”. It would be “pointless and damaging to win war and lose peace”.
- It would be “irresponsible to abandon Iraq quickly after toppling Saddam”. The “risk of civil war would be real” and “Iraq’s neighbours would get dragged in, creating instability in the whole region”.
- Coalition Forces would “not be seen as liberators for long, if at all. Our motives are regarded with huge suspicion. The Iraqis … want us gone quickly. Our occupation and administration of Iraq will become more unpopular and its awfulness more debatable, the longer it continues.”
- The “Blunt fact” was “that in those circumstances any reforms are unlikely to stick. Iraqis will need legitimate international presence holding the ring while they themselves set up new, Iraqi, structures.”
- The period of “government by military coalition” should be kept “as short as possible” and an “international administration with UN blessing” introduced “quickly”.
- Restoring the oil production would be “an immediate challenge”. The oil sector would “need some technology and a lot of capital”. The US and UK should “encourage an open investment regime and a level playing field for foreign companies”.
- The UK media and Parliament had “not yet focused on day-after questions. But it would be very difficult to sustain a UK contribution to day-after if our occupation of Iraq were opposed, in Iraq and in region." The UK did not "want a repeat of the 1920s".

- The UK agreed with the US "objective of a NATO role" but "there is very little chance of getting a formal … decision at present".

857. A three-page Background Note and an Annex setting out the views of key governments was also produced.

858. On the legal position, the Background Note stated:

> "There are concerns that a second resolution authorising the use of force is needed before force may lawfully be employed against Iraq to enforce the WMD obligations in the UNSCRs. If a draft resolution fails because of a veto (or indeed because it does not receive nine positive votes), the fact that the veto is judged 'unreasonable' is immaterial from a legal point of view."

859. In response to a request from Mr Blair, Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, provided additional briefing on:

- the humanitarian situation – described as "the one area where US Day After planning is reasonably advanced";
- options for a second resolution – work was "in hand" and details were "in briefing pack"; and
- UN involvement in the aftermath – that was "only likely to make progress if the US side gets a signal from the President to take it seriously".[280]

LORD GOLDSMITH'S MINUTE, 30 JANUARY 2003

860. Lord Goldsmith wrote to Mr Blair on 30 January to emphasise that his view remained that resolution 1441 did not authorise the use of military force without a further determination by the Security Council.

861. Lord Goldsmith's minute to Mr Blair of 30 January,[281] and the fact that he thought it necessary to send such a letter despite having been told it was not needed for the meeting with President Bush, is addressed in Section 5.

MR BLAIR'S NOTE, 30 JANUARY 2003

862. A Note entitled 'Countdown' set out a checklist of issues for Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush.

863. It reflected Mr Blair's convictions that Saddam Hussein had no intention of complying with resolution 1441 and the inspectors would report Iraq's non-compliance if they were allowed more time. That would be sufficient to bring round public and international opinion to support military action, even without a "smoking gun".

864. A document entitled 'Countdown' appears in the No.10 files for 30 January 2003.[282]

865. The Note set out a potential timetable for action which anticipated two further reports from Dr Blix, on 14 and 28 February and each "harder on non-co-operation", leading to a UN discussion and a resolution "authorising action; or at least declaring Iraq in material breach" by 5 March. Saudi Arabia might then have "10 days to mobilise Arab opinion to try to force Saddam out" before military action beginning on 15 March. It would be "preferable" if the report on 28 February judged that there was "no sign of Iraq fully co-operating" and that the inspectors could not "disarm unless there is full co-operation". The timetable could be:

> "… shortened if either dramatic find by Blix or 14 February report sufficiently hard; lengthened, but not beyond end March, if resolution takes more time."

866. The document comprised six sections with very short bullet points in each. Those were:

- "Military Questions". Whether there were sound plans: in the event that Saddam Hussein used WMD, attacked Israel, or destroyed oil wells; to keep rival groups and tribes apart; and to avoid civilian casualties.
- "Aftermath Questions". What would happen immediately, "a new Iraqi government or US run"? What type of Iraqi government would be the aim in the medium term?
- "Blix". Had been given "very good intelligence". The Note suggested; "Close working", "Persuasion of doctrine of non-co-operation"; "Tie in with ElBaradei"; and "To be seen by coalition leaders", including Mr Blair and President Bush before 14 February.
- "Related Issues". A renewed push on Afghanistan; progress on the MEPP; "HIV/AIDS and Poverty"; "North Korea"; "US/EU relations"; and "Oil".
- "Diplomacy". The approaches to be adopted with a number of UN Member States and the Iraqi Opposition, including courting Russia and China and bringing them fully on board and finding a "way down" for France.
- "Strategy". The need for: a "Proper communications operation"; joint work on planning; and "regular updates between principals, with clear and set agenda".

867. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had worked on a Note for President Bush on the strategy on the flights to Washington.[283] Mr Blair was extremely concerned by the signals of mounting US impatience and was seeking to avoid a US decision to take action outside the UN. He had concluded that he needed to secure more time and President Bush's support for a second resolution. Sir David Manning had reported that the US "was really impatient with the UN" and advised Mr Blair that "we had to fight hard for more time, that we should persuade them [the US] it was in their own interests".

868. Mr Blair was "clear in his own mind about policy and strategy, but worried [President] Bush would not go for it". Mr Blair saw his "challenge" would be:

> "… persuading the US that it was in America's interests to stay with the UN … it would be total madness not to … but it was not going to be easy. He was aiming to persuade Bush to wait until the middle or end of March and support a second resolution before action."

869. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had been "worried" after the telephone call with President Bush (on 30 January) because the President had "sounded much more frustrated re the UN, definitely listening more to those saying he had to go for it". Mr Blair wanted to take President Bush to one side to:

> "… go through the whole thing. They [the US] may not like it, but Blix was the key … They couldn't just bully here. Blix had to get the evidence of non-co-operation and we had to get the argument round to non-co-operation being a breach, but we needed two or three Blix reports to get that …"

870. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair was:

> "… really worried. He just didn't know how [President] Bush would be … he wanted as much time on his own as we could get, to persuade him [President Bush] that he was more vulnerable than he thought. There was a risk of hubris. He needed world support more than he thought, especially if something went wrong …"

SIR JEREMY GREENSTOCK'S ADVICE, 31 JANUARY 2003

871. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that time would be needed to secure a second resolution. Persuading France to change its position would be the key to influencing others.

872. A clearer understanding of the UK's legal "bottom lines" was urgently needed to inform thinking on a second resolution.

873. A more consultative approach by the US would "work wonders".

874. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised early on 31 January that Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 27 January had "moved the debate from Iraq's performance to what we should do about its non-compliance".[284] Russia, China, Germany and [284] Telegram 174 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 31 January 2003, 'Iraq: Where We Go From Here'.

France's "contention" that "Iraq's co-operation was pretty good so far" did not "echo in the Council". But, at the same time, "all other Council members want to give the inspections longer".

875. Sir Jeremy recommended that the UK's approach to forthcoming discussions of Iraq in the Security Council should be to:

- Hammer home the message that further time would be "a cop-out". It would give "the Iraqis comfort" and mean that they did not need to "take the necessary steps to comply". Assuring Iraq that the Security Council was "determined and willing to contemplate force" was the only solution to getting the Iraqis to "crack". Persuading France to change its position would be the key to influencing others.
- Continue working as hard as possible to provide a "smoking gun" (or denial of access) through UNMOVIC. That was "indispensible" and the UK should "fight for time" for that. The planned presentation by Secretary Powell, to the Security Council on 5 February, would need to be convincing: "A weak presentation will leave us worse off."
- Develop our thinking on a second resolution: "Most crucially and rapidly we need a clearer understanding of our legal bottom lines." The "most realistic way forward may well be an ultimatum". Further work would be needed "on how best that might be constructed (e.g. making use of the UNMOVIC clusters)".

876. Sir Jeremy stated that he would need discretion on the best moment to float a second resolution, but at that stage he did not envisage the issue coming to a head before the second half of February. Securing a second resolution would, in his view, take time. Secretary Powell's address to the Security Council would be used to encourage discussion.

877. Sir Jeremy concluded:

> "Securing a second resolution is going to take time and some coaching of the Security Council. Resolution 1441 took four times as long as we first imagined. Our policy as we go into the meetings … [with President Bush] is therefore well justified. A more nuanced and consultative approach by the US, even for a few days, would also work wonders – focused more on why we need to deal with Iraqi non-compliance and less on the relentless drive to an inevitable war. Powell's decision to address the Security Council has to be used as discussion time, not just a lecture."

Iraq letter, 31 January 2003

In anticipation of Secretary Powell's presentation of 5 February, Dr Sabri wrote to Mr Annan on 31 January requesting the US Government to "submit immediately its alleged evidence" to enable UNMOVIC and the IAEA to begin investigations and report to the Security Council.[285]

Dr Sabri also stated that the 518 inspections since 27 November, which included all the sites identified by the US and the UK, had shown that the allegations were "devoid of truth and had been drafted in order to distort the picture of Iraq and create pretexts for aggression against Iraq and against the region as a whole".

878. Sir Jeremy Greenstock went to see Mr Annan on 31 January to bring him up to date with the UK's thinking.[286]

879. Sir Jeremy reported that he had told Mr Annan that:

- The UK "would be encouraging the US to give the process more time and would also underline the importance of a second resolution".
- The UK wanted to hear Dr Blix's report on 14 February and might want another one after that.
- He did not think there would be military action during February.
- "We were concerned to ensure enough time (even beyond that [late February]) to make it as likely as possible we could secure a second resolution."
- "The only way to resolve this issue without force was for Saddam to crack and preferably to leave (though we realised the latter seemed unlikely at present)."

880. Sir Jeremy also asked whether what he had proposed "offended Annan's bottom line on the need to safeguard the international system". Mr Annan had replied that it did not.

881. Mr Campbell wrote that, "going over the same questions again and again" in Washington on 31 January before the meeting with President Bush, Mr Blair:

> "… kept saying we needed a clear intellectual construct, which was that 1441 focus should be on co-operation issues, if the Iraqis didn't co-operate and Blix makes that clear repeatedly, we should say so and then we go for a second resolution and action could follow. We had allowed the goalposts to be moved to the smoking-gun issue, and instead it had to be about the inspectors not getting co-operation."[287]

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, 31 January 2003

882. When Mr Blair met President Bush on 31 January it was clear that the window of opportunity before the US took military action would be very short. The military campaign could begin "around 10 March".

883. President Bush agreed to support a second resolution to help Mr Blair. Mr Blair confirmed that he was "solidly with the President and ready to do whatever it took to disarm Saddam" Hussein.

884. The absence of discussion about planning for the post-conflict administration and reconstruction of Iraq is addressed in Section 6.5.

885. Mr Blair and President Bush had a two-hour meeting in Washington on 31 January followed by a press conference and an informal dinner.[288]

886. The meeting began with a presentation on the threat posed by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi[289] and the Al Qaida poisons network by a US official. Sir Richard Dearlove attended that part of the discussion.

887. The remainder of the discussion focused on the issue of a second UN resolution and the timetable of a military campaign.

888. Following a discussion of whether a second resolution would help the UK and the relationship between US planning for military action and the diplomatic strategy, Mr Blair confirmed that he was:

> "… solidly with the President and ready do whatever it took to disarm Saddam."

889. Mr Blair added that he firmly believed that it was essential to tackle the threats posed by WMD and terrorism. He wanted a second resolution if we could possibly get one because it would make it much easier politically to deal with Saddam Hussein. He believed that a second resolution was in reach. A second resolution was an insurance policy against the unexpected.

890. Mr Blair set out his position that the key argument in support of a second resolution must rest on the requirement in 1441 that Saddam Hussein must co-operate with the inspectors. Dr Blix had already said on 27 January that this was not happening; he needed to repeat that message when he reported to the Security Council in mid-February and at the end of February/early March. That would help to build the case for a second resolution.

[289] A prominent member of Al Qaida who was in Baghdad (see JIC Assessment, 10 October 2002, 'International Terrorism: The Threat from Iraq').

891. Mr Blair added that there were various uncertainties:

- Saddam Hussein might claim at the eleventh hour to have had a change of heart.
- We could not be sure that Dr Blix's second and third reports would be as helpful as his first.

892. Mr Blair was, therefore, flexible about the timing of the second resolution. If we could get it quickly, "well and good". But the key was to ensure that we secured it. We had taken the UN route in the expectation that the UN would deal with the Iraq problem, not provide an alibi for avoiding the tough decisions. Resolution 1441 was clear that this was Saddam Hussein's final opportunity. We had been very patient. Now we should be saying that the crisis must be resolved in weeks, not months. The international community had to confront the challenges of WMD and terrorism now.

893. Mr Blair told President Bush that the second resolution:

> "… was not code for delay or hesitation. It was a clear statement that Saddam was not co-operating and that the international community was determined to do whatever it took to disarm him. We needed to put the debate in a wider context. The international community had to confront the challenges of WMD and terrorism now, whether in Iraq or North Korea, otherwise the risks would only increase."

894. President Bush and Mr Blair discussed Dr ElBaradei's analysis on the aluminium tubes procured by Iraq. They also discussed the uncertainties and risks arising from Saddam Hussein's potential actions.

895. On military planning, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the possibility that Iraqi forces would fold quickly. Mr Blair asked about planning for the aftermath. In his view a UN badge would be needed. That would help with the humanitarian problems. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed an initial military occupation, how to manage the dilemma of managing the transition to civil administration and the nature of an Iraqi government.

896. Mr Blair concluded that the US and UK needed to prepare to organise on a "war footing" working very closely together "particularly on our public communications".

897. Sir David Manning recorded that it was clear that the window of opportunity would be only a few weeks. Otherwise the US would take military action. The military campaign could begin "around 10 March", and earlier if Dr Blix's report on 14 February was tough. The timing was "very tight".

898. The UK should do all it could to help the inspectors make a significant find and work hard on the other members of the Security Council to accept the "non-co-operation case" to "secure the minimum nine votes when we need them, probably by the end of February".

899. The FCO Iraq policy meeting on 3 February was informed that feedback from the 31 January meeting indicated that Mr Blair had "persuaded President Bush to allow time for a serious effort to secure a second resolution"; and that Mr Ricketts would discuss options and tactics with Mr Straw.[290]

900. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Sir David Manning's record of the meeting with President Bush:

> "… made pretty clear they [the US] had made their minds up and that the campaign was going to start … For Bush the diplomacy had to be based round the military campaign, not the other way round. We had very short timelines now."[291]

901. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair had told him that the meeting with President Bush had been "the best … they had in terms of substance". President Bush "had read and digested" Mr Blair's Notes and "was more on the same page than we thought, said he intended to work hard for a second resolution and work to get a majority for it".

902. Addressing Mr Blair's success in getting President Bush to support a second resolution on 31 January, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote in his statement for the Inquiry that it had not been easy to get US agreement "because of the spread of views in Washington and because we had already used up much of our ammunition with Washington on the utility of the UN route in securing [resolution] 1441".[292]

903. Sir Jeremy added: "It was noticeable … that President Bush's words on this subject in public were rather less warm and specific than those he had used with the Prime Minister in private."

904. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry that President Bush had told Mr Blair: "We, ourselves, don't particularly need a second resolution, but we realise that you do."[293]

905. The record of the meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush on 31 January confirms these elements of Mr Campbell's and Sir Jeremy Greenstock's accounts.[294]

906. Mr Campbell also wrote that Mr Blair was "confident of getting a second resolution"; and he was:

> "… adamant that it was the right thing to do to get rid of Saddam and send out the message that we were determined to deal with WMD. But he knew how tough it was going to be. Expressing confidence in a second resolution was the best way of dealing with that."

907. Mr Blair had "felt things had gone about as well as they could have done, but still felt they [the US] were doing the right thing in the wrong way, and just wished they could improve the way they put their case to the world".

908. In their press conference President Bush and Mr Blair stated clearly that time was running out for Saddam Hussein to disarm peacefully; but neither stated a commitment to securing a second resolution. That left their position ambiguous.

909. In the press conference following the meeting President Bush expressed his appreciation for Mr Blair's "vision", his "willingness to lead" and: "Most importantly … his understanding that after September 11th, 2001, the world changed: that we face a common enemy."[295] President Bush also stated that he trusted Mr Blair's judgement and appreciated his wisdom.

910. Mr Blair stated that it was essential to mobilise international support and the international community to deal with the linked threats of international terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. That was "essential for the future peace and security and prosperity of the world".

911. In the questions that followed, President Bush said twice that the timing of a decision on Iraq would be "weeks, not months" and that was also Mr Blair's view. He added that the US would resist "any attempt to drag the process on for months". He had gone to the United Nations asking it to show that it had "the capacity to keep the peace". If the UN decided to pass a second resolution "it would be welcomed" if it was "yet another signal that we're intent upon disarming Saddam Hussein": "But 1441 gives us the authority to move without any second resolution." Secretary Powell's presentation to the UN would "make it clear" that Saddam was "fooling the world, or trying to fool the world". He subsequently added: "Saddam Hussein would like nothing more than to use a terrorist network to attack and kill …"

912. Mr Blair did not answer a question asking if he had asked President Bush to secure a second resolution. He stated that the judgement had to be that Saddam Hussein was "not co-operating with the inspectors, and therefore is in breach of the UN resolution". That was why time was "running out".

913. Asked if there was a link between Saddam Hussein and those who had attacked the US on 11 September 2001, President Bush replied: "I can't make that claim."

914. President Bush and Mr Blair both emphasised that Saddam Hussein had played games for 12 years, and that he was still playing games. He had to co-operate with the inspectors and demonstrate he was disarming. If not, he would be disarmed by force.

[295] The White House, 31 January 2003, President Bush Meets with Prime Minister Blair.

915. Mr Campbell wrote that he had wanted to get President Bush "as close as possible to a second resolution" and to "tone down the rush-to-war talk".[296]

916. Mr Campbell added that there had been debate about what to say about a second resolution. The White House Press Secretary had been opposed to the idea that President Bush should say he was "open" to a second resolution because "that would be seen as a shift in US policy". President Bush had been impatient and the messages had not been "properly prepared".

917. In Mr Campbell's view:

> "The overall impression was poor. TB didn't really answer the question about the second resolution. And though Bush said it would be 'welcome' he looked uncomfortable and the body language was poor … Even though the words were kind of OK, the overall impression was not."

918. Mr Campbell's decision to give journalists travelling to Washington with Mr Blair a report, 'Iraq – its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation',[297] and the content of the report which became the subject of considerable controversy, is addressed in Section 4.3.

919. Accounts published by President Bush and Vice President Cheney demonstrate that there were serious reservations about pursuing a second resolution and whether it was achievable.

920. In his memoir President Bush wrote that Mr Blair had gone to Washington "for a strategy session". They had "agreed" that Saddam Hussein had "violated" resolution 1441 "by submitting a false declaration"; and that they "had ample justification to enforce the 'serious consequences'".[298]

921. President Bush added that Mr Blair:

> "… wanted to go back to the UN for a second resolution clarifying that Iraq had 'failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it'.
> "'It's not that we need it' Tony said. 'A second resolution gives military and political protection.'"

922. President Bush wrote that he "dreaded the thought of plunging back into the UN" and that Vice President Cheney, Secretary Rumsfeld and Dr Rice "were opposed". Secretary Powell had told him that "we didn't need another resolution and probably couldn't get one". President Bush added that if Mr Blair "wanted a second resolution, we would try"; and that he had said: "As I see it, the issue of the second resolution is how best to help our friends."

923. Vice President Cheney wrote that Mr Blair had "returned to Washington at the end of January" to argue that "we needed yet another resolution"; and that he, Secretary Powell, Mr Rumsfeld and Dr Rice:

> "… were all in agreement that this was a mistake. We'd managed one resolution, no one believed we needed a second, and it would be very hard to get …
> "I also thought that going to the UN again would make us look hesitant and uncertain, but Blair saw a second resolution as a political necessity for him at home …
> "Britain was our major ally and when the President decided to try for a second resolution, I understood his reasons."[299]

924. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the main objective of his meeting with President Bush on 31 January had been to secure US agreement to a second resolution for political reasons.

925. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the main objective of the meeting on 31 January was to convince President Bush that it was necessary to get a second resolution.[300] That "was obviously going to make life a lot easier politically in every respect". Mr Blair added: "we took the view that that was not necessary, but, obviously, politically, it would have been far easier". The American concern was that "they'd get pulled into a UN process, you'd never get to a proper decision and then you'd never get the closure of the issue in the way that you should".

926. Asked about President Bush's view of the need for a second resolution, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "President Bush's view, and the view of the entire American system was that, by that time, Saddam had been given the opportunity to comply …
> "… he hadn't taken it. Indeed, what we now know is that he was continuing to act in breach of the UN resolutions even after the inspectors got back in there.
>
> "So … the American view throughout had been … 'This leopard isn't going to change his spots. He is always going to be difficult.' So … their concern … that they'd get pulled into a UN process, you'd never get to a proper decision and then you'd never get the closure of the issue in a way that you should.
> "The problem … from our perspective, was that … we wanted to carry on going down the UN route, but the Americans had taken the view – and in a sense we took the same view of the Iraqi behaviour up to … the end of January – that they weren't complying."[301]

927. Asked by the Inquiry whether a 2006 report in the New York Times, that President Bush had said at the meeting that the Americans would put the work behind the effort but, if it ultimately failed, military action would follow anyway, was correct, Mr Blair responded:

"The President's view was that if you can't get a second resolution because, in essence France and Russia are going to say no, even though … I don't think they were really disputing that Iraq was in breach of resolution 1441, then we were going to be faced with a choice I never wanted to be faced with: did you go without a second resolution?"[302]

928. Asked if his position had been that he would take military action with the US if a second resolution could not be agreed, Mr Blair replied that "all sorts of factors would be in play", including the legal question and whether there would be political support. But, in the context of an Iraqi breach, Mr Blair was:

"… under absolutely no doubt … that, if you backed away, when he was playing around with the inspectors in precisely the way he had done before, then you were going to send a very, very bad signal."[303]

929. Asked if his recollection was that the proposed start date for military action discussed at that meeting was 10 March, Mr Blair replied: "It was at that meeting or around about that time, certainly, yes."[304]

930. In his memoir Mr Blair wrote that with the New Year there was a sense of being "in the final phase": "The first Blix report in mid-January was clear: Saddam was not complying." Resolution 1441:

"… had been silent on the need for a further resolution prior to any military action. There were legal debates as to whether it was necessary, and Peter Goldsmith was again anxious about it. The Russians had become negative, and it was perfectly possible that a second resolution might be vetoed.

"I was still thinking it might be possible to get a second resolution – George [President Bush] was adamant he didn't need one. Jack Straw and others warned me that, without one, I might be unable to survive the expected House of Commons vote.

"I was about as isolated as it is possible to be in politics. On the one hand, the US were chafing at the bit and essentially I agreed with their basic thrust. Saddam was a threat, he would never co-operate fully with the international community, and the world, not to say Iraq would be better off with him out of power. My instinct was with them. Our alliance was with them. I had made a commitment after September 11 to be 'shoulder-to-shoulder'. I was determined to fulfil it.

"On the other hand, my isolation within Cabinet, let alone the PLP and large parts of the media and public opinion, was colossal. And worrying, not because I might go down … but because so much was at stake. War and peace. The struggle against terrorism. The future of our treasured alliance. The reputation of the country and its armed forces. Above all, people's lives. Either way people's lives, since 'peace' would not be peace for those in Iraq under the boot of Saddam."[305]

931. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote:

"The political debate then crystallised in late 2002/early 2003 around calls for a second resolution.

"We discussed this at various Cabinet meetings, the first of which was from my recollection, that of 16 January 2003. It was then debated again at 30 January, 6 February, 13 February, 27 February and 6 March Cabinet meetings. In addition, of course, it was informally hotly debated everywhere. In this instance there was no disagreement: everyone thought it was politically beneficial."

932. Mr Blair also wrote:

"There was no doubt this was the easiest thing politically, both domestically for the Government and internationally, to build the broader coalition. So in January 2003 we began discreetly to canvass support. When asked, we said we were open to one but did not need one. I also knew that Robin Cook was likely to resign in the absence of one.

"We certainly believed at the outset that if we could push the US to go for it, we had a real chance of getting it, though it would be very difficult. Germany's leader had apparently told President Bush that it would not support but it would not oppose. There were reasonable discussions with France, though by early February, France had hardened again. The US were working hard on the Russians."[306]

933. Mr Blair added:

"We knew we would not ever get a resolution explicitly authorising force. But we thought it possible that the resolution might state what we all knew to be the case: that Saddam was not fully and unconditionally co-operating. The Blix reports were clear that any co-operation fell short. In particular, Blix lacked the ability to conduct interviews without restrictions, a key issue for the inspections. So a 'final' final ultimatum resolution might be agreed."

[306] Statement, 14 January 2001, pages 7-8.

934. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair at what point he had concluded that the US "had definitely decided on military action in March 2003".[307]

935. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote:

> "It was clear from continuing discussion with the US in late 2002/early 2003 that March was the likely date for military action. That firmed up as it became plain that there was no significant shift in the attitude of Saddam. The December declaration … was incomplete, as Blix noted … His first report was to the effect that there was not full compliance, essentially around interviews. There were various possible alternatives to military action surfacing, including proposals for Saddam peacefully to give up power."[308]

936. In the context of questions about his decision not to tell President Bush privately that he was at that stage being advised by Lord Goldsmith that a second resolution would be needed to provide the legal basis for UK participation in military action, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that President Bush knew perfectly well that the UK needed a second resolution. He added:

> "If I had started raising legal issues at that point with the President, I think it would have started to make him concerned as to whether we were really going to be there or not and what was really going to happen. Now I would have done that because in the end whatever I thought about the legal position, the person whose thoughts mattered most and definitively were Peter [Goldsmith]'s, but I wasn't going to do that until I was sure about it."[309]

937. Lord Goldsmith's position is addressed in more detail in Section 5.

938. Asked when the question of more time had come up against the US military timetable, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry:

> "The issue, I think, of timing becomes acute after 1441 and the declaration. Once Saddam has produced his 12,000 pages and the Americans decide this is not serious, then they just want to get on with it really."[310]

939. Asked whether the military timetable was so fixed that time was running out, Sir David replied that the build up of troops meant there was "a sort of pressure to move forward", and:

> "There's also the American political timetable ticking. Bush wants this well out of the way before going into the mid-term election process in – the build-up for elections the following year …"[311]

The views of Mr Blair and Sir Jeremy Greenstock

940. The evidence set out in this Section demonstrates that, by the end of January, Mr Blair had taken a public position that Iraq was failing fully to comply with resolution 1441, and that this was a further material breach.

941. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that Saddam Hussein:

> "… was deliberately concealing documentation, and … he was deliberately not allowing people to be interviewed properly.
>
> "In December 2002 … we received information, and this information remains valid, that Saddam called together his key people and said that anybody who agreed to an interview outside of Iraq was to be treated as a spy."[312]

942. Mr Blair suggested that Saddam Hussein:

> "… retained full intent to restart his programme, and, therefore, it was very important for him that interviews did not take place, because the interviews with senior regime members were precisely what would have indicated the concealment and the intent."[313]

943. Asked whether there was a risk that, in putting down the second resolution the UK would appear to be trying to curtail the inspection process because of the demands of the military planning, Mr Blair replied:

> "It was more … the other way round, that what we were trying to do was to say: 'how do you resolve what, on any basis, is a somewhat indistinct picture being painted by Dr Blix?'"[314]

944. In his memoir Mr Blair quoted at length from Dr Blix's report of 27 January, which he described as providing "essential context to understanding the decisions being taken by me and others".[315]

945. Mr Blair wrote that the report was:

> "… critical to understand the context in which WMD were being debated in the run-up to the outbreak of conflict. We the key allies had no doubt that Saddam had an active WMD programme …
>
> "There could be no doubt that the only reason for the inspectors being allowed back into Iraq was a threat of military action. The build-up of American forces was likewise the only conceivable reason for what co-operation there was. But the co-operation fell short of what resolution 1441 demanded. And the history of dealing with Saddam did not exactly lead to belief in his fidelity to the UN."

[315] Blair T. A Journey. Hutchinson, 2010.

946. Mr Blair wrote that he still "pinned some considerable hope on getting a diplomatic breakthrough"; and that the prospect of a second resolution "was central". But it was apparent that "the law and politics were inextricably intertwined". Above all, a second resolution "would reunite the international community".

947. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote:

> "So I thought inspections necessary but I knew they would only be successful with genuine co-operation. The key to successful inspections was the ability to interview and analyse the work of the technical experts. The JIC reports of 11 October 2002 and then following the December 2002 declaration, of 18 December 2002 gave me no grounds for believing inspections would be properly complied with."[316]

948. Mr Blair added:

> "The Iraqi declaration … and the Blix reports to the UNSC were as unsatisfactory as we anticipated. It was clear Saddam was not fully complying, i.e. he was in breach of [resolution] 1441, but as the prospect of military action advanced, so he was inclined to co-operate more. This is what JIC papers had said he would do."

949. Mr Blair also wrote that the declaration was "incomplete" and "That itself was a breach of [resolution] 1441."[317]

950. Asked if he had concluded quite early after the declaration that there was no prospect of Saddam Hussein complying with the requirements of resolution 1441, Mr Blair replied:

> "Yes. It's basically correct …The intelligence reports were that he didn't intend to co-operate, that the declaration wasn't correct, but there was also a very significant piece of intelligence at that time, which was … that Saddam had said that anybody who co-operated with overseas interviews would be treated as a spy, in other words executed."[318]

951. Mr Blair explained that "some in the American system" had "tried to claim" that the declaration was a material breach, but the advice he received and his attitude was that action could not be taken at that stage.[319]

952. Asked whether he had expected in December 2002 and January 2003 that Dr Blix would report that Saddam Hussein was not co-operating with the inspectors, Mr Blair replied that, "given the history", they had been looking for "very early and significant signs that Saddam had genuinely changed the position of his regime".[320]

953. Asked if the US military timetable would leave enough time to see whether UNMOVIC could do its job, Mr Blair replied:

> "… the timeline was pressing … because the Americans took the view it was absurd to think that Saddam was going to change his mind, because he wasn't …"[321]

954. Sir Jeremy Greenstock suggested that the primary reason for the second resolution was as a means to persuade Saddam Hussein to disarm peacefully, although it would also have helped to provide a legal basis for action if required.

955. Asked about the UK's objectives for the second resolution, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

> "I think we had two objectives and I have thought quite carefully about this, because those objectives became confused in the heat of battle and in subsequent interpretation with hindsight of what happened.
> "… the two fundamental points were, first, that we had to try and create international pressure on Iraq to give up WMD without a fight, and it was only possible to do that, as far as I was concerned, through the United Nations, by having a very firm body of international opinion that was against Iraq and determined to bring to a halt its 12-year contravention of UN resolutions. That was a primary purpose behind what I was trying to design as a further resolution.
> "Second, we were also concerned to establish the safest possible legal grounds for the use of force if that should be necessary. We felt that we had legal grounds in 1441, but those grounds were contested. They were a matter of subjective opinion. If one had a further resolution, establishing that there had been a material breach since we had given Iraq the final opportunity, this would be unequivocal, and that would be the safest possible legal grounds for the next steps, whatever they were."[322]

Conclusions

956. In December 2002, President Bush said that the Iraqi declaration of 7 December 2002 demonstrated Saddam Hussein had had "no change of heart".

957. By early January 2003, Mr Blair had concluded that the military action was the more likely outcome and, if conflict could not be avoided, that the UK should support the US.

958. The Inquiry has already concluded in Section 3.5 that Mr Blair and Mr Straw envisaged that in the event of a material breach of Iraq's obligations, a second resolution determining that a breach existed and authorising the use of force was likely to be tabled in the Security Council.

[321] Public hearing, 21 January 2011, pages 79-80.
[322] Public hearing, 27 November 2009, pages 64-65.

959. Lord Goldsmith was not invited to provide draft advice on the legal effect of resolution 1441 until mid-January and, at that stage, it was given only to Mr Blair.

960. Lord Goldsmith's position that a further decision by the Security Council would be required to revive the authorisation to use force contained in resolution 678 (1990), although that decision need not be in the form of a further resolution; and that there was no "room for arguing that a condition of reasonableness [could] be implied as a precondition for the exercise of a veto", is addressed in Section 5.

961. That remained Lord Goldsmith's view throughout the events addressed in this Section of the report.

962. Mr Blair and Mr Straw repeatedly stated, however, that military action would be justified if the Security Council failed, in the face of a report of a further material breach, to "face up to its responsibilities".

963. In public statements Mr Blair and Mr Straw continued to declare that reports from the inspectors would be the basis for seeking a second resolution which was regarded as an essential prerequisite for securing both UK domestic and international support for military action.

964. In January 2003, there was a clear divergence between the UK and US Government positions over the timetable for military action.

965. The decisions to deploy military forces to the Gulf and the absence of collective discussion of the implications are addressed in Sections 6 and 7.

966. On 24 January, Mr Blair sent President Bush a proposal suggesting the inspectors should be given until the end of March or early April to carry out their task and asking for fortnightly reports to the Security Council on the extent of Iraqi compliance.

967. Mr Blair considered that, if those reports established a pattern of non-compliance, they would, in the absence of other evidence that Iraq had concealed WMD (a "smoking gun"), be sufficient to secure Security Council support for a second resolution.

968. The US and UK should seek to persuade others, including Dr Blix, that that was the "true view" of resolution 1441.

969. By the end of January, Mr Blair had taken a public position that Iraq was failing fully to comply with resolution 1441, and that that was a further material breach.

970. Mr Blair and Mr Straw saw the meeting with President Bush on 31 January as the best opportunity to gain US support for an approach designed to secure a second resolution.

971. The Inquiry recognises that events were moving fast and that Mr Blair was seeking to influence President Bush's position.

972. President Bush agreed to seek a second resolution to help Mr Blair, but there were major reservations within the US Administration about the wisdom of that approach.

973. Mr Blair confirmed that he was "solidly with the President and ready to do whatever it took" to disarm Saddam Hussein.

974. But President Bush was not prepared to agree a timetable which would preclude US military action in early March.

975. Mr Blair's proposed approach to the discussion with President Bush was discussed in a meeting of Ministers before Cabinet on 30 January and then discussed in general terms in Cabinet itself. But no detailed and in depth analysis of the strategy and its advantages and disadvantages, including the likelihood of success, was prepared or discussed collectively by either senior officials or Ministers. Nor were alternative options, which might have been available to the UK at that stage, identified and considered.

976. A review of the strategy would inevitably have focused on the tension between the military timetable of the United States and the UK view that the inspections needed more time before it would be possible to secure international support and a further UN Security Council resolution.

977. In the event, the approach failed to secure majority support in the Security Council in mid-March for a resolution stating that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441; that the inspections had run their course; and that military action was necessary as a last resort to disarm Saddam Hussein of his weapons of mass destruction and the means for their delivery. That is addressed in subsequent Sections of the Report.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the development of the UK position on Iraq between Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush on 31 January 2003, at which he sought US support for a further, "second", Security Council resolution before military action was taken, and the meeting of the Security Council on 7 March, at which the UK, US and Spain tabled a revised draft resolution stating that Iraq would have failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441 unless the Council concluded on or before 17 March that Iraq was demonstrating "full, unconditional, immediate and active co-operation" with its obligations to disarm.

2. During that time, the UK Government was pursuing both intense diplomatic negotiations with the US and other members of the Security Council about the way ahead on Iraq and a pro-active communications strategy about why Iraq had to be disarmed, if necessary by force, against the background of sharply divided opinion and constant political and public debate about the possibility of military action.

3. Development of UK strategy and options between 8 March and the start of military action overnight on 19/20 March is addressed in Section 3.8.

4. Other key developments in February and early March are addressed elsewhere in the Report, including:

- The provision of advice by Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, on the legal basis for military action to secure Iraq's compliance with its disarmament obligations is addressed in Section 5.
- The planning for military operations in southern Iraq and preparations to equip the forces deployed are addressed in Sections 6.2 and 6.3 respectively.
- UK planning and preparation for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq is addressed in Section 6.5.
- Advice and briefings on Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile capabilities and its intentions in relation to concealing them from inspections and in response to military action are addressed in Section 4.3.

Key findings

- By the time the Security Council met on 7 March 2003 there were deep divisions within it on the way ahead on Iraq.
- Following President Bush's agreement to support a second resolution to help Mr Blair, Mr Blair and Mr Straw continued during February and early March 2003 to develop the position that Saddam Hussein was not co-operating as required by resolution 1441 (2002) and, if that situation continued, a second resolution should be adopted stating that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by the Security Council.

- On 6 February, Mr Blair said that the UK would consider military action without a further resolution only if the inspectors reported that they could not do their job and a resolution was vetoed unreasonably. The UK would not take military action without a majority in the Security Council.
- Mr Blair's proposals, on 19 February, for a side statement defining tough tests for Iraq's co-operation and a deadline of 14 March for a vote by the Security Council, were not agreed by the US.
- The initial draft of a US, UK and Spanish resolution tabled on 24 February, which simply invited the Security Council to decide that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441, failed to attract support.
- Throughout February, the divisions in the Security Council widened.
- France, Germany and Russia set out their common position on 10 and 24 February. Their joint memorandum of 24 February called for a programme of continued and reinforced inspections with a clear timeline and a military build-up to exert maximum pressure on Iraq to disarm.
- The reports to the Security Council by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) reported increasing indications of Iraqi co-operation. On 7 March, Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, reported that there was no indication that Iraq had resumed nuclear activities and that it should be able to provide the Security Council with an assessment of Iraq's activities in the near future.
- Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), reported to the Security Council on 7 March that there had been an acceleration of initiatives from Iraq and, while they did not constitute immediate co-operation, they were welcome. UNMOVIC would be proposing a work programme for the Security Council's approval, based on key tasks for Iraq to address. It would take months to verify sites and items, analyse documents, interview relevant personnel and draw conclusions.
- A revised draft US, UK and Spanish resolution, tabled after the reports by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 7 March and proposing a deadline of 17 March for Iraq to demonstrate full co-operation, also failed to attract support.
- China, France and Russia all stated that they did not favour a resolution authorising the use of force and that the Security Council should maintain its efforts to find a peaceful solution.
- Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York, advised that a "side statement" with defined benchmarks for Iraqi co-operation could be needed to secure support from Mexico and Chile.
- Mr Blair told President Bush that he would need a majority of nine votes in the Security Council for Parliamentary approval for UK military action.

Parliamentary debates on Iraq, 3 February 2003

5. Reporting on his visit to Washington on 31 January 2003, Mr Blair told Parliament on 3 February that Saddam Hussein was not co-operating as required by UN Security Council resolution (UNSCR) 1441(2002) and, if that continued, a second resolution should be passed to confirm such a material breach.

6. Mr Blair continued to set the need for action against Iraq in the context of the need to be seen to enforce the will of the UN and to deter future threats.

7. Following his meeting with President Bush in Washington on 31 January 2003, Mr Blair made a statement to Parliament on Monday 3 February.[1]

8. Mr Blair described Iraq as the "immediate focus of the visit" although he and President Bush had also discussed the Middle East Peace Process (MEPP), Afghanistan, and global poverty and development. Mr Blair also reported that he had had meetings and discussions with other Heads of State and Government.

9. Stating that, "We are entering the final phase of a 12-year history of the disarmament of Iraq", Mr Blair said that Saddam Hussein had "consistently flouted" 27 "separate and categorical obligations" in a series of 17 resolutions. That was why a sanctions regime had been in place, which "because of the way in which Saddam has applied it, has caused wholly unnecessary suffering for the Iraqi people".

10. Mr Blair stated:

> "Eight weeks have now passed since Saddam was given his final chance. Six hundred weeks have passed since he was given his first chance. The evidence of co-operation withheld is unmistakable. Saddam has still not answered the questions concerning thousands of missing munitions and tons of chemical and biological agents unaccounted for."

11. Mr Blair reported the recent finds by the weapons inspectors and drew attention to the report published by No.10 the previous weekend, which made clear that Iraq had "a huge infrastructure of deception and concealment designed to prevent the inspectors from doing their job".

12. That report, the No.10 dossier, 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation', is addressed in Section 4.3.

13. Referring to the report by Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), to the Security Council on 27 January, including his comments that Iraq did not appear to have come to a genuine acceptance of the disarmament demanded, and that the discovery of chemical rocket warheads could be the "tip of an iceberg", Mr Blair added:

> "The situation therefore could not be clearer. There is a duty on Saddam to co-operate fully. At present, he is not co-operating fully. Failure to do so is a material breach of resolution 1441. Should Dr Blix continue to report Iraqi non-co-operation, a second resolution should be passed to confirm such a material breach. President Bush and I agreed that we should seek maximum support for such a resolution, provided, as ever, that seeking such a resolution is a way of resolving the issue, not delaying or avoiding dealing with it at all."

14. Mr Blair also drew attention to the "powerful evidence of the continuing terrorist threat" which had appeared over the past few weeks. Terrorist groups were "actively seeking to use chemical or biological means to cause as much death and injury and suffering as they can".

15. Mr Blair stated that Iraq was not alone in developing weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and repeated his warning that:

> "… unless we take a decisive stand now as an international community, it is only a matter of time before these threats come together. That means pursuing international terrorism across the world in all its forms. It means confronting nations defying the world over weapons of mass destruction. That is why a signal of weakness over Iraq is not only wrong in its own terms. Show weakness now and no one will ever believe us when we try to show strength in future. All our history, especially British history, points to this lesson. No one wants conflict. Even now, war could be avoided if Saddam did what he is supposed to do. But if having made a demand backed up by a threat of force, we fail to enforce that demand, the result will not be peace or security. It will simply be returning to confront the issue again at a later time, with the world less stable, the will of the international community less certain and those repressive states or terrorist groups that would destroy our way of life emboldened and undeterred."

16. Mr Blair concluded that he hoped that conflict with Iraq could be avoided and that Saddam Hussein "can come to his senses, co-operate fully and disarm peacefully". But if he did not:

> "… he must be disarmed by force. If we have to go down that route, we shall do all we can to minimise the risks to the people of Iraq, and we give an absolute undertaking to protect Iraq's territorial integrity …
> "Saddam's weapons of mass destruction and the threats they pose to the world must be confronted. In doing so, this country and our Armed Forces will be helping the long-term peace and security of Britain and the world."

17. In response, Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, stated that his party fully supported the UN route and he hoped a second resolution would be possible: "Although it is not a prerequisite for future action, it is highly desirable." He stated that the "fundamental problem is not lack of time, but the attitude of Saddam Hussein". He agreed with Mr Blair that "if the international community backs away from dealing with Saddam Hussein now, that will be seen as a green light by every rogue state and terrorist group around the world".

18. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, referred to the extent of public anxiety about developments and "a sense that we seem to be hastening into war ahead of the events". He stated that the Government had "still to make a credible case", and: "That case, for any fair-minded person viewing it, has to be based on credible evidence, which has not so far been forthcoming."

19. Mr Blair responded that, after 12 years of trying to get disarmament, resolution 1441 offered Saddam Hussein a final opportunity. That was "hardly hastening into a war". It was a response to Saddam Hussein's "point blank" refusal to do what the United Nations had asked. If, as Dr Blix had said, Saddam Hussein was "carrying on in breach of his obligations, that was "credible evidence" that he was not co-operating. The United Nations had decided that Saddam Hussein was in breach of its resolutions and he had "got to produce the evidence that he is now co-operating fully – and he is not doing so".

20. Mr Blair added that the inspectors' task was "not to engage in an elaborate game of hide and seek". That was the game Saddam Hussein had been playing for 12 years; and it was "unacceptable". The US had chosen to go through the UN process, "but that process should be a way of dealing with this issue once and for all, not of kicking it into the long grass again and avoiding it altogether".

21. In response to a question from Mr Donald Anderson, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC), about whether he feared that Russia, France or China might "unreasonably" veto a second resolution, Mr Blair responded that he was:

> "… working on the basis that people hold to both the spirit and the letter of resolution 1441. The process has integrity. Saddam has a final opportunity and he must co-operate fully. If he does not, a fresh resolution will be issued. The logic of that will take people along with us, especially when there are further inspectors' reports to come."

22. Asked by Mr David Heath (Liberal Democrat) whether he disagreed with a view that war would be a potent recruiting tool for terrorist groups, Mr Blair responded: "If we are taking action where we are obviously and clearly enforcing the will of the UN", that view was "not right".

23. Mr Blair added:

> "… the people who will be most delighted to see the end of Saddam are the people who are his first and primary victims – his own people. In those circumstances, I do not believe that it will recruit people to the cause of terrorism … what will recruit people to the cause of terrorism is a belief among these fanatics that the will of the international community is weak, that it does not have a determination to confront these issues, and that, when faced with the challenge, we will fail to meet it."

24. In response to a question from Mr James Paice (Conservative) about the need to explain to the British public "the conjunction between the Iraqi situation and international terrorism", Mr Blair stated that "we have constantly tried to explain to people" that the two issues of WMD and terrorism were "not separate". Both represented "the threats of the fanatical over the rational … [T]hreats to the civilised world from acts of barbarity." The fact was that the two issues were:

> "… intimately linked … without a doubt, if we do not deal with both these issues at some point … [they] will come together. It is simply not possible to have a situation in which states are developing and trading in this stuff, with their scientists being hired by the top bidder, and in which terrorist groups are well-financed and able to recruit … It is not possible to have those two threats operating and for them not to come together at a certain point, and the consequences would then be devastating."

25. Mr Blair stated that he was taking a risk politically on Iraq because he did not "want to be the Prime Minister to whom people point the finger in history and say, 'You knew perfectly well that these two threats were there, and you didn't do anything about it. In the end, you took the easy way out …' We know that those threats are there and we have got to deal with them."

26. Asked by Mr Ian Lucas (Labour) to confirm that he would support military action against Iraq only if the UN weapons inspectors certified that there was a continuing material breach of UN resolution 1441, Mr Blair responded: "That is exactly the position I have outlined. If the inspectors continue to certify that Iraq is not co-operating fully, that is a material breach. It is precisely so that the inspectors can make those findings a fact that we put them there."

27. Mr Blair's statement was repeated in the House of Lords by Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Lord Privy Seal.[2]

28. Lord Strathclyde (Conservative) supported the need for action, stating that a second resolution was highly desirable but it "should not be used as an excuse for delay". He also asked for further information about the specific danger Saddam Hussein posed to the UK. He concluded that Saddam Hussein had been given "a second chance once too often"; and that while no one wanted to go to war, "the dangers of stopping now may be greater than going ahead".

29. Lord Wallace of Saltaire (Liberal Democrat) stated that the Liberal Democrats supported Mr Blair's efforts "to ensure that containment of Iraq" continued to be managed multilaterally, and noted the "very careful balancing act" with the unilateral language used by the US Administration. Questioning a linkage between rogue states, WMD and terrorism, Lord Wallace concluded:

> "What worries us most on these Benches is the extent to which the questions of rogue states, weapons of mass destruction and terrorism are conflated, as they are again in this statement. Terrorism is a real, long-term problem, and it will not be resolved by military intervention in Iraq or by disarming Iraq. What worries many of us about what we hear from Washington at the moment is what we perceive as a lack of understanding about the long-term nature of the terrorist problem in the Muslim world. We need to be sure that we are standing up for universal values and not simply Western values, let alone American values … An upsurge of terrorism after an invasion of Iraq is a possibility for us."

30. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote that Mr Blair "felt … we had finally got the focus where it needed to be, on the issue of co-operation with Blix".[3]

3 and 4 February 2003

31. When Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), spoke to Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, on 3 February. They agreed that a second resolution should be "pursued energetically".[4] The UK and US approaches should be carefully co-ordinated. Following a discussion of the positions of various members of the Security Council, Dr Rice agreed with Sir David's conclusion that, "we would undoubtedly have to work hard to get our nine votes; but it did not look impossible".

32. Mr Blair told Mr José María Aznar, the Spanish Prime Minister, that President Bush favoured a second resolution "in principle".[5] They agreed that the UK and Spain should work together on a resolution.

33. Mr Blair telephoned Mr Vladimir Putin, the Russian President and Mr Silvio Berlusconi, the Italian Prime Minister (who was in Moscow).[6] Mr Blair also spoke to a number of his other counterparts, with similar messages.

34. On 4 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, told Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, that the UK "had not won as much further time as we wished" in the meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush on 31 January, but "we still had the whole of February and a bit of March to work with" and "the Americans would work actively for a second resolution". The UK wanted the UN inspectors to "deliver further results, because this would make it more likely that the international non-proliferation system remained in control".[7]

35. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice on 5 February that, while the UK would want Sir Jeremy Greenstock's advice before taking a firm view, his preference was to start discussing a second resolution after the report to the Security Council on 14 February by Dr Blix.[8]

36. At the Franco-British Summit on 4 February, Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, made clear that inspections should continue unless the inspectors reported that they could not do their job. War would be the worst possible solution.

37. Sir John Holmes, British Ambassador to France, reported on 1 February that, in a conversation about the forthcoming summit, Mr Maurice Gourdault-Montagne, President Chirac's Diplomatic Adviser, had emphasised that France had never been a pacifist country, and was certainly not one now, and it was not anti-American and never would be.[9] But it was:

> "… not acceptable for Europe simply to be dragged along in the US wake when our interests did not fully coincide. In the case of Iraq, there was no disagreement on the need to disarm Iraq, but all the options short of war had not been explored properly yet, and we were being forced to march to an artificial US timetable which was not in our interests. It remained to be seen whether Powell [Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State] would produce much … [at the Security Council meeting on 5 February]. For the moment the French were still not convinced there were really major things for the inspectors to find, or that Iraqi non-co-operation was sufficient to say they were in breach of 1441."

38. Sir John wrote that he judged President Chirac was "finally beginning to think that France is in danger of finding herself in a false position", but he was "not yet ready to move towards us very significantly".

39. Mr Blair told President Chirac on 3 February that he had agreed with President Bush that if Dr Blix continued to report Iraqi non-co-operation there should be a second UN resolution "within weeks".[10]

40. There was little movement on Iraq at the Franco-British Summit on 4 February. Mr Blair stressed the value of uniting around a second resolution to put pressure on Saddam Hussein to go without war. President Chirac's view was that the inspectors should be allowed to continue their work, with more resources if they said they needed them. The issue of a second resolution would not arise until the inspectors said they could no longer do their work. He was concerned about the regional implications of any military action and the potential consequences of trying to introduce democracy in Iraq.[11]

41. The No.10 record of the discussion reported that President Chirac doubted that Secretary Powell's presentation the following day:

> "… would contain anything new. If it did, the inspectors should verify it … A second resolution would be necessary for a war, but one was not needed yet since the inspections should continue. If the inspectors said they could not continue their work, there could then be a second resolution. If the inspectors reported continued non-co-operation, perhaps a High Commissioner for Disarmament could visit Baghdad, and the inspections could be strengthened."[12]

42. President Chirac's public comments focused on the need to let the inspectors do their job; he stated that war was the worst possible solution.[13]

43. Mr Campbell reported that, after the meeting, Mr Blair said his strategy was to get Saddam Hussein out without a war, by obtaining a second resolution then persuading him to go.

44. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had called him late on 4 February, following the Franco-British Summit, to say that "he could now see a way of getting to the same place as Chirac". In response to Mr Campbell's comment that the "best thing" for President Bush "was to get Saddam out without a war", Mr Blair had replied:

> "… that was his whole strategy, get the Blix report, then a second resolution, then get the Arabs to press him to go."[14]

Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council, 5 February 2003

45. Secretary Powell gave a long and detailed presentation to the Security Council on 5 February setting out the US position on the threat posed by Iraq and its failure to comply with resolution 1441.

46. President Bush wrote in his memoir that he had agreed to pursue a second resolution if Mr Blair wanted one at their meeting in Washington on 31 January; and that "the best way to get a second resolution was to lay out the evidence".[15] He asked Secretary Powell to make a presentation to the UN:

> "He had credibility as a highly respected diplomat known to be reluctant about the possibility of war. I knew he would do a thorough, a careful job. In early February, Colin spent four days and nights at the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] personally reviewing the intelligence to ensure he was comfortable with every word in his speech."

47. In his presentation to the Security Council on 5 February, Secretary Powell stated that he had asked for the meeting for two purposes:

- The first was to support the "core assessments" made by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 27 January that:
  - "… Iraq appears not to have come to a genuine acceptance – not even today – of the disarmament that was demanded of it"; and
  - "… did not provide any new information relevant to certain questions that have been outstanding since 1998".
- The second was to provide "additional information and to share … what the United States knows about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, as well [as] Iraq's involvement in terrorism".[16]

48. Secretary Powell stated that the information, "when combined with what all of us have learned over the years," was "deeply troubling". There was "an accumulation of facts and disturbing patterns of behaviour" that demonstrated that Saddam Hussein and his regime had "made no effort to disarm as required by the international community" and was "concealing their efforts to produce more weapons".

49. Secretary Powell provided tapes of intercepted conversations and satellite imagery which he interpreted as demonstrating Iraq's attempts to conceal activity to "clean up" facilities before visits by the inspectors.

50. Secretary Powell also stated that human sources had told the US that:

- The Iraqis were moving "not just documents and hard drives but also weapons of mass destruction to keep them from being found by inspectors".
- "In early December, Saddam Hussein had all Iraqi scientists warned of the serious consequences that they and their families would face if they revealed any sensitive information to the inspectors. They were forced to sign documents acknowledging that divulging information is punishable by death."

  "Saddam Hussein also said that scientists should be told not to agree to leave Iraq. Anyone who agreed to be interviewed outside Iraq would be treated as a spy."
- A "false death certificate" had been issued for one scientist, and he was sent into hiding, and a "dozen experts have been placed under house arrest … at one of Saddam Hussein's 'guest houses'."

51. Secretary Powell added that the "information and intelligence" pointed to "an active and systematic effort on the part of the Iraqi regime to keep materials and people from the inspectors".

52. Secretary Powell stated that Iraq had failed the test of providing an honest declaration and the conclusion that Iraq was now in further material breach of its obligation was "irrefutable and undeniable". Iraq had "placed itself in danger of the serious consequences called for in resolution 1441". The Council placed itself "in danger of irrelevance" if it allowed "Iraq to continue to defy its will without responding effectively and immediately".

53. Secretary Powell set out the "real and present dangers" posed by Iraq's WMD, in particular its ability using mobile production facilities to produce biological agent and its ability to disperse biological agents "indiscriminately" (see Section 4.3). Secretary Powell also described intelligence and information on Iraq's chemical weapons, nuclear weapons and long range missile programmes.

54. Secretary Powell concluded by setting out the US position on the activities in Iraq of Al Qaida and Ansar al-Islam. Iraq's denial of those links and its support for terrorism was "a web of lies". The US was not prepared to run the risk of Saddam Hussein using his weapons of mass destruction.

55. Secretary Powell said that Iraq was not taking its last chance and the Council had an obligation to ensure that its resolutions were complied with.

56. During his presentation, Secretary Powell also drew attention "to the fine paper that the United Kingdom distributed yesterday which describes in exquisite detail Iraqi deception activities".

57. Secretary Powell was referring to the No.10 document, 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation', which is addressed in Section 4.3.

58. Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, stated that Iraq was now in further material breach of resolution 1441. If that continued, the Security Council should meet its responsibilities.

59. In a discussion of 29 January about the Security Council on 5 February, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he had considered the idea that the UK should publish a dossier alongside the US presentation but he "did not think it was a good idea since it could only be an echo of his".[17] They also discussed how to address Iraq's human rights record.

60. In his statement to the Security Council, Mr Straw described Secretary Powell's presentation as "a most powerful and authoritative case against the Iraqi regime" and thanked him for "laying bare the deceit practised by the regime of Saddam Hussein, and worse, the very great danger which that regime represents".[18]

61. Mr Straw stated that resolution 1441 had given Iraq "a final opportunity to rid itself of its weapons of mass terror, of gases which can poison thousands in one go; of bacilli and viruses like anthrax and smallpox which can disable and kill by the tens of thousands; of the means to make nuclear weapons which can kill by the million".

62. Resolution 1441 had strengthened inspections but without Iraq's "full and active co-operation" they could never be sure of finding all WMD in a country the size of Iraq. But the inspectors' reports on 27 January and Secretary Powell's presentation could leave "no illusions". Saddam Hussein held resolution 1441 in contempt and was defying the Council. He was questioning "our resolve" and was "gambling that we will lose our nerve rather than enforce our will".

63. The resolution had "set two clear tests for a further material breach by Iraq":

- not to make "false statements" or "omissions" in its declaration; and
- "to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation" of resolution 1441.

64. In relation to the first, Mr Straw stated that Iraq's declaration of 7 December was "not full, nor accurate, nor complete":

- It was "a false statement. Its central premise – that Iraq possesses no weapons of mass destruction – is a lie."
- "The declaration also has obvious omissions, not least a failure to explain what has happened to the large quantities of chemical and biological weapons materiel and munitions unaccounted for by UN weapons inspectors in 1998."
- There was "no admission of Iraq's extensive efforts to develop WMD since the last round of UNSCOM [UN Special Commission] inspections ended".

[17] Letter Straw to Manning, 29 January 2003, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conversation with Colin Powell, 29 January 2003'.
[18] UN Security Council, '4701st Meeting Wednesday 5 February 2003' (S/PV.4701).

65. Mr Straw stated that it was "clear that Iraq has failed" the second test. The briefings to the Council had:

> "… confirmed our worst fears, that Iraq has no intention of relinquishing its WMD, no intention of following the path of peaceful disarmament set out in UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] 1441. Instead of open admissions and transparency, we have a charade, where a veneer of superficial co-operation masks wilful concealment, the extent of which has been devastatingly revealed this morning by Secretary Powell."

66. Mr Straw stated that there was "only one possible conclusion … Iraq is in further material breach" of resolution 1441. The Council faced a difficult choice. It would be "Easy but wrong" to hope for a change of heart by Iraq. That would be "repeating the mistakes of the last 12 years and empowering a dictator".

67. Commenting on Secretary Powell's description of reports about the presence in Iraq of "[Abu Musab] al- Zarqawi [Leader of Al Qaida in Iraq], and other members of Al Qaida, and their efforts to develop poisons", Mr Straw stated that: "It defies the imagination that all of this could be going on without the knowledge of Saddam Hussein. The recent discovery of the poison ricin in London has underlined again that this is a threat that all of us face."

68. Mr Straw concluded:

> "… time is now very short. The Council will have further reports from the inspectors on … 14 February. If non-co-operation continues, the Council must meet its responsibilities.
>
> "This is a moment of choice for Saddam and the Iraqi regime. But it is also a moment of choice for … the United Nations … the League of Nations … failed because it could not create actions … It could not back diplomacy with the credible threat and, where necessary, the use of force … At each stage good men said, 'Wait. The evil is not big enough to challenge'. Then before their eyes, the evil became too big to challenge. We slipped slowly down a slope, never noticing how far we had gone until it was too late. We owe it to our history, as well as our future, not to make the same mistake again."

69. In response to Secretary Powell's presentation, most members of Council stated that the information presented would require serious and thorough study and encouraged Iraq to co-operate with the inspectors and provide answers to the outstanding questions.

70. Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, stated that the information Secretary Powell had provided required "very serious and thorough study". It should be handed immediately to UNMOVIC and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) for on-site verification. Baghdad must give the inspectors answers and inspections should continue; they alone could provide answers on the extent of Iraqi compliance.

71. Addressing the question of whether time was running out, Mr Ivanov stated that resolution 1441 contained no concrete timeframe: "The inspectors alone" could advise on how much time they needed "to carry out the tasks entrusted to them". Further resolutions could not be ruled out, but efforts should continue to do "everything possible to facilitate the inspection process. That had "proven its effectiveness" and made it "possible to implement Council decisions by peaceful means".

72. The international community was confronting new global threats and challenges, and "The unity of the world community" would "continue to be the principal guarantee of the effectiveness of the world's action".

73. Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, stated that the UN had chosen a policy based on:

> "… three fundamental points: a clear objective on which we cannot compromise – the disarmament of Iraq … a rigorous system of inspections that requires Iraq's active co-operation and that affirms the Security Council's central role at each a stage; and finally a requirement … our unity."

74. Inspections had already achieved "important results". There had been good progress in understanding Iraq's nuclear capacity and no chemical or biological agents had been detected, including in the empty warheads discovered on 16 January.

75. There were "still grey areas in Iraq's co-operation" and the inspectors had "reported real difficulties". The uncertainties reported by Dr Blix were "not acceptable". France had evidence of Iraq's capacity to produce chemical agents and the possible possession of significant stocks of anthrax and botulism toxin, and possibly a production capability. The absence of long range delivery systems reduced the threat of those weapons, but there were "disturbing signs of Iraq's continued determination to acquire ballistic missiles" beyond the range permitted.

76. Mr de Villepin called for a "demanding démarche anchored in resolution 1441" from the Council. France did not rule out recourse to force but, before going down that road, consideration had to be given as to whether the nature and the scope of the threat justified force. The United Nations had to be "at the centre of the action to guarantee Iraq's unity, ensure the region's stability, protect civilians and preserve the unity of the world community".

77. Mr de Villepin proposed arrangements to strengthen the inspections regime and to agree a list of unresolved disarmament questions and a "demanding and realistic timeframe" to address them. Iraq needed to do more. But France was convinced disarmament could succeed if the international community devoted all its energy to it and maintained its unity and cohesion.

78. Mr Mohammed Aldouri, Iraqi Permanent Representative to UN, challenged the "incorrect allegations" in Secretary Powell statement and reiterated that Iraq had no weapons of mass destruction. He stated that inspectors had visited the sites identified in US and UK reports in September and October and "none of the allegations" were true. He also rebutted statements made by President Bush in his State of the Union Address on 28 January (see Section 3.6).

79. Mr Aldouri reaffirmed Iraq's commitment to pro-active co-operation with the inspectors so that they could verify that Iraq was free of weapons of mass destruction, sanctions could be lifted, and progress could be made on regional security by ridding the whole Middle East of WMD.

80. Reporting on the discussion, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that Mr Straw and Ms Ana Palacio, the Spanish Foreign Minister, had strongly supported Secretary Powell's presentation and Mrs Soledad Alvear, the Chilean Foreign Minister, had made a "noticeably stronger intervention".[19] Most other countries had, however, argued for more time.

81. Sir Jeremy commented:

> "A dramatic day. Powell's presentation was impressive – at the higher end of expectations. It has pushed the rock further up the hill. It has also helpfully raised the bar of inspections by underlining that the Iraqis will need to answer real questions about their activities if they are to satisfy the inspectors …
>
> "But I do not think it was decisive. Most Council members reiterated familiar positions. The most significant shift was the … Chileans. French ideas … had an air of desperation about them. But they could be the straw which many in the Council attempt to grasp as the option other than war."

82. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry that Secretary Powell had given:

> "… an extremely impressive presentation of the evidence we had of Iraqi WMD, but it was not decisive. There wasn't a smoking gun there in the presentation. There hadn't been a smoking gun presented by the inspectors to the Security Council, and it seemed to many members of the Security Council that Secretary Powell was trying too hard to establish a case for which there was no clear proof … it didn't convert the unconverted."[20]

83. President Bush wrote:

> "Colin's presentation was exhaustive, eloquent and persuasive. Coming against the backdrop of Saddam's defiance of the weapons inspectors, it had a profound impact on the public debate. Later, many of the assertions in Colin's speech would prove inaccurate. But at the time, his words reflected the considered judgement of intelligence agencies at home and around the world."[21]

84. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote:

"… I was impressed with his delivery but I was most concerned about the substance. He did not produce any evidence of the 'smoking gun' variety, despite effectively claiming to possess such evidence. Worse, I was not alone in thinking that Powell himself did not appear as though he entirely believed his own case."[22]

85. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that, in private discussions over lunch, Mr Annan commented that the forthcoming visit to Baghdad by Dr Blix and Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, could be used to tell Iraq that the Security Council "unanimously insisted on much improved co-operation".[23]

86. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix had said he was grateful for the information provided by Secretary Powell, which he would study carefully. If there were things hidden in Iraq, the inspectors would try to find them. He had welcomed the Council's wish to stay united and the message that Iraq must co-operate actively:

"This could not be a game of catch-as-catch-can. Co-operation had to be spontaneous. UNMOVIC could do a lot with more resources and improved equipment. But Iraq was a big country. What really counted was active co-operation on the South Africa model."

87. Dr ElBaradei had "echoed" most of what Dr Blix had said: "There were plenty of things to be clarified by the Iraqis … Iraqi co-operation must improve in a dramatic way."

88. Asked by Secretary Powell to explain his idea of reinforced inspections, Sir Jeremy reported that Mr de Villepin stated he believed:

"… there was space between fully active co-operation and war for other options … The Middle East was complex. A broader strategy was needed. Force had to be the very last resort, and then only with the legitimacy of the UN. To win the peace after the war, the involvement of the UN was essential. The inspection regime under 1441 allowed the Council this further possibility. Only if they [the inspectors] met a deadlock would we need to come back to 1441. We could not afford to go to a bloody, long, expensive war on the basis of impatience. Other states would draw the conclusion that you needed nuclear weapons to avoid attack: compare North Korea. Such crises had to be solved by the international community collectively.

"So the answer … was to use 1441 fully. Reinforce the inspectors. If after a time it did not work, then force could be considered. The problems of the world had to be solved through collective responsibility … If the route he had set out proved unsuccessful, then France would assume its responsibilities with the rest."

89. Other points made during the discussion included:

- Mr Joschka Fischer, the German Vice-Chancellor and Foreign Minister, supported Mr de Villepin's proposals for strengthened inspections.
- Ms Palacio said that it was the message to Saddam Hussein that a change of will was needed that had to be strengthened, not the inspections.
- Mr Straw said that more inspectors and equipment would not solve anything. The fundamental point was that "Iraq was not complying. If there was co-operation, there was no need for greater numbers. If there was no co-operation, higher numbers could not help." The inspectors needed intellectual evidence, "Yet Iraqi scientists had been terrorised into silence." Mr de Villepin's proposal was "a chimera, a false message. And it would lead to split in the Council." The key was co-operation.
- Mr Ivanov stated that there were complaints, but the inspectors had to continue and Russia would help. President Putin had asked him to set out a list of the current problems and work with the Iraqis to solve them. "Baghdad could hardly change overnight … Pressure would be needed. But the opportunities for a political settlement were far from being exhausted."

90. Sir Jeremy reported that, as Council President, Mr Fischer had tried to sum up that:

"There was agreement the Council should send out the message that a very serious point had been reached. This was a major crisis with widespread consequences. War would be very damaging. 1441 had to be implemented fully. Inspections must continue: there was no contradiction between that and the presence of sharp instruments. The message to Baghdad had to be that they now had to deliver."

91. Secretary Powell had not, however allowed that to stand. He had listened to the arguments for a peaceful solution but the Council had "so far been denied that". The US:

"… was not fixated on war … But he would not accept the premise that the world could not accept the risks. He hoped it would not come to war. But war could even produce good results. If it came to that point, the US would be happy to act with a coalition of the willing under the authority of the UN, in the full understanding of the risk of unintended consequences and of the overall situation in the Middle East. Too much time had already gone by."

92. In his memoir, Mr Annan recounted the exchanges during that lunch in some detail, commenting that it captured:

> "… as few other moments do in that year of extraordinary drama and diplomatic maneuvering [sic], the depth of passions, and the way in which the question of Iraq became about something far larger: the foundations of peace and security, and the place of the United Nations as the sole legitimate authority to endorse the use of force except in cases of self-defense."[24]

93. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, reported that the US Administration:

- was satisfied with the impact of Secretary Powell's presentation;
- hoped that it might help to capture the swing vote in the Security Council; and
- believed that the session had shown that the US had gone the extra mile along the UN route.[25]

94. President Bush had announced that the US would welcome and support a new resolution "which made clear that the Security Council stood behind its previous demands"; and that he had "repeated his resolve to lead a coalition of the willing if necessary to disarm the Iraqi regime".

95. Sir Christopher also reported that support for action was growing. An NBC poll published on 5 February showed that 60 percent of Americans supported military action in Iraq, and the number of Americans who would strike without UN support had increased from 29 percent in January to 37 percent.

Cabinet, 6 February 2003

96. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 6 February that if Iraq's non-compliance continued, a fresh resolution would be sought from the Security Council.

97. Mr Straw told Cabinet it should be possible to gain consensus on such a resolution.

98. Cabinet agreed that Ministers should actively make the case for the Government's position on Iraq.

99. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 6 February that "the Government's policy on Iraq was on track".[26] If the UN inspectors continued to report Iraqi "non-compliance with its obligations", a fresh resolution would be sought from the Security Council. There was "mounting impatience on the part of Arab countries" with Saddam Hussein and their opinion would be "more favourable to military action if the US pushed the Middle East Peace Process forward so that the agenda of the international community did not appear one-sided". Following his discussion with President Bush, on 31 January, Mr Blair reported US willingness to re-engage.

100. Mr Blair said that the next step was for Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to return to Baghdad:

> "It was possible that Saddam Hussein would show some movement towards compliance; the Coalition military build-up would continue in the Gulf; and planning for the aftermath of military action and humanitarian relief needed greater emphasis."

101. France had "proposed more resources to support the inspectors", but Mr Blair said that "the issue was rather the lack of Iraqi co-operation, including their failure to explain the weapons of mass destruction material which had been logged as missing in 1999, and the intimidation of scientists whom the inspectors wished to interview".

102. Mr Blair also stated that it was important to use the UN process to address the agenda of the international community more broadly, such as on North Korea and the proliferation of WMD more generally. The "likely identity of interest between rogue states and terrorists who wanted to acquire weapons of mass destruction" was "of particular concern". The "presence of Al Qaida terrorists in Iraq was a reality which was part of the changing picture".

103. Mr Straw said that Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council had been made "forensically and calmly, with well chosen examples from intelligence of Iraqi mendacity". The "true colour and substance of the Iraqi regime had been highlighted".

104. Mr Straw's view was that "it should be possible to gain consensus for a further resolution" if the inspectors returned "without real concessions on Iraqi compliance". The focus "had to remain" on the UN route: "We could now be entering the final phase" with the next report to the Council on 14 February.

105. Mr Straw also said that the aftermath was "being discussed intensively" with Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, and Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary.

106. The points made in discussion included:

- The use of the word "aftermath" was "ill-chosen: it incorrectly implied that Iraq would be utterly destroyed by military conflict whereas we should gear our thinking around the future of the people of Iraq and their interests".
- The reconstruction and development of Iraq would "provide opportunities for British companies to be involved".

- The focus after hostilities "had to be on civil society which had suffered 35 years of tyranny that had reduced the country to the point where 60 percent of the population relied on United Nations food programmes".
- The US inter-agency process to address Iraq's redevelopment after any military action was being led by the Pentagon.
- It was "essential" that the UN should be involved in Iraq's redevelopment after any military action "to avoid the military coalition being viewed as an army of occupation".
- The nature of a further resolution "would depend on the circumstances at the time, but it was likely that there would be a period between the adoption of a resolution and the start of any military action so that a final ultimatum could be given for the departure of the current Iraqi regime".
- International consensus in support of military action would "encourage public support" in the UK.
- Some people "did not recognise the lessons we had learned from not confronting tyranny in Kosovo, Afghanistan, and now Iraq".
- Briefing on the Government's position on Iraq "should be improved and disseminated widely; it was clear that colleagues were operating at different levels of knowledge, and it would be helpful if the best possible information about the facts were available to enable them to advance the best possible arguments".
- Parliament would need an opportunity to debate any further UN resolution.

107. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said that:

> "… Ministers needed to be active with their supporters, both inside and outside Parliament, to make the case. Briefing material had to be improved so that the facts were drawn together in a coherent form under various headings: the Iraqi regime; the United Nations' involvement; non- compliance by Iraq with the weapons inspectors; the humanitarian angle, all of which would need to be updated regularly."

108. The UK would continue to pursue the UN route. That was "important in respect of Iraq, but it was also necessary in dealing with a dysfunctional world where a broad agenda had to be addressed to deal with poverty, the Middle East Peace Process, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction".

109. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that:

- Mr Blair had "put a pretty optimistic face" on the reports of his meetings with President Bush and President Chirac.
- Mr Robin Cook, then Leader of the House of Commons, had quizzed on the Parliamentary process.

- Dr John Reid, Minister without Portfolio and Labour Party Chair, "said he was troubled about the lack of domestic consensus, that there was a sense of people losing their moral compass about the nature of the Iraqi regime".
- Ms Tessa Jowell, the Culture, Media and Sport Secretary, "didn't know anyone under twenty five who supported action and we had to do better at countering the scepticism".[27]

110. Following Cabinet, Mr Blair asked Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), "to provide a confidential and intelligence based briefing on Iraq for small groups of Ministers attending Cabinet". The briefing would "take as its starting point Part 1 of the Government's dossier published last September" and cover:

- the "latest assessment of Iraq's holding of weapons of mass destruction";
- the Iraqi response to resolution 1441;
- "recent developments in Iraq and our current assessment of the cohesion of the regime";
- "Iraq and terrorism".[28]

Four "briefing sessions" were offered the following week.

111. The content of those briefings is addressed in Section 4.3.

Meetings with Dr Blix and ElBaradei, 6 February 2003

112. In meetings on 6 February, Mr Blair told Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei that he doubted Saddam Hussein would co-operate. He argued that a second resolution would provide a basis for mobilising the international community to persuade Saddam Hussein to leave. A tough line was the best way to avoid conflict.

113. Mr Straw told Dr ElBaradei that Saddam Hussein would choose exile only if he thought it was his last chance of survival.

114. Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC's next quarterly report, due on 1 March, would identify "clusters" of issues that could be used to pose sharp questions for Iraq, possibly as part of an ultimatum.

115. Dr Blix reminded Mr Blair that the material described as "unaccounted for" in UNSCOM's report of 1999 was not necessarily present in Iraq; and that it would be "paradoxical to go to war for something that might turn out to be very little".

116. Dr Blix told Mr Straw he thought Iraq had prohibited programmes, and it "definitely possessed the ability to jump-start BW programmes".

117. Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei met Mr Blair and Mr Straw on 6 February, before a visit to Baghdad on 8 to 9 February.[29]

118. The FCO briefing note stated that:

> "Since the Prime Minister last saw Blix on 17 January, he has hardly put a foot wrong. His statement to the UN Security Council (UNSC) on 27 January was stronger than many expected: in particular he helpfully made clear that Iraq was not offering the full and active co-operation that the UNSC expected, and there were serious unanswered questions, and that Iraq still did not accept that it had to disarm."[30]

119. In the meeting with Mr Blair, Dr Blix registered a number of questions about Secretary Powell's briefing to the Security Council the previous day.[31] He also said that intelligence leads had so far produced only one success.

120. The record of the meeting stated that Dr Blix:

> "… would seek to resolve three relatively minor points related to process: U2 overflights, interviews, and Iraqi domestic legislation. His approach would be that the Iraqis had better come up with co-operation on substance … If Saddam decided to be as helpful on substance as he was on process, fine."

121. Mr Blair doubted that Saddam Hussein would co-operate:

> "He would try some trick to divide the Security Council. Retaining his WMD was essential to his own view of his grip on Iraq."

122. Dr Blix reminded Mr Blair that: "UNSCOM had not reported that the 1999 left-overs were present in Iraq, just that they were unaccounted for." UNMOVIC was more cautious than the UK, but Dr Blix agreed that if Iraq did not have documents it should be more eager to allow interviews to go ahead. There was a stalemate on the issue. The inspectors might have to ask for interviews without minders, but Dr Blix was uneasy about risking people's lives.

123. Dr Blix was reported to have informed Mr Blair that his report to the Security Council on 14 February would probably contain a "balance sheet". His last assessment had been "honest but harsh"; the next might have to say that the inspectors "had not found any WMD".

[31] Letter Rycroft to Owen, 6 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meetings with Blix and ElBaradei, 6 February'.

124. Dr Blix suggested that the next quarterly report under resolution 1284, due on 1 March:

> "… might be the moment to set out clear, crisp questions based on the clusters … If he surfaced those … questions now, Iraq would simply demand six months to answer them. It would be better to use them as part of an ultimatum …"

125. In response to a comment by Mr Blair that containment "was not a long term policy, and sanctions caused misery to the Iraqi people", Dr Blix "commented that it would be paradoxical to go to war for something that might turn out to be very little". Mr Blair replied that "if Saddam had no or little WMD he should prove it".

126. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, reported that Sir David Manning had:

> "… underlined we were confident of our judgements on Iraq's CBW. If the inspectors had difficulty finding it, this was because Saddam was not co-operating."

127. In response to a question from Dr Blix about when Saddam Hussein might crack, Mr Blair:

> "… thought the moment of maximum pressure might be after a second resolution (following a clear Blix report) when the Arab world might encourage Saddam and his immediate entourage to leave Iraq. The logic was that Iraq was not co-operating; we should have a second resolution saying he was in breach; and then we should mobilise the international community to try and get him to leave so that we did not have to resort to military action. The best way to avoid a conflict would be to take a very tough line."

128. Mr Campbell wrote that Dr Blix felt that Secretary Powell had done well but was avoiding comment.[32] Dr Blix was "pretty cagey" and had "made clear his job was to be sceptical". Dr Blix was talking to Iraq about enhanced co-operation and trying to resolve the issues of anthrax and VX: "On the remnants of old programmes they should be able to tell us."

129. Dr Blix had told Mr Blair that South Africa was sending a delegation to Iraq to tell them how to give up WMD. The inspectors had been to some of the places named in the dossier, "and it could be that they had been sanitised, but they found nothing". By 14 February, Dr Blix "would be saying they had not found WMD but there was no real co-operation. He didn't want to name scientists for interview for fear that they would be killed." Dr Blix "felt … 14 February was a little early to report to the UN [Security Council]".

---

[32] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

130. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair "said he felt Iraq would come up with some surprise to split the international community, that intelligence showed he would regard giving up WMD as a total humiliation, and it was essential to his internal grip".

131. Mr Campbell commented that Dr Blix "was a lot less bullish than last time and clearly fed up with the feeling he was being bullied by America".

132. In his subsequent meeting with Mr Straw, Dr Blix was reported to have told Mr Straw that his next report to the Security Council might include what the Iraqis had not yet proved they did not have, rather than much evidence of what UNMOVIC had found.[33]

133. Dr Blix had clear indications that anthrax had been weaponised and his personal judgement was that Iraq did have programmes and definitely possessed the ability to jump-start BW programmes. The trick would be to find evidence.

134. Dr Blix also told Mr Straw that if the Al Samoud missiles were found to be illegal, they would be destroyed. That could force a real confrontation with the Iraqis who were not keen to lose billions of dollars of armaments at a time when they were threatened with military action.

135. Dr ElBaradei was reported to have told Mr Straw that he would press Iraq hard on possible uranium imports and interviews. He did not expect much movement from Iraq and tough messages from the international community could only help the inspectors.

136. When Dr ElBaradei raised the possibility of building an option for exile into the second resolution, Mr Straw responded that Saddam Hussein would "choose exile (if at all) only if he was convinced that was his only chance of survival". Mr Straw did not favour including it in a second resolution. If a strong resolution was passed, there would be "enough time [for Saddam Hussein] to consider his options" and for "high level envoys to help him make the right choice".

137. Mr Straw encouraged Dr ElBaradei to focus on interviews; the UK had portable "safe rooms" and could provide them to the IAEA and UNMOVIC if it helped. Dr ElBaradei reported that the scientists he had interviewed were clearly extremely nervous, but he saw great difficulties with conducting interviews overseas.

138. The record of the discussion with Mr Blair reported that Dr ElBaradei thought opinion was moving towards a second resolution.[34]

[34] Letter Rycroft to Owen, 6 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meetings with Blix and El-Baradei, 6 February'.

139. Dr ElBaradei told Mr Blair:

> "Not all members agreed with the US timing … Iraq was not co-operating. Unless there were clear signs of an Iraqi change of heart on co-operation, (both process, including interviews, and substance), UNSCR 1441 would have to be implemented. Not allowing interviews was a lack of full co-operation … dribbling out concessions was not full co-operation … His 14 February report would be a clear as possible."

140. In Dr ElBaradei's view, CBW was the key.

141. On nuclear issues, the inspectors continued to assess the aluminium tubes. Reports of the possible import of uranium were: "Much more disturbing … There could only be one reason for such an import."

142. Dr ElBaradei told Mr Blair:

> "If satisfactory co-operation was not forthcoming, the next best outcome would be to force Saddam … out … [He] did not oppose more time for inspections. Any war would risk radicalising the region. It should be UN-controlled. As should the future Iraq …"

143. The No.10 record stated that Mr Blair had made clear to both Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei "the importance of putting Iraqis on the spot with some sharp questions, to show whether they were co-operating fully or not". He had "also emphasised the importance of interviews".

144. In Mr Blair's view: "Our best chance of avoiding war was a clear verdict from the inspectors followed by a massive international effort to get Saddam to go."

145. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had told Dr ElBaradei that:

> "… we had to sort out Saddam in as peaceful way as possible, but above all sort out MEPP. Saddam's duty was one hundred per cent co-operation, not hide and seek … [I]f there was a breach, there would be second resolution and then we could build pressure on him to go."[35]

146. Mr Campbell also wrote that Dr ElBaradei:

- had said the Iraqis claimed they never tried to get uranium but it wasn't true;
- did not think many tears would be shed in the Arab world if Saddam went;
- was worried that Iraq would claim it was being attacked not because of weapons but because they were a Muslim country;
- felt it would be better if Mr Blair and President Bush could say it was part of a vision of a zone free of nuclear weapons;

---

[35] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

- said the IAEA strategy was to force Saddam Hussein into co-operation, though he doubted it was possible;
- came back again and again to the theme that American public diplomacy wasn't working; and
- said we needed intrusive inspections but it could not be done without active co-operation.

147. At the FCO Iraq morning meeting on 7 February, it was reported that Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had both expressed concern that plans for a second resolution should factor in the need to allow the weapons inspectors time to get out of Iraq.[36]

President Bush's statement, 6 February 2003

148. In a statement on 6 February, President Bush said that Saddam Hussein was throwing away his final opportunity to disarm voluntarily.

149. President Bush reiterated that he would "welcome" a second resolution, as he stated in the press conference with Mr Blair on 31 January, "which made clear the Security Council stands behind its previous demands".

150. The "game" was "over" and the US was resolved to take whatever action was necessary to defend itself and to disarm the Iraqi regime.

151. On 5 February, Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed President Bush's statement and the possibility that he might "lean forward" on a second resolution.[37] President Bush would not seek a second resolution for its own sake, but he was open to one if others wanted it.

152. In a statement on 6 February, President Bush emphasised the challenges of uncovering secret information in a totalitarian society.[38] He stated that Iraqi violations of Security Council resolutions were "evident, and they continue to this hour".
The Iraqi regime had "never accounted for a vast arsenal of deadly biological and chemical weapons" and it was "pursuing an elaborate campaign to conceal its weapons materiels, and to hide or intimidate key experts and scientists", directed "from the very highest levels".

153. President Bush set out examples of Iraq's violations, including:

- "Firsthand witnesses have informed us that Iraq has at least seven mobile factories for the production of biological agents" that "could produce within just months hundreds of pounds of biological poisons".

- The possibility of unmanned aerial vehicles with spray tanks for biological agents being "launched from a vessel off the American coast" which "could reach hundreds of miles inland".
- Iraq might pass weapons of mass destruction to terrorists, had "provided Al Qaida with chemical and biological weapons training", and was "harbouring a terrorist network, headed by a senior Al Qaida terrorist planner". That network ran "a poison and explosive training center in northeast Iraq", was "responsible for the murder … of an American diplomat", and "was caught producing poisons in London".

154. President Bush stated that resolution 1441 had given Saddam Hussein a final chance, and that he was "throwing that chance away". Having made its demands, the Security Council "must not back down, when those demands are defied and mocked by a dictator".

155. Referring to a second resolution, President Bush stated:

> "The United States would welcome and support a resolution which makes clear that the Security Council stands behind its previous demands. Yet resolutions mean little without resolve. And the United States, along with a growing coalition of nations, is resolved to take whatever action is necessary to defend ourselves and disarm the Iraqi regime.
>
> "… We will not wait to see what terrorists and terrorist states could do with chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear weapons. Saddam Hussein can now be expected to begin another round of empty concessions, transparently false denials. No doubt, he will play a last-minute game of deception. The game is over.
>
> "All the world can rise to this moment … The United Nations can renew its purpose and be a source of stability and security in the world. The Security Council can affirm that it is able and prepared to meet future challenges … And we can give the Iraqi people their chance to live in freedom and choose their own government.
>
> "… Saddam Hussein has the motive and the means and the recklessness and hatred to threaten the American people. Saddam Hussein will be stopped."

Mr Blair's interview on Newsnight, 6 February 2003

156. In his interview on Newsnight on 6 February 2003, Mr Blair said that the UK would act without a second resolution only if the inspectors reported that they could not do their job and a resolution was vetoed unreasonably.

157. Mr Blair also stated that the UK would not take military action without a majority in the Security Council.

158. Mr Blair gave an extended interview about Iraq and public services on BBC Television's Newsnight on 6 February.[39]

159. During the interview Mr Jeremy Paxman challenged Mr Blair on a number of issues, including:

- whether Iraq posed a clear and imminent danger to the UK or was a potential future threat;
- what had changed since Mr Blair had stated in November 2000 that Saddam Hussein was being effectively contained;
- that the inspectors had not been "thrown out" of Iraq in 1998, but had withdrawn;
- whether, if the inspectors were present in Iraq, it would be "impossible for Saddam Hussein to continue developing weapons of mass destruction";
- what evidence there was of Iraqi concealment;
- how much time and space the inspectors needed to do their job;
- whether Mr Blair would "give an undertaking" that he would "seek another UN resolution specifically authorising the use of force";
- the absence of links between Baghdad and Al Qaida; and
- why action against Iraq was the priority, not other states with WMD.

160. The key elements of Mr Blair's responses to Mr Paxman and related questions from a panel of voters are set out below.

161. Explaining his position on a second resolution, Mr Blair stated that "the only circumstances in which we would agree to use force" would be with a further resolution "except for one caveat". That was:

> "If the inspectors do report that they can't do their work properly because Iraq is not co-operating there's no doubt that under the terms of the existing United Nations resolution that that's a breach of the resolution. In those circumstances there should be a further resolution.
> "… If a country unreasonably in those circumstances put down a veto then I would consider action outside of that."

162. Pressed whether he considered he was "absolutely free to defy the express will of the Security Council", Mr Blair responded that he could not "just do it with America", there would have to be "a majority in the Security Council":

> "[The] issue of a veto doesn't even arise unless you get a majority in the Security Council. Secondly, the choice … is … If the will of the UN is the thing that is most important and I agree that it is, if there is a breach of resolution 1441… and we do nothing then we have flouted the will of the UN."

---

[39] BBC News, 6 February 2003, Transcript of Blair's Iraq Interview.

163. Asked if he was saying that there was already an authorisation for war, Mr Blair responded:

> "No, what I am saying is … In the resolution [1441] … we said that Iraq … had … a final opportunity to comply.
>
> "The duty of compliance was defined as full co-operation with the UN inspectors. The resolution … say[s] any failure to co-operate fully is a breach of this resolution and serious consequences i.e. action, would follow … [W]e then also put in that resolution that there will be a further discussion in the Security Council. But the clear understanding was that if the inspectors say that Iraq is not complying and there is a breach … then we have to act.
> "… if someone … says … I accept there's a breach … but I'm issuing a veto I think that would be unreasonable … I don't think that's what will happen. I think that … if the inspectors do end up in a situation where they're saying there is not compliance by Iraq, then I think a second resolution will issue."

164. Asked whether he agreed it was "important to get France, Russia and Germany on board", Mr Blair replied, "Yes … That's what I am trying to get."

165. Asked if he would "give an undertaking that he wouldn't go to war without their agreement", Mr Blair replied:

> "… supposing in circumstances where there plainly was breach … and everyone else wished to take action, one of them put down a veto. In those circumstances it would be unreasonable.
> "Then I think it [not to act] would be wrong because otherwise you couldn't uphold the UN. Because you would have passed your resolution and then you'd have failed to act on it."

166. Asked whether it was for the UK to judge what was "unreasonable", Mr Blair envisaged that would be in circumstances where the inspectors, not the UK, had reported to the Council that they could not do their job.

167. Asked if the US and UK went ahead without a UN resolution would any other country listen to the UN in the future, Mr Blair replied that there was "only one set of circumstances" in which that would happen. Resolution 1441 "effectively" said that if the inspectors said they could not do their job, a second resolution would issue: "If someone then … vetoes wrongly, what do we do?"

THE UK'S POSITION, 7 FEBRUARY 2003

168. The FCO sent guidance on "key UN aspects" of the UK's policy on Iraq to diplomatic posts on 7 February.[40] Extracts from the guidance are summarised in the Box below.

FCO guidance on the UK's position, 7 February 2003

Can anyone launch military action without a further Security Council resolution?

- Mr Straw had said that, if there was a material breach, the Government's preference was for a second resolution. So far the Security Council had "faced up to its responsibilities". The UK believed it would continue to do so, but had to "reserve our position in the event it does not".
- Any failure by Iraq to comply would have serious consequences. The action necessary to bring Iraq into compliance would "depend on the circumstances at the time".

Does Iraq's declaration of 7 December mean that Iraq is co-operating?

- The declaration did not contain "any new evidence that would eliminate the outstanding disarmament questions or reduce their number"; and it was "not the full and complete declaration required by resolution 1441".
- Mr Straw had published a list of "10 outstanding questions, identified by Dr Blix, that Iraq must answer".[41]
- "Saddam and his officials would do well to remember that concealment is not compliance. Only declarations supported by evidence will give confidence in a country with such a long history … of avoiding disclosures."

Is Iraq co-operating with inspectors?

- Dr Blix's update of 27 January had "highlighted a number of instances of Iraqi non-co-operation …: failing to answer outstanding issues, identified by UNSCOM; obstructing U2 reconnaissance flights; hindering interviews; some instances of harassment of the inspectors".

Is Iraq in material breach?

- Resolution 1441 was clear: "false statements or omissions in the declaration and failure to co-operate fully with the inspectors shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations".
- Mr Straw had made clear "Iraq has failed both tests". The "inescapable conclusion" was that Iraq was "now in material breach". War was "not inevitable. But the responsibility to avoid conflict rests with Saddam Hussein."

[40] Telegram 65 FCO London to Abidjan, 7 February 2003, 'Iraq: UN Aspects'.
[41] The National Archives, 28 January 2003, Iraq is in Material Breach of Resolution 1441.

Did Mr Straw's judgement that Iraq is in material breach mean the UK is taking the issue to the Council under paragraph 4 of the resolution and "going for a second resolution authorising military action"?

- "The Council, through its meetings last week, and in future meetings such as those scheduled for 5 and 14 February, is continuously assessing Iraq's compliance."
- "Resolution 1441 warned that Iraq would face 'serious consequences' if it failed to comply. We expect the Security Council to live up to its responsibilities."

How much time is left?

- "It is not a matter of time it is a matter of attitude. And the attitude we're getting from the Iraqis at the moment is just not sufficient for the eradication of the programmes we know about."

What chance is there of Security Council agreement to authorise the use of force?

- The unanimous adoption of resolution 1441 showed the "clear determination" of the Council to ensure Iraq fulfilled its obligations; it was "the toughest resolution on Iraq for years. Iraqis and others should be in no doubt that members of the Council are determined to ensure its implementation."

UNMOVIC's powers/chances of success?

- The UK Government was "committed" to giving UNMOVIC the necessary support.
- Iraq was "concealing WMD programmes … including through the use of mobile facilities and hindering inspectors' efforts to interview personnel".
- "Inspectors are not meant to be detectives. While they will verify the accuracy, completeness and credibility of Iraq's declarations, the onus is on Iraq to show they have no WMD. It is up to them to co-operate … and to demonstrate to the international community they that they are committed to eliminating the threat of WMD …"

Timetable?

- Iraq had submitted its declaration by the deadline required.
- Inspections had started on 27 November, "ahead of the 23 December deadline required by resolution 1441" and Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had updated the Council 60 days later. They had offered another update on 14 February.

Mr Annan's speech, 8 February 2003

169. In a speech on 8 February, Mr Annan stated that Iraq had not yet satisfied the Security Council that it had fully disarmed, and that success in getting Iraq to disarm by inspections would be a great prize.

170. Mr Annan also stated that the United Nations had a duty to exhaust all the possibilities for a peaceful settlement before resorting to the use of force; but if that time came the Council "must face up to its responsibilities".

171. Mr Annan called for unity and warned of the consequences of the use of force without the legitimacy provided by the Security Council.

172. In a speech in Williamsburg, Virginia, on 8 February 2003, Mr Annan addressed the "anxiety, in this country and throughout the world about the prospect of war in Iraq".[42] He stated:

- The UN had been founded "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war", which "We all – and, first and foremost, the leaders of Iraq itself – have a duty to prevent it if we possibly can."
- But "there would be times when force must be met with force"; and there were provisions in the UN Charter "to enable the world community to unite against aggression and defeat it".
- Iraq had "not yet satisfied the Security Council that it has fully disarmed itself of weapons of mass destruction".
- That was "an issue not for any State alone, but for the international community as a whole. When States decide to use force, not in self-defence but to deal with broader threats to international peace and security, there is no substitute for the unique legitimacy provided by the United Nations Security Council. States and peoples around the world attach fundamental importance to such legitimacy, and to the international rule of law."
- It was "vitally important" that the whole international community acted in a "united way – so as to achieve greater security by strengthening, and not weakening or undermining, the multilateral treaties on disarmament and non-proliferation. Only a collective, multilateral approach can effectively curb the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and make the world a safer place."
- The UN had "the duty to exhaust all the possibilities of peaceful settlement, before resorting to the use of force".
- It was "thanks in large part to the firm challenge issued by President Bush – and the pressure that followed it – that the inspectors are back in Iraq".
- There was "total unanimity" that "Iraq must disarm, and must do so pro-actively".
- Success in getting Iraq to disarm "by effective and credible inspections" would be a great prize.
- If Iraq failed to make use of the "last chance" provided in resolution 1441, and continued its defiance, the Council would "have to make another grim choice, based on the findings of the inspectors … And when that time comes, the Council must face up to its responsibilities."
- In his experience, the Council met its responsibilities "best and most effectively when its members work in unison. The Council should proceed in a determined, reflective and deliberate manner. Its measures must be seen as firm, effective, [42] UN Security Council Press Release, 10 February 2003, Secretary-General says United Nations has duty to exhaust all possibilities of peaceful settlement before resorting to use of force (SG/SM/8600).

credible and reasonable not only by the Council members, but by the public at large."

- What happened in Iraq would "not take place in a vacuum"; it had "implications – for better or worse – for other issues of great importance to the US and to the world. For instance, it will greatly affect the climate in which we conduct our struggle against international terrorism."
- The UN and the US were successful when there was "strong US leadership, exercised through patient diplomatic persuasion and coalition-building". The UN was "most useful to all its Members, including the US" when it was "united, and works as a source of collective action rather than discord".

Discussions in Baghdad, 8 to 9 February 2003

Dr Blix's account of the discussions in Baghdad on 8 and 9 February recorded that they had been "professional and had shed some new light, but had not really brought any new evidence".[43] He and Dr ElBaradei had been given new assurances that people would be "encourage[d]" to provide interviews without minders or recording equipment and the mandate for the special commission appointed to search for any remaining chemical weapons was extended to cover any prohibited items, but the questions about U-2 flights remained unresolved until shortly after the visit.

Dr Blix concluded that they "had obtained much less than we felt was needed" but their "overall impression" had been that the Iraqis were genuinely rattled". The Iraqis continued to do "too little, too late".

Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei reported the discussion to the Security Council on 14 February.

The impact of military action on the terrorist threat to the UK

173. The Security Service warned on 6 February that Al Qaida would use an attack on Iraq to step up activity in the UK.

174. Mr Blair had a meeting with Mr Hoon, Mr Straw, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS)), Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS)), Ms Eliza Manningham-Buller (Director General of the Security Service), Mr Scarlett, Air Commodore Mike Heath (Head of the MOD Directorate of Targeting and Information Operations), and No.10 officials on 6 February, during which he was briefed on the targeting aspects of an air campaign, for his meetings with Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei, and on the terrorist threats to UK interests.[44]

175. Mr Campbell wrote:

> "C [Sir Richard Dearlove] reported that Blix was making clear there could be no aggressive inspections in mosques and cemeteries. He also said that no serious interviews had taken place at all because there had been so much intimidation.

> "Eliza [Manningham-Buller] gave a very gloomy picture of the terrorist scene here, said that even though Al Qaida were not directly linked to Iraq, they would use an attack on Iraq to step up activity here. TB [Mr Blair] was looking really worried at that point."[45]

176. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair had "said he had no doubt that trying to remove Saddam quickly in the event of action was the best way, but he wanted to know what he was in for". C and Mr Scarlett had "said that there were suggestions that the Republican Guard were to be kept out of Baghdad because Saddam didn't trust them fully".

JIC ASSESSMENTS, 10 AND 19 FEBRUARY 2003

177. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment of 10 February reiterated earlier warnings, described in Section 3.5, that:

- Al Qaida and associated networks would remain the greatest terrorist threat to the UK and its activity would increase at the onset of any military action against Iraq.
- In the event of imminent regime collapse, Iraqi chemical and biological material could be transferred to terrorists, including Al Qaida.

178. At the request of the MOD and the FCO, on 10 February the JIC assessed "broader terrorist activity that would be triggered by war with Iraq".[46]

179. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- The threat from Al Qaida will increase at the onset of any military action against Iraq. They will target Coalition forces and other Western interests in the Middle East. Attacks against Western interests elsewhere are also likely, especially in the US and UK, for maximum impact. The worldwide threat from other Islamist terrorist groups and individuals will increase significantly.
- Al Qaida associates and sympathisers may well attempt chemical or biological terrorist attacks in the Gulf, including against UK civilian targets there, in the event of war with Iraq. While individual attacks are likely to be small-scale they may be numerous. Individual attacks might inflict relatively few casualties, but will cause significant alarm.
- Al Qaida associated terrorists in Iraq and in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone in Northern Iraq could conduct attacks against Coalition forces and interests during, or in the aftermath of, war with Iraq. But Al Qaida will not carry out attacks under Iraqi direction.

[46] JIC Assessment, 10 February 2003, 'International Terrorism: War with Iraq'.

- Saddam's own capability to conduct terrorist attacks is limited, especially outside the Middle East. But the threat of terrorism conducted or directed by Iraqi Intelligence, including the use of chemical or biological material, cannot be discounted.
- In the event of imminent regime collapse, Iraqi chemical and biological material could be transferred to terrorists including Al Qaida, whether or not as deliberate regime policy.
- Al Qaida and associated networks will remain the greatest terrorist threat to the UK. The risk of attacks will increase following any Coalition attack on Iraq.
- Hizballah's terrorist wing will not conduct attacks in support of Saddam. But it may attack US forces in Iraq following a campaign, if it judges that the US intends to act against Hizballah, Syria or Iran. […] Individual Palestinian terrorists may attack Western interests, without sanction from parent groups."

180. Other key elements from the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 10 February 2003: 'International Terrorism: War with Iraq'

Al Qaida and other Islamist terrorists

- There was "continuing determination by Al Qaida and other Islamist terrorists to attack Western interests around the globe".
- The JIC had "previously judged that Al Qaida and other Islamist terrorists may initiate attacks in response to Coalition military action against Iraq, and that Al Qaida will use an attack on Iraq as further justification for terrorist attacks in the West and Israel".
- Some reports indicated that Usama Bin Laden had "instructed that there should be no terrorist attacks before the start of a conflict".
- Al Qaida intended "to exploit both anti-Western sentiment within the Muslim world, and the preoccupation of the US and UK that would come from action against Iraq".
- Al Qaida or associated groups might "also seek to conduct attacks against Israel, intended to provoke a reaction that would further inflame feeling within the Islamic world".
- The JIC believed that Islamist terrorists had manufactured and stockpiled chemical and biological (CB) material intended for attacks against both UK and US targets in the Gulf, and that: "Instructions for production of similar CB materials" had been "distributed by Gulf-based terrorists to extremists".
- The JIC had "some doubts about the viability of the proposed attack methods", but judged there was "a serious intention to use CB weapons".
- "Even if successful, individual attacks might inflict relatively few casualties. But attacks could be numerous and cause significant alarm."
- The use of CB materials was "an increasing aspiration of Islamic extremists globally, including in Europe".
- "Such material may be manufactured locally or provided by production facilities such as that operating in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone (KAZ) in Northern Iraq."

- There was "no intelligence" that Iraq had "provided CB materials to Al Qaida".
- The JIC continued "to judge that in the event of imminent regime collapse there would be a risk of transfer of such material, whether or not as deliberate Iraqi regime policy".
- The JIC also judged that Al Qaida retained "its long-standing interest in acquiring a nuclear device", but had "no convincing intelligence that it has done so".

Al Qaida in Iraq

- There was "no intelligence" to suggest that Al Qaida planned to carry out attacks under Iraqi direction.
- Intelligence showed "the presence of Al Qaida associated extremists in Baghdad. […] We do not know what the current presence is, its purpose, or what relationship it has to Saddam's regime, if any."
- The JIC judged that it was "unlikely that the Iraqi regime" were "unaware" of the Al Qaida presence but it did not know whether those terrorists planned to conduct activities in or from Iraq.
- Intelligence suggested "the presence of […] Al Qaida-linked terrorists in North Eastern Iraq, in the KAZ, with safe haven provided by Ansar al-Islam, an Al Qaida-associated extremist group".
- "Some of these individuals" were "involved in production and distribution of CB materials".
- Intelligence showed that extremists continued to arrive in the region.
- The terrorists might "re-locate in the event of imminent Coalition action" but "equally they could conduct terrorist activities (including possible use of CB materials) or guerrilla actions against Coalition forces in Iraq".

Iraqi terrorism

- The JIC had previously judged that Saddam Hussein "would aspire to conduct terrorist attacks against Coalition interests in the event of military action against him, or possibly if he believed an attack was inevitable".
- Authoritative reporting suggested that "Iraqi Intelligence (DGI) has little reach or capability outside Iraq".
- The JIC had "no intelligence of Iraqi intentions to conduct CB terrorist attacks using DGI or its agents; but such activity remains a possibility".
- Iraqi plans for terrorist activity in the event of conflict would be:

  "… dependent on individual operatives' willingness to implement them, which will be in doubt if they perceive regime change to be certain. But the threat from terrorism conducted or directed by DGI cannot be discounted."

181. Addressing the prospects for the future, the JIC Assessment concluded:

"Despite a significant body of intelligence on Iraq's preparations to conduct terrorism against Western interests, […], we have seen no persuasive evidence that these efforts will be effective. Al Qaida and associated groups will continue to represent by far the greatest terrorist threat to Western interests, and that threat will be heightened by military action against Iraq. The broader threat from Islamist terrorists will also increase in the event of war, reflecting intensified anti-US/anti-Western sentiment in the Muslim world, including among Muslim communities in the West. And there is a risk that the transfer of CB material or expertise, during or in the aftermath of conflict, will enhance Al Qaida's capabilities."

182. On 11 February, Usama Bin Laden issued a call for Muslims everywhere to take up arms in defence of Iraq.[47] That was followed on 16 February by a call for "compulsory jihad" by Muslims against the West.

183. A Security Service report in February 2003 concluded:

"Iraq is unlikely to use terrorism to attack the worldwide interests of the US and its allies prior to military action."[48]

184. A further JIC Assessment on 19 February predicted that the upward trend in the reports of threats to the UK was likely to continue.

185. On 19 February, the JIC updated the December 2002 Assessment of the continuing threat posed by Al Qaida and associated extremists, including to the UK.[49]

186. The JIC's Key Judgements were that:

- A high impact, spectacular, attack is a priority for Al Qaida, most likely against American or British interests in the Gulf, US or UK. Al Qaida will also seek to conduct frequent, perhaps multiple, small-scale attacks.
- The threat from Islamist terrorists, including Al Qaida, will increase in the event of war with Iraq.
- Attacks in the UK could include use of chemical and biological agents, probably on a small-scale (though potentially causing significant alarm). But conventional attacks remain more likely. UK interests are now on a par with US targets for some Islamist terrorists, although the US is likely to remain the priority for most.
- Both large and small-scale attacks overseas could include use of chemical, biological (or radiological) materials.
- Bin Laden's 11 February statement is probably linked to Al Qaida's intent to attack Coalition targets in the event of war with Iraq, rather than intended to trigger attacks before then.
- There are differences within the leadership of Al Qaida over strategy, although these do not so far appear to indicate any diminution of the threat."

[48] Report Security Service, 18 February 2003.
[49] JIC Assessment, 19 February 2003, 'International Terrorism: The Current Threat from Islamic Extremists'.

187. Other key elements from the Assessment were:

- There were suggestions that UK interests were "on a par with US targets for some Islamist terrorists" although it was "likely that the US" would "remain the priority for most".
- The threat of a "conventional' attack" in the UK remained "a major concern".
- The "threat of CB attacks in the UK" remained; they "would probably be small-scale (but potentially high impact)".
- There had been "a particularly high number of threat reports" during the previous "two months", although "only a small proportion" would "materialise into terrorist action".
- The "upward trend" was "likely to continue" as a possible conflict with Iraq approached.
- Usama Bin Laden's statement of 11 February was "unlikely to be the trigger for attacks by Islamist extremists", although it would "enable him to take credit for attacks conducted in response to a war with Iraq".

188. An update of the 10 February Assessment, of terrorist activity which would be triggered by military action in Iraq, was produced by the JIC on 12 March.[50] That is addressed in Section 3.8.

UK consideration of the timing and tactics for a second resolution

189. The FCO advised No.10 on 10 February that only four votes in the Security Council could be counted on for a second resolution. It would be impossible to obtain support for a resolution explicitly authorising the use of "all necessary means" to disarm Iraq.

190. The key element in the resolution would be a sufficient link to resolution 1441 to establish that the Security Council has concluded that Iraq had failed to take its final opportunity.

191. The FCO identified three options and planned to discuss the approach with the US before tabling a draft resolution following Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei's report to the Security Council on 14 February.

192. On 7 February, Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, reported to Mr Straw that the UK's strategy on Iraq was approaching "the critical phase".[51] Sir Jeremy Greenstock had advised that here was "no prospect" of getting an explicit "all necessary means" provision in a resolution. Lord Goldsmith had been consulted about more implicit options.

---

[50] JIC Assessment, 12 March 2003, 'International Terrorism: War with Iraq: Update'.
[51] Minute Ricketts to Private Secretary [FCO], 7 February 2003, 'Iraq Strategy'.

193. Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw that possible elements for a resolution included an ultimatum (to allow the possibility of persuading Saddam Hussein to leave to be explored) and a possible reference to a further resolution authorising post-conflict work.

194. Mr Ricketts suggested that the right channel for discussing text with the US would be through the UN Missions in New York, and highlighted the need for an intensive campaign, in close co-ordination with the US, to lobby other members of the Security Council.

195. Mr Straw endorsed the recommendations.[52]

196. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that he had reassured Mr Annan that it was unlikely that the UK would circulate a draft resolution the following week.[53] There were likely to be difficulties in the Council.

197. In a discussion with Ambassador John Negroponte, US Permanent Representative to the UN, Sir Jeremy had emphasised the importance of a draft which "helped bring people on board". That would determine whether to include an ultimatum and whether to mention "serious consequences" or "all necessary means".

198. Mr Straw's Private Office forwarded advice on the timings and tactics for a second resolution to Sir David Manning on 10 February.[54]

199. The FCO advised:

- Only four votes in the Security Council (the US, UK, Bulgaria and Spain) could be "counted on" for a second resolution.
- Russia, Chile and Pakistan could be "moving in our direction" and China also seemed "to be moving away from a veto".
- France, Germany and Syria remained "strongly opposed" and Mexico was "highly sceptical". The position of France and President Chirac was described as "heavily dependent on strength of evidence".
- Guinea, Cameroon and Angola might be "coming round to supporting a second resolution but needed working on".

200. The FCO provided a more detailed matrix summarising the positions of the UN Security Council members with proposals for further lobbying by the UK and others, but concluded that "without more dramatic evidence of Iraqi non-compliance, most members of the UNSC will remain non-committal".

201. On the text of a second resolution, the FCO advised that it would be "impossible to obtain support for a second resolution explicitly authorising 'all necessary means'".

[54] Letter Owen to Manning, 10 February 2003, 'Iraq: Second Resolution'.

202. The FCO identified three options which, it believed, met the legal requirements and reflected Lord Goldsmith's advice, that "the key element of any resolution would be a sufficient link back [to] resolution 1441, to establish that the [Security] Council has concluded that Iraq has failed to take its 'final opportunity'".

203. All three options included a first operative paragraph (OP) stating that the Security Council decided that:

> "Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it in resolution 1441 (2002) by submitting a declaration pursuant to that resolution containing [false statements and] omissions and by failing to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of, that resolution".

204. The options also included a final OP determining that the Council had decided "to remain seized of the matter".

205. The difference between the three options was whether to include an additional OP containing an "ultimatum", "couched in general terms".

206. To avoid the risk of opening up the debate about whether a further determination that Iraq had failed to comply with the ultimatum was needed from the Security Council, the FCO proposed "a formula which would, in effect, authorise action against Iraq unless the Council took the decision that Iraq had decided to come into compliance".

207. The FCO draft proposed: "unless … the Council concludes before 5 March that the Government of Iraq has taken an unconditional and irreversible decision [at the highest levels] to come into compliance with its obligations under resolution 1441 (2002) and previous relevant resolutions" either:

- "the final opportunity granted to Iraq in resolution 1441 (2002) will expire on 5 March 2003"; or
- "Iraq will face the serious consequences it has been repeatedly warned of, including in paragraph 13 of resolution 1441 (2202)".

208. The draft provided for the decision to be "based on" reports from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei.

209. The FCO explained that it was:

> "… possible to imagine more explicit options, particularly those which include an explicit finding that Iraq is in 'material breach'. This would not be strictly necessary from a legal point of view. But, as a matter of tactics, we will need to consider with the Americans whether we should start with a more ambitious text …"

210. The FCO aim was to agree the text and tactics with the US in New York "in the course of next week", but not to "float" the ideas with other Council members until after Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 14 February, although that might depend on events.

211. Copies of the letter were sent to Lord Goldsmith and to Mr Hoon's Private Office as well as to Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir Christopher Meyer.

212. Lord Goldsmith's advice, that the key element of a second resolution would be the provision of a sufficient link back to resolution 1441 to establish that the Security Council had concluded Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity to disarm provided by the resolution,[55] is addressed in Section 5.

Tripartite declaration, 10 February 2003

213. Der Spiegel published an article on 10 February, entitled The Mirage Project, reporting that French and German officials had been holding secret talks aimed at installing a disarmament regime in Iraq monitored by aircraft patrolling Iraqi airspace and "thousands" of armed UN peacekeepers to "secure a victory without bullets".[56]

214. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, sent a translation of the article to Mr Blair suggesting that the UK needed to produce an ultimatum in a UN resolution along the lines that:

- Iraq was not co-operating or disarming.
- The international community intended to ensure that resolution 1441 was "implemented in full".
- Iraq would face serious consequences if by 28 February it did not accept and begin full implementation of the following steps:
  - a "No-Fly Zone covering the whole country", patrolled by international aircraft;
  - an international ground force to "enforce disarmament", comprising an "international coalition of the willing headed by a British general with approx 40,000 troops";
  - a "UN mandate for governance of Iraq while the international force is there making Iraq a UN protectorate under a UN permanent co-ordinator"; and
  - establishment of a "special UN court of justice" to "punish infringements of the resolutions and human rights infringements".[57]

215. France, Germany and Russia issued a tripartite declaration on 10 February, reaffirming the objective of disarming Iraq as soon as possible but stating that potential of resolution 1441 for peaceful disarmament had not yet been fully explored.

216. Sir John Holmes described the declaration as "a symbolic act" which was "significant".

217. In a press conference in Paris on 10 February, President Chirac and President Putin issued a tripartite declaration on behalf of the Governments of France, Germany and Russia which stressed the alternatives to the use of force, and the need to give peaceful disarmament every opportunity.[58]

218. The main points of the declaration were:

- Reaffirmation that disarmament of Iraq in accordance with a series of resolutions following resolution 687 (1991) remained the common aim of the international community and must be achieved as soon as possible.
- The solution "must be inspired" by the principles of the UN Charter as stated recently by Mr Annan in his speech of 8 February.
- Resolution 1441 (2002) offered a framework but its "possibilities" had "not yet been fully explored".
- Inspections had "already yielded results".
- The three countries favoured "the continuation of the inspections and the substantial strengthening of their human and technical capacities by all possible means".
- There was "still an alternative to war".
- The use of force could "only be considered as a last resort".
- The three countries were "determined to give every chance to the peaceful disarmament of Iraq".
- Iraq had to "co-operate actively" with the inspectors and "face up to its responsibilities in full".
- The position expressed reflected that "of a large number of countries, particularly within the Security Council".

219. Sir John Holmes, told the Inquiry that the tripartite declaration was: "a symbolic act … to say something very different from what we and others were saying at the time", which "was, of course, significant".[59]

[59] Public hearing, 29 June 2010, page 37.

220. The British Embassy Moscow reported on 13 February that, during the visit to France, President Putin had said "so far we see no need to exercise our right of veto"; and it was also reported that he had then said that "with France or alone", Russia would veto an "unreasonable use of force".[60] He had described the tripartite declaration as "the first attempt since the Second World War to settle a serious and acute international issue outside the regime of blocs"; and "if we want the world to be more predictable, and easier to forecast, and therefore a safer place, it should be a multipolar world".

221. The Embassy also reported that, referring to the veto in a subsequent conversation with journalists in Bordeaux, President Putin had said: "We have used this right more than once, and we can do it again." He had also warned against "fuelling controversy over this issue", and stressed that "Russia will never return to the state of conflict with its partners either in Europe or North America."

222. The Embassy commented that President Putin's remarks in France had "had a harder edge to them. But this is probably in part a negotiating tactic in advance of the series of key events … over the next few days; and in part a desire to please his host." The French Embassy in Moscow continued to "believe that Russia would not veto" a second resolution.

The US position, 10 and 11 February 2003

223. After consultations in New York on 10 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the US priority was to "pour cold water" on the tripartite proposals.

224. The US was "very hesitant" about the UK's ideas for an ultimatum.

225. Following discussions in New York on 10 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the US had agreed there should be no action in the Security Council until after 14 February; the immediate priority was "to pour cold water on the latest Franco-German ideas".[61]

226. Sir Jeremy also reported that France had written to Dr Blix to expand its ideas for strengthening the inspection regime, drawing on the tripartite declaration, but had declined to share the text until Dr Blix had responded.

227. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the US was "still very hesitant about any variant of the ultimatum", because it would give the Security Council a second chance to consider whether the ultimatum had been implemented. By putting the onus on the reports of the inspectors, it could also give them an effective veto. Sir Jeremy had informed Ambassador Negroponte that the UK needed "a second stage of Council action beyond 1441, and a determination, even implicit, of material breach. After further discussion, Negroponte had "conceded the possibility of issuing an ultimatum provided that we had the lock in our favour".

228. Separately, Sir Jeremy Greenstock provided a revised draft resolution.[62] The draft, which had been agreed with the US, recalled the provisions of previous resolutions including resolution 1441 and, anticipating the reports from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 14 February, added a draft preambular paragraph (PP) suggesting that the Security Council was "Deeply concerned" that the reports had "made clear" that Iraq had "not co-operated fully with inspections nor addressed deficiencies in the declaration" submitted pursuant to resolution 1441.

229. The draft resolution proposed that the Security Council should decide that "Iraq's submission of a declaration containing false statements and omissions and continuing failure to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, resolution 1441 (2002)" constituted "a further material breach of Iraq's obligations under relevant resolutions of the Council and that Iraq accordingly has failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it by the Council in resolution 1441 (2002)".

230. The draft did not contain a deadline, but stated that "Iraq alone" was "fully responsible for the serious consequences it must now face as a result of its continued violations of its obligations under the resolutions of the Council"; and that the Council had decided "to remain seized of the matter".

231. Sir Christopher Meyer advised that President Bush would not tolerate another two months of negotiations. Washington was getting ready for war in mid- to late March, although it did not want to act alone.

232. In preparation for a visit to Washington by Mr Hoon (see Section 6.2), Sir Christopher Meyer advised overnight on 10/11 February that: "Washington is getting ready for war."[63]

233. Sir Christopher wrote:

> "For the Administration and the Hill the time has come to go to war. Powell's presentation to the UNSC has boosted public support for war, including support for action without UN approval, provided that some Allies join in. In Congress it has silenced most of those who were asking for more evidence. The cautious multilateralists of both parties now accept that the case has been made …

mid- to late March. The military will be fully in place, and, the White House believes, political support, both domestically and within the region, will wane, the longer Bush is seen to prevaricate."

234. Sir Christopher commented that the US Administration considered that Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei's visit to Baghdad had achieved "next to nothing". It knew:

"… full well that some in the UNSC will seize on the faintest glimmer of hope of Iraqi co-operation as a reason to delay decisions. The US bottom line remains full Iraqi co-operation …"

235. Sir Christopher also commented:

"Although militarily capable of doing so, the US does not want to go it alone. On the Sunday talk shows, Powell and Rice highlighted the support of eighteen European allies and of Turkey and Jordan …"

236. Referring to the "shenanigans in NATO over precautionary planning for the defence of Turkey", Sir Christopher added:

"These tussles with the international system will only deepen US scepticism about a role for the UN in managing the aftermath in Iraq."

237. Mr Blair suggested to President Bush on 11 February that a second resolution might include a decision that Iraq was in material breach, an ultimatum that Saddam should leave, and a timeline.

238. When he telephoned President Bush on 11 February, Mr Blair discussed opinions in the UK and international community, including the reports of a Franco-German "plan" which had appeared in Der Spiegel and the forthcoming European Council.[64]

239. Mr Blair suggested that a second resolution might include three main points:

- a decision that Iraq was in material breach of UNSCR 1441;
- an ultimatum that Saddam should leave; and
- a timeline.

Even if the ultimatum failed, it would show that the UK had been prepared to resolve the issue peacefully right to the end.

240. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the need for US action if a second resolution was to be achieved.

[64] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 11 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Conversation with Bush, 11 February'.

241. Mr Campbell wrote that, during the telephone call, President Bush had been "very solicitous" about Mr Blair's political position and had "said he was determined to help" get a second resolution.[65]

242. The record of the discussion confirms Mr Campbell's comment.[66]

243. Mr Campbell also wrote that President Bush had been "livid with the French and Germans, less so with the Russians.[67] But he was just as worried as TB was." Mr Blair "said the problem was everyone accepted Saddam was bad, evil, and a threat, but they didn't necessarily believe that gave you a reason to go to war. We had to be the people putting forward one last push for peace."

244. In a subsequent conversation with Dr Rice, Sir David Manning said that in his report on 14 February, Dr Blix would need to answer the questions which had been raised at the end of January. They were central to the issue of non-co-operation.[68]

245. In a discussion on public opinion, Sir David Manning said that the position in the UK was:

> "… a great deal more difficult … There was a strong wish to find a peaceful way of disarming Saddam and avoid taking military action. French and German claims that this was still possible were seized on eagerly, however implausible the proposals …"

246. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed the possibility of public statements from President Bush emphasising that resolving the Iraq crisis through the UN was critical to the future of the Security Council. Sir David encouraged Dr Rice to consider whether President Bush would be willing to speak out strongly about the need to give new impetus to the MEPP: "That would have a great impact" on international opinion.

247. Mr Campbell wrote that, on 11 February, Mr Blair had "decided that maybe we took the wrong line" on the Der Spiegel report, "maybe we should say it was interesting because it accepted conventional inspections wouldn't work and was effectively arguing for taking the country over without saying so". Mr Blair and No.10 officials had "grasped our way to a plan that was basically wait for Blix, then surface the elements of a second resolution that included the ultimatum, then Saddam to go, and if he didn't we were going to go for it".[69]

248. Sir John Holmes reported that he had been informed that little more had been discussed between Presidents Putin and Chirac than had appeared in the declaration; the report in Der Spiegel was "extravagant"; and France had never raised the idea of UN peacekeeping forces.[70]

Mr Straw's speech, 11 February 2003

249. Mr Straw set out a detailed case for confronting the challenge posed by Iraq in a speech to the International Institute for Strategic Studies on 11 February.

250. In a speech made at the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) on 11 February, Mr Straw set out "the disturbing outcome of a failure to act decisively to secure Iraq's disarmament" and the need, "for the sake of the Iraqi people, long-term stability in the Middle East, the credibility of the UN and the cause of international law and collective security", to confront the challenge posed by Iraq.[71]

251. Mr Straw argued that international terrorism and the proliferation of WMD were the "crucial strategic questions of our time" and the response to those threats would "determine the stability of the world for generations to come". That was "an awesome responsibility" which called for "courageous leadership" and required "the vision and foresight to act decisively and – if necessary – with military force before our worst nightmares are realised".

252. Saddam Hussein's regime typified the threat in which rogue regimes sheltered individuals plotting "mayhem and mass murder in our streets". Mr Straw stated:

> "Weapons of mass destruction have been a central pillar of Saddam's dictatorship since the 1980s. He has amassed poisons and viruses both to suppress his own people, and to threaten his neighbours. He has relentlessly pursued his ultimate ambition, the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability, in flagrant disregard of SCRs and Iraq's obligations as a non-nuclear weapons state under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. His pursuit of these weapons has lain at the heart of the UN's stand-off with Iraq for the past 12 years."

253. Examining "six of the most commonly expressed arguments about the UK Government's approach", Mr Straw argued that:

- The Iraqi threat to Europe and the US was not "overstated". Resolution 1441 recognised the "singular menace" from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. UNSCOM had had some successes, including overseeing the destruction of "significant quantities" of weaponry, but when the inspectors left in 1998, it was "clear that the regime continued to hold vast stocks of deadly weaponry". The absence of inspectors since 1998 had "allowed Saddam to accelerate his weapons programmes". The report published in autumn 2002 (the September dossier) had "demonstrated determined efforts" to enhance Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical capabilities. Dr Blix's report to the Security Council in January had "underlined these concerns". Diplomacy, intelligence co-operation, reinforced export controls, and interdiction and disruption of supplies were options being used to "frustrate the ambitions" of other regimes. But "in respect of Iraq", those options had been "exhausted … over 12 long years". It was the "deadly combination of capability and intent" which made Saddam Hussein "uniquely dangerous". Rogue regimes which showed "total disregard for the rule of law, and share the terrorists' hatred of our values" were the "most likely source of materials and know-how". Given Saddam Hussein's "longstanding support for terrorist causes", the "terrifying possibility that his poisons and diseases" would "find their way into the hands of Al Qaida and its sympathisers" could not be ruled out.

- Backing diplomatic efforts with the credible threat of force did not undermine international law. Law required enforcement and Iraq's failure to comply with "23 out of 27 separate obligations under Chapter VII of the UN Charter" had "done great harm to the UN's credibility". Failure "to back our words with deeds" would "follow one of the most catastrophic precedents in history": the failure of the League of Nations to face up to the challenges of the 1930s. If the weapons inspectors confirmed "the behaviour which has put Iraq in continuing material breach, then the case for a second resolution will be overwhelming".
- Disarmament by force could be needed even if containment was working. The key was Iraq's immediate compliance with resolution 1441 and its active co-operation to ensure its disarmament. The "proposals" for a No-Fly Zone covering the whole of Iraq and for thousands of UN troops to assist and protect the inspectors were "simply not feasible in the absence of complete Iraqi co-operation" and "not necessary" if there was "co-operation". If the weapons inspectors were "unable to provide" a guarantee that Iraq was complying with its obligations, Iraq would "have to face the 'serious consequences'" defined in resolution 1441; disarmament by force. The UK did not want war and hoped that "Saddam Hussein would recognise the gravity of the situation and embark on the pathway to peaceful disarmament", but "the time had arrived to back our demands with the credible threat of force".
- Military action would not have a disproportionate effect on the Iraqi people or the wider region. The UK had to "strain every sinew, even at this late stage, to avoid war; to force Saddam to face the fact that he has to comply; to offer, as we have already, an escape route to exile for him and his entourage". But if military action did "prove necessary", "huge efforts" would "be made to ensure that the suffering of the Iraqi people" was "as limited as is possible". The Iraqi people deserved "the chance to live fulfilling lives free from the oppression and terror of Saddam"; and to "choose their own destiny and government, and to pursue a prosperous life within a safe environment". The UK's first objective was disarmament, but the "next priority would be to work with the United Nations to help the Iraqi people recover … and allow their country to move towards one that is ruled by law, respects international obligations and provides effective and representative government".

- Control of Iraq's oil was not the motivation for action. The mission was disarmament. Iraq's oilfields would be protected from any acts of environmental terrorism, and the revenue generated would be used to benefit the Iraqi people.
- The UK was not guilty of double standards in relation to the conflict between Israel and Palestine. The UK was "working tirelessly" to achieve the implementation of UN Security Council resolutions in respect of Israel/Palestine; a conflict that had "long provided terrorists with a convenient rallying point". As long as that dispute was unresolved, collective security would "remain elusive".

Discussions on the timing and content of a second resolution

254. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that the UK wanted to delay tabling a resolution until after a special European Council which would take place on 17 February.

255. The US continued to resist UK proposals for a draft resolution containing either an ultimatum to Saddam to leave or a timetable for a decision.

256. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke three times on 11 February.

257. In the first conversation, they discussed US reservations about including an ultimatum in the resolution and the timing of a draft.[72]

258. Following a discussion with Mr Blair, Mr Straw telephoned Secretary Powell to set out concerns that tabling a resolution before the European Council would be interpreted as pre-empting the meeting.[73] Mr Straw stated that the "critical thing" on both timing and content would be "what tactically was most likely to ensure nine votes and no veto". He had asked Sir Jeremy Greenstock for a menu of options.

259. Secretary Powell had asked whether Mr Blair really wanted an ultimatum in the resolution; it might be better for it to be delivered personally by President Bush or Mr Blair.

260. The record of the FCO Iraq evening meeting on 11 February reported that Mr Blair and Mr Straw had agreed that the UK would run with the text of a draft resolution agreed between the US and UK Missions to the UN in New York which did not include any ultimatum or deadline.[74]

261. In a third conversation, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell again discussed the timing and the US reservations about including an ultimatum.[75]

262. Mr Straw reported that he had argued in favour of inclusion, but it had subsequently occurred to him that it might be possible to table a simple resolution and discuss the merits of an ultimatum with partners. If that attracted a consensus, it could be adopted. That could be less difficult than starting off with an ultimatum and then dropping it from a resolution.

263. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that the US wanted to keep the option of tabling the resolution immediately after the reports to the Security Council on 14 February to send the message that the US and UK were not going to wait around.

264. Sir Jeremy also stated that Security Council members would be very reluctant to grant cover for military action within weeks and the draft resolution might not secure nine positive votes.

265. The FCO instructions to the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York (UKMIS New York) on 11 February set out the questions the UK wanted Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to address: "to ensure that the 14 February update … is as uncomfortable as possible for the Iraqis … and ensure the Iraqis cannot avoid the hard questions."[76]

266. Following consultations with Ambassador Negroponte on 11 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that Washington was coming to the conclusion that it might be necessary to table the draft resolution on 14 February to keep a priority place for the US/UK language, provide an alternative to the Franco-German proposals and create an "implication that the US/UK were not going to wait around".[77]

267. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Rice's response to the UK "ultimatum ideas" had been "reluctant".

268. Sir Jeremy also reported that, in a conversation between Mr John Howard, the Australian Prime Minister, and Mr Annan, Dr Blix had said "there was no evidence of a fundamental shift in the Iraqi approach, though he 'detected the possibility of a shift in the future'". Mr Annan was reported to have:

> "… given … the impression that he accepted the inevitability of military action at some point, but was focused on gaining more time: not for the inspectors, because he realised the limitations; more for the Security Council, as he saw that more than a few days would be needed to find language that brought people together."

269. Commenting on the debate in London on ideas for the final stages of diplomatic activity, Sir Jeremy advised that the Franco-German proposals for reinforced inspections would be:

"… recognised by the Security Council middle ground as a delaying tactic and unlikely to make a difference on complete disarmament … But Council members remain very reluctant to grant cover for military action within weeks … The Americans may be upbeat about the likely effect of their lobbying and cajoling. But I cannot say at this point that we would definitely get nine votes for a material breach resolution on the basis of what seem to be the Blix/ElBaradei intentions for the 14 February report.

"Injecting an ultimatum … might possibly help at the margins … though I would hesitate to bank on it. If the ultimatum was directed at Saddam's departure … that would be a clearer criterion than offering up elements of WMD. But the Americans are right that the Council majority are expressly opposed to the idea of regime change …"

270. Sir Jeremy suggested consideration of "a more radical halfway-house plan":

"If the UK has to be sure of recapturing the initiative, we may have to think bolder. We should test the Franco-German model to destruction. A Chapter VII resolution authorising all necessary means for the specific purpose of hunting down hidden WMD is worth considering. The objective has to be to place enough Coalition troops on the ground, with No-Fly and No-Drive Zones declared by the Security Council throughout Iraq, for mobile WMD transports etc to be tracked down, revealed and destroyed. Baghdad and other major cities would be left to one side, at least for the first stage. There could be arrangements for interviews offering greater protection than the present."

271. Sir Jeremy thought that, when faced with the alternatives, Council members would "rally to this approach". But it might not "readily fit" the American "military preferences". Sir Jeremy wrote:

"… the most important aspect … would be Saddam's reaction. He would bitterly oppose a UN-authorised take-over of parts of Iraq. If it were imposed on him, he might quickly break the no-resistance conditions. In that case, the 'last resort' would have been much more clearly established."

272. Sir Jeremy concluded:

"This plan does not have to be used immediately. We could go through the stages of presenting and arguing for the second resolution of the kind we have been discussing, before coming to a final decision. But the prospects of a 15-0 SCR

(even the Arabs might see the advantages, provided the end-objective was an Iraq for Iraqis), and of a stronger consensus in the EU and NATO, needs to be weighed against all the lateral implications of the wave we are riding at present."

273. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that there was a need to regain the political and public relations initiative.

274. Mr Blair was considering the approach to a second resolution.

275. Mr Blair had also identified the need to make the case publicly that the US and the UK were making 'one last push for peace'.

276. On 12 February, Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed the progress of inspections, including the outcome of the visit by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to Baghdad.[78] Sir David commented that the inspectors only needed intelligence because Iraq was not co-operating.

277. Sir David Manning also gave Dr Rice an account of the UK's current thinking on a second resolution, which he described as "very much work in progress". He reported that Mr Blair had "yet to take any decisions"; the UK and US now had to regain the political and public relations initiative.

278. Mr Blair would be making a major speech that weekend to "set out the arguments again, but to do so in the context of one last pitch for peace". Mr Blair "would probably say that the time had come to accept that Saddam was in breach of 1441 and that we should now table a second resolution insisting that he must go or face the consequences". Sir David said that the ultimatum need not be in the resolution itself, but that "we must indicate our readiness to allow to Saddam to leave within a short, specified period so offering the chance of avoiding war".

279. Sir David also outlined Mr Blair's plan to write to Mr Costas Simitis, the Greek Prime Minister in advance of the European Council, and the need to generate momentum to attract support.

280. Commenting on the position after the call, Sir David wrote that the UK would need to think further about the timing for tabling the draft resolution over the next 24 hours.

281. The UK decided to continue to explore the possibility of including an ultimatum in the resolution with the US.

282. The FCO informed Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 12 February that Ministers were "broadly content" with the draft resolution he had provided the previous day (following discussions on 10 February) but had decided, before receipt of his later advice, that the UK should continue to explore with the US the possibility of adding an ultimatum, aimed particularly at getting Saddam to step down, to the draft resolution.[79]

283. Two possible options for an ultimatum in a draft resolution were set out:

> "Decides that unless the Council concludes before x March 2003 that a government has emerged in Iraq which [intends to] [has demonstrated its intention to] [has taken an unconditional and irreversible decision to] come into compliance with its obligations under resolution 1441 (2002) and previous relevant resolutions, Iraq will face the serious consequences it has been repeatedly warned of, including in para 13 of resolution 1441 (2002)."

Or:

> "Decides that unless the Council concludes before x March 2003 that the government of Iraq has taken an unconditional and irreversible decision to come into compliance with its obligations under resolution 1441 (2002) and previous relevant resolutions, Iraq will face the serious consequences it has repeatedly been warned of, including in para 13 of resolution 1441 (2002)."

284. The telegram also set out the option, identified by Mr Straw following his third conversation with Secretary Powell on 11 February, of taking soundings before tabling an ultimatum.

285. In relation to Sir Jeremy's own suggestions, the FCO took the view that there would be "serious obstacles". It did not think that authorising all necessary means to hunt down WMD would meet the disarmament objectives, particularly if Baghdad and other cities were left aside. The key was:

> "… co-operation rather than resources. For example work on BW can be very easily concealed under legitimate guises … Without full access to documents and full co-operation from personnel, it would be impossible to guarantee success."

286. The FCO also identified difficulties with providing scientists "adequate protection while they remain under Saddam's regime", and practical problems with assembling and protecting a UN force.

287. The record of the FCO Iraq evening meeting on 12 February reported concerns that some members of the US Administration were "increasingly inclined" to table the resolution straight after Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 14 February.[80]

288. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Dr Blix that the US was worried about losing backing and momentum and saw only one way to deal with Iraq's non-co-operation.

289. Sir Jeremy recommended that in the Security Council meeting on 14 February, the UK should seek to draw out the truth about non-co-operation.

290. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that he had told Dr Blix on 12 February that an ultimatum remained an option and that they had discussed how to create a concrete ultimatum which required Iraqi co-operation on substance.[81]

291. Sir Jeremy had set out the UK position that:

> "… pushing for reinforced inspections was a mistake. The Security Council needed to realise that Saddam was in denial of 1441 and there had to be a firm decision that he either gave up his WMD or left Iraq, or faced military action."

292. In response to Dr Blix's questions about the issue coming to a head after only two and a half months and the timing of military action, Sir Jeremy had replied that, "more than the climate", the "US was worried about losing backing and momentum and saw only one way to deal with Iraqi non-co-operation. That was why we were running out of time". He had "added" that he had "always felt that the best way to keep the UN together was through a WMD find which demonstrated the Iraqi lie". In Sir Jeremy's view, "by distracting from the main issue of Iraqi co-operation and giving the Iraqis false hope, the French ideas could make war more likely".

293. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix had also raised the possibility of using UNMOVIC expertise in a post-war scenario.

294. Commenting on the conversation, Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix "genuinely believes that inspections still have something to contribute, but could not claim that he had acquired anything of substance out of the recent period". Dr Blix was:

> "… torn between time for more peaceful disarmament through inspections and helping to pile on the pressure to make the Iraqis crack. He would have been more inclined to follow the latter course if he felt less certain that the Americans were hell-bent on war anyway."

295. Sir Jeremy suggested that Mr Straw should use his intervention in the Council meeting on 14 February to pose questions for Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei "that draw out the non-co-operation truths".

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS, 12 FEBRUARY 2003

296. Mr Blair told the House of Commons on 12 February that the Security Council should be the judge of whether there was full and complete co-operation from Iraq with the inspectors.

---

[81] Telegram 247 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 13 February 2003, 'Iraq: Conversation with Dr Blix'.

297. Mr Blair also emphasised the costs to the Iraqi people of continuing the policy of containment.

298. Mr Blair was asked several questions on Iraq during Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) on 12 February.[82]

299. In response to questions about whether he would support Dr Blix if he asked on 14 February for more time for inspections, Mr Blair said that the UK would "take full account of anything" Dr Blix said, but the issue was about Iraq's co-operation and the time needed to make a judgement about whether that was happening:

> "… the judgement that has to be made in the end is one by the Security Council as to whether there is full and complete co-operation by Iraq with the United Nations inspectors."

300. Mr Blair warned that there was a:

> "… danger that we get sucked back into delays of months then years, with the inspectors playing a game of hide and seek with Saddam and we are unable then to shut down the weapons of mass destruction programme … that everyone accepts is a threat and a danger to the world."

301. Asked whether military action would make peace in the Middle East more likely and Britain less of a target for terrorists, Mr Blair replied that if Saddam Hussein had "complied fully" with resolution 1441, conflict would not be an issue. The choice was Saddam's, but:

> "… if we fail to implement resolution 1441, and if we lack the determination and resolution to make sure that that mandate is carried, the consequence will be that Saddam is free to develop weapons of mass destruction. Also there will be an increasing risk that the threat of those weapons of mass destruction and the existing terrorist threat will join together. This country will then be less secure and safe."

302. Asked why people were not persuaded of the threat, Mr Blair replied that it would "be different if there is a second resolution". People believed that Saddam Hussein was "evil" and that there was "a threat to this country from his accumulated weapons of mass destruction", but they asked if there was an alternative to war. That alternative was "full and complete co-operation".

303. Asked what new, proven or imminent threat there was to justify war, Mr Blair said that had been identified in resolution 1441 and the preceding 12 years and that there were two ways to deal with it, disarmament or sanctions. If there was a decision to go to war, the morality of that "should weigh heavily on our conscience because innocent people die as well as the guilty in a war". But the way in which Saddam Hussein had implemented the policy of sanctions meant that too was "a moral choice with bad and devastating consequences for the Iraqi people".

304. Asked about the origins and accuracy of the dossier produced by No.10, ('Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation' – see Section 4.3), Mr Blair said that the part of the document that dealt with intelligence was from intelligence sources and was accurate, as was the document as a whole.

305. In his memoir, Mr Cook wrote:

> "What was novel … was the way in which Tony has shifted the terms in which he justifies military intervention. For the first time he argued that war would be preferable to sanctions because of the suffering and malnutrition that comes in the wake of sanctions."[83]

UK views on UNMOVIC inspections

306. At Sir Richard Dearlove's request, his Private Secretary sent an update on the progress of inspections to Sir David Manning on 12 February.[84]

307. Sir David was told that the strike rate in relation to the UK intelligence-led inspections was low, but it had been responsible for two out of three UNMOVIC finds to date, from more than 550 inspections. In addition, "even where there is no WMD, something else has often been concealed […] Our inspections have revealed the Iraqi game."

308. Sir Richard's update also stated that "we needed to keep going in the expectation that an intelligence-led inspection would lead to a find or a solid refusal of entry".

309. Sir David sent the letter to Mr Powell with the comment: "More inspections ahead – but time getting very short."[85]

310. The UK used about 30 separate pieces of intelligence from human sources and satellite imagery covering 19 sites to provide leads for the UN inspectors. UNMOVIC visited seven of those sites, made a partial examination of one more and subjected one further site to an inspection by ground-penetrating radar.[86]

311. In a 'Note' produced on 12 February, the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) Counter Proliferation Support Group reported that UNMOVIC and the IAEA had conducted over 550 site visits or inspections.[87]

312. UNMOVIC had moved more quickly to establish the inspection process than originally envisaged. It had begun work on 27 November 2002, almost a month earlier than the deadline of 23 December in resolution 1441. It had also been able to establish the Baghdad Ongoing Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Centre (BOMVIC) and a temporary centre at Mosul more quickly than the 60 days it thought would be needed before entering Iraq.

313. Most of the site visits conducted during the first six weeks were "intended [to] familiarise inspectors with the sites, and inspection techniques". In addition, inspectors checked the equipment which had been tagged by UNSCOM, examined remote cameras and asked about work carried out at sites since 1998. Some visits had been superficial. From early January, "the inspections had become longer and more intrusive".

314. Initially UNMOVIC had been hampered by a lack of support equipment, personnel and experience. It had taken UNMOVIC until mid-December to get to near full strength with 100 inspectors. The inspectors were on short contracts with "a consequent loss of expertise" and "few" had experience of operating in Iraq.

315. UNMOVIC had acknowledged the problems. By the beginning of February, it had "visited or inspected all but one of the UK's recommended sites", and continued to be receptive to UK advice on potential targets. "Fatigue" was, however, "becoming a significant factor" which had been "reflected in an increasing number of accidents" during inspections. Fatigue was the result of:

> "… a combination of the pace of the inspection programme; Iraqi pressure; the perceived need for a 'success'; and concern for personal safety in the event of war."

316. During January and early February, "a total of 22 biological associated scientists and missile experts refused to meet inspectors in private". The three scientists who had agreed to interviews were "selected by the Iraqi National Monitoring Directorate". Even if Baghdad did concede interviews, all the scientists would be "concerned that anything they say will become known to the Iraqi authorities".

317. Finds had included:

- "nuclear-related documents hidden at the home of […] an Iraqi scientist" on 16 January, although "the general perception has been that these do not constitute a 'smoking gun'";
- "CW associated rocket warheads at Ukhaider ammunition depot" the same day. The liquid in one warhead was "awaiting the delivery of chemical sampling equipment". That had arrived but was "not yet operational";
- a "small quantity of … CW precursor chemicals at a Laboratory";
- "aluminium nozzles for 80mm rockets that Iraq had recast, but not declared" were discovered by the IAEA on 31 January; and
- "parts" from a "suspected … biological or chemical sub-munition" were found "at the al-Numan factory".

318. The Iraqis realised that some inspections had "been mounted on the basis of intelligence," and had "increased even further" the measures being taken to prevent damaging material being uncovered by either UNMOVIC or the IAEA. That included "ensuring that WMD material only remains at a particular location for an absolute maximum of 24 hours, and contingency plans to ensure that 'crowds' will always be available to disrupt an inspection that might prove successful".

319. The DIS report concluded that:

> "While UNMOVIC is gaining in confidence, the inspectors are under increasing pressure at a time when consideration is having to be given to a possible evacuation. Internally, despite the full inspection programme having been under way for only some five weeks, there is already a sense that time is running out.
>
> "UNMOVIC and the IAEA are capable of conducting thorough inspections; however, mistakes have resulted in at least two inspections failing to uncover concealed material …
> "UNMOVIC and IAEA remain very receptive to UK intelligence. On balance, however, in the absence of Iraqi cooperation, we assess that the discovery of a 'smoking gun' will probably be the result of intelligence information, skill on the part of the inspectors, an Iraqi mistake, and an element of luck."

320. Mr Blair told Mr John Howard that the inspectors' reports of 28 February should be the final reports to the Security Council.

321. A BBC poll published on 13 February found that 60 percent of people questioned thought that the UK and US Governments had failed to prove their case that Iraq had WMD, and 45 percent said that the UK should play no part in a war on Iraq, whatever the UN decided. Fewer than 10 percent said that they would back a war with Iraq without a second resolution.[88]

322. Mr Blair and Mr Howard discussed Dr Blix's forthcoming report and the prospects for a second resolution in a breakfast meeting on 13 February.[89]

323. Sir David Manning advised that there would be a need to challenge Dr Blix's likely assessment that there had been some movement on process and some movement on interviews; and to focus in public "on the underlying message that there was no fundamental change in attitude, and the key questions remained unanswered". International opinion should not be allowed "to be distracted by nuances about process".

[89] Letter Lloyd to Owen, 13 February 2003, 'Prime Minister's Breakfast with John Howard'.

324. Other points which Mr Blair and Mr Howard discussed included:

- Dr Blix was writing his report on the presumption that there would be more time and it was implicit in his approach that there would be more time.
- Concern that the report would be critical of Secretary Powell's presentation to the UN on 5 February.
- Russia and China were likely to abstain in a vote on a second resolution and France and Germany might put forward a rival text.

325. Mr Blair told Mr Howard that:

> "… people in the UK were suspicious that the US were eager to use force and did not want the inspections to work. They could accept the need for war, but not for war now. If Blix came up with a firm report that could change. The report on the 28th [of February] should be the final report. The US needed in parallel to ensure the support of the Security Council."

326. In response to Mr Howard's assessment that a second resolution was not needed for legal reasons, Mr Powell said that UK lawyers were studying the issue. Mr Blair said it was needed for political reasons.

327. In the subsequent press conference, Mr Blair stated that the discussion had been "dominated" by Iraq.[90] He and Prime Minister Howard had agreed that Iraq needed to disarm and resolution 1441 had to be upheld.

328. Prime Minister Howard praised Mr Blair's "strong and principled stance" and his "strong and effective leadership" and stated that he believed:

> "… very strongly that if the whole world speaking through the United Nations Security Council said with one clear voice to Iraq that it had to disarm then that would more than anything else be likely to bring forth the faint hope of a peaceful solution."

329. In reply to a question, Mr Howard stated that the problem was not time, it was Iraq's attitude.

330. Mr Blair was asked whether Iraq's ballistic missiles were enough to justify military action; and whether the news overnight of a North Korean threat that its missiles could hit US targets anywhere in the world "presented a more urgent and larger threat to international stability". He replied that the judgement on Iraq had to be "made in the round" in the context of resolution 1441. In relation to the need to confront the threat from North Korea, albeit "by different means", Mr Blair emphasised that the United Nations would be "tremendously weakened and undermined" if it showed "weakness and uncertainty over Iraq". That was "the key issue".

[90] Australian Government – Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, 13 February 2003, Joint Press Conference with Prime Minister, Tony Blair.

Cabinet, 13 February 2003

331. Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced on 12 February that he was allocating a further £750m to help meet the costs of potential military action in Iraq.[91]

332. Mr Blair convened a meeting on humanitarian issues with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Ms Short, Adm Boyce and No.10 officials in the margins of Cabinet on 13 February.[92] That meeting is addressed in Section 6.5.

333. In Cabinet on 13 February, Mr Straw stated that Iraq was not co-operating on substance and its Al Samoud missiles and engines could be further evidence of a material breach of resolution 1441. The authority of the UN was at stake.

334. Mr Hoon stated that the second resolution needed to provide straightforward legal justification for taking military action.

335. Mr Blair concluded that there was no point in conceding more time for inspections if the lack of co-operation did not permit the inspectors to do their job. The "best course was to keep our nerve and persevere".

336. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 13 February that the UN inspectors were likely to tell the Security Council on 14 February that:

> "… the Iraqis were co-operating a bit more on the process but not on the substance. One issue of significance could be the inspectors' attitude to the Al Samoud missiles and the 223 new Volga engines, which they could decide were in breach of Iraq's obligations. That would be further evidence of material breach."[93]

He would report to the House of Commons later that day that Iraq had been, and continued to be in material breach; and that further confirmation of the facts by the inspectors "would lead logically to a Security Council resolution".

337. Mr Straw also reported difficulties in NATO over a request from Turkey for support. That was "a serious situation which was pulling NATO apart". The Presidency of the EU had called a summit [meeting of the European Council] for 17 February.

338. Mr Straw told his colleagues that:

> "… the authority of the United Nations was at stake. There was a parallel with the failure of the League of Nations in the 1930s to enforce international law … The best chance of avoiding military action was to hold our nerve in keeping to the United Nations process."

---

[91] House of Commons, Official Report, 12 February 2003, column 883.
[92] Letter Cannon to Bewes, 13 February 2003, 'Iraq: Humanitarian Issues'.
[93] Cabinet Conclusions, 13 February 2003.

339. Reporting on his visit to the US, Mr Hoon told Cabinet that the US Administration "had a good appreciation" of the Government's political situation. In his view, it would be "important politically" that any further resolution "should be simple" and "provide straightforward legal justification for taking military action"; "obscurity or justification relying on bureaucratic references back to earlier resolutions" should be avoided.

340. The points made in discussion included:

- the authority of the UN "could be undermined both by a failure to act and by action taken without its sanction";
- the tone of public communications "should not give the impression of a rush to war: there was a benefit in a distinctively British approach";
- while public opinion "did not seem persuaded of the necessity of war, it appeared to support military action when combined with a further Security Council resolution";
- emphasis had to be given to the future welfare of the Iraqi people as well as the re-invigoration of the MEPP;
- work "had started" in the US to "put in place structures for the recovery and reconstruction of Iraq in the event of military conflict".

341. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said that the Government "should maintain the integrity" of the UN process. That "did not mean allowing Iraq to prolong inspections indefinitely". Iraq had:

> "… been given a final chance to comply and full co-operation was required, otherwise the issue returned to the Security Council for discussion. There was no point in conceding more time for inspections if the lack of co-operation did not permit the inspectors to do their job."

342. Mr Blair expected public opinion "to shift before we got to the point of military action. Some polling showed that there would be support both in the event of a further Security Council resolution and if the majority of the Security Council supported action despite a veto". Strenuous efforts were being made to avoid the alienation of France and Germany. The UK would stand up for itself and had support in Europe. The international community need to be engaged in dealing with the humanitarian consequences of Saddam Hussein's rule in Iraq. The "best course was to keep our nerve and persevere".

343. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Cook had "really played up the extent of the opposition" on Iraq, and that he might be "putting down a marker" about his departure: "He was clearly very offside and had become more so."[94]

---

[94] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

344. In his memoir, Mr Cook wrote that he had offered three suggestions for how "we should conduct ourselves if we are going to reconnect with the public":

> "We could stop appearing to force the pace on the war. The public will only follow us if they believe we are reluctant about conflict …
>
> "We need to find a distinctive British tone in which we address the Iraq crisis. We should stop appearing as the US and UK axis.
>
> "We should stick to the UN like glue. If tomorrow Hans Blix asks for more time for inspectors, he must get it. If we depart from the UN process we shall be committing suicide …"[95]

345. Mr Campbell wrote that there was also a meeting with Mr Straw on tactics for the second resolution and whether it should be tabled before the European Council.[96]

346. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed the next steps and tactics and timings on 13 February, including concerns about a possible Franco-German initiative.[97]

347. Sir David told Dr Rice that the UK preference was to wait to table a second resolution until after the special EU Council on Iraq, unless circumstances dictated an earlier date.

348. In the meeting of the Security Council the following day, the UK aim was to move the discussion away from process and focus it on substance: "The best bet seemed to be to put a series of very tough questions to Blix about Iraqi performance and insist on very clear answers." The UK did not want "Saturday's headlines being about calls in the Security Council to give the inspectors more time".

349. In his record of the discussion, Sir David commented: "We should also have a draft resolution in our back pockets, ready to put down at a moment's notice."

350. Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Washington, wrote to Sir David Manning on 13 February stating:

> "Sitting in on Mr Hoon's meetings with Condi Rice and Don Rumsfeld [Mr Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense] yesterday I was very struck by how the military timetable is now driving the diplomatic end game."[98]

Mr Straw's statement, 13 February 2003

351. Mr Straw told the House of Commons on 13 February that the conclusion that Iraq was in further material breach of resolution 1441 was "inescapable".

352. A peaceful outcome to the crisis depended on maintaining unrelenting pressure on Saddam Hussein to disarm, and a decision by him to co-operate.

353. Because the House of Commons would be in recess the following week, Mr Straw made a statement on 13 February.[99]

354. Mr Straw said that the reports presented by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 27 January had "painted a disturbing picture". "Most damning of all" was Dr Blix's observation that Iraq appeared "not to have come to a genuine acceptance" of the demand for disarmament. Mr Straw added that the central premise of Iraq's "so-called disclosure", that Iraq possessed no WMD "was, and remains, a lie". "Nor was there any admission of Iraq's extensive efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction since … December 1998" when the inspectors were "effectively excluded from Iraq".

355. Mr Straw stated that the briefings on 27 January and Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council on 5 February left "no doubt that Iraq had failed to meet" the "two clear tests for further material breach" set out in resolution 1441. Mr Straw added : "The conclusion is therefore inescapable: Iraq is in further material breach …"

356. The points made by Mr Straw included:

- He still hoped and prayed "for a peaceful outcome to the crisis", but that would only be possible if "unrelenting pressure" was maintained on Saddam Hussein, "including the threat of force, rather than casting around for excuses to delay".
- If the international community "lost its nerve", that would "significantly undermine the UN's authority and make the world a much more dangerous place, as dictators got the message that international law consisted of mere words and nothing else".
- French and German calls to "bolster the inspections regime" would not "deliver the assurance the world needs" and were "unrealistic and impractical". They shifted "the burden of proof from Iraq … to the inspectors"; and sent "Saddam the signal that defiance pays".
- Armed intervention was not inevitable and a peaceful resolution of the crisis remained in Saddam's hands. But the inspectors would "not be able to fulfil their mandate to verify Iraqi disarmament" without Iraq's compliance. In that event, resolution 1441 warned Iraq to expect "serious consequences": "By now, even Saddam Hussein must be under no illusions: that can only mean disarmament by force."

---

[99] House of Commons, Official Report, 13 February 2003, columns 1056-1071.

357. The points made by Mr Alan Duncan (Conservative) included:

- Diplomatic relations between the US and France and Germany were "to put it mildly, scratchy", but relations between Western democracies should not "slide into disarray".
- The Conservative Party shared the judgement, enshrined in resolution 1441, that the cost of doing nothing was greater than the cost of doing something". The UK should not resile from implementing resolution 1441.
- Given "the doubting mood of public opinion", the Government should focus on Saddam Hussein's arsenal of weapons, not other issues such as links with terrorism and the publication of an "utterly substandard dossier" which diverted attention from the main issue and dented the Government's credibility.
- Was a second resolution, which a "fortnight ago" had "seemed a dead cert", now touch and go?

358. Mr Mark Oaten (Liberal Democrat):

- Expressed concerns about the impact on the unity of the international community of ignoring a veto by one of the Permanent Members of the Security Council.
- Asked why Mr Straw was dismissing the options of further UN inspection and containment. If the inspectors believed that "with more time, co-operation and space, progress could be made, they should be given more time".

359. In response to those points, and subsequent questions, which included both support for action and concerns, points made by Mr Straw included:

- It would be the Government's decision whether or not to move a resolution. It would make decisions after the inspectors' reports to the Security Council the following day; decisions would be reported to the House of Commons as quickly as possible.
- The Government was asking all the members of the Security Council, when they assessed the inspectors' reports, "to follow through the true meaning of the language to which every single member … signed up". The UK and other members of the Security Council could not be in a position where they believed the "conclusions following from the true meaning of 1441" were "inescapable, but one member, for example", sought "to avoid those conclusions".
- Resolution 1441 was "a sufficient mandate" for military action because it spelled out "with complete clarity" that there were "obligations on Iraq that it must follow through", which were "very straightforward".

- It had been suggested during the negotiation that a requirement for a second resolution "if military force was to take place" should be written into resolution 1441. That had been "dropped from the final draft".
- The UK should "seek to lower, not raise the temperature of relations" with friendly nations. It did not want to be, and would not be, involved in recriminations between friendly members of UN.
- If the inspectors asked for more resources, that would be considered, but the UK could not "be drawn into the argument from outside the inspectors' ranks, which seeks to imply that, in the absence of co-operation, more inspectors will resolve the matter. They will not. Procrastination is not the solution to the problem; co-operation is."
- The evidence in respect of Iraq's possession of "chemical and biological weapons and weapons programmes, and its readiness to develop a nuclear programme" was "overwhelming". Iraq had been "found guilty" in 1991 and had to "prove its innocence". The "absence of evidence in a huge country where there are only 100 inspectors" did "not prove the absence of a programme … other circumstantial evidence" had to be examined. Iraq had had a highly developed nuclear programme in 1991.
- No one was "exaggerating the problem" and "no one had invented the fact that Iraq had the programme [of weapons of mass destruction]". Until Iraq proved otherwise, the evidence suggested that Iraq continued to have "the programme".
- There was no evidence of links between Al Qaida and Iraq in respect of the attacks on the US on 11 September 2001, although he "would not be surprised if such evidence came forward". There was "some evidence of links between the Al Qaida organisation and Iraq, in terms of the Iraq regime allowing a permissive environment for Al Qaida operatives".
- There had been "very active co-operation between the intelligence agencies in the United States and the United Kingdom, and the weapons inspectors".
- He "shared the anxieties" about military action which "should only ever be a last resort", but "on occasions" it was "essential to enforce law by force, otherwise the world becomes extremely dangerous".
- It "would have been better, in a way" to include the words "disarmament by force" in the resolution, "but in diplomatic speak the choice was between 'all necessary means' and 'serious consequences'. Everybody in the diplomatic community knows that 'serious consequences' means the use of force".[100]

360. The third Ministerial-level meeting of the Security Council to discuss Iraq took place on 14 February.

Dr Blix's report, 14 February 2003

361. Dr Blix reported that UNMOVIC had not found any weapons of mass destruction and the items that were not accounted for might not exist, but Iraq needed to provide the evidence to answer the questions, not belittle them.

362. Dr Blix pointed out that the evidence that Iraq had prepared for inspections by cleaning up sites and removing evidence, presented to the Security Council by Secretary Powell on 5 February, could have a different interpretation.

363. Dr Blix told the Security Council that:

- The total number of UNMOVIC staff in Iraq had increased to more than 250. The regional office in Mosul was "fully operational" and plans for a regional office in Basra were "being developed". UNMOVIC had conducted more than 400 inspections covering more than 300 sites.
- "All inspections were performed without notice, and access was almost always provided promptly. In no case have we seen convincing evidence that the Iraqi side knew in advance that the inspectors were coming."
- Inspections were "effectively helping to bridge the gap in knowledge" that had arisen because of the absence of inspectors between December 1998 and November 2002.
- UNMOVIC had informed the Iraqi authorities that it planned to start U-2 surveillance flights early the following week and was still expanding its capabilities.
- Intelligence information provided to UNMOVIC had been "gradually increasing". But there were "limitations" and "misinterpretations" could occur.
- Three persons who had previously refused interviews on UNMOVIC's terms had given "informative" interviews just before the visit to Baghdad by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei. Dr Blix hoped that Iraq's commitment to encourage persons to accept interviews would mean further interviews would be accepted.
- UNMOVIC had begun the process of destroying approximately 50 litres of mustard gas declared by Iraq.
- More than 200 chemical and more than 100 biological samples had been collected. Three-quarters of the samples had already been tested and the results were consistent with Iraq's declarations.[101]

[101] UN Security Council, '4707th Meeting Friday 14 February 2003' (S/PV.4707).

364. Addressing how much, "if any" was left of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC had not found any so far, "only a small number of empty chemical munitions, which should have been declared and destroyed". UNMOVIC had destroyed the "laboratory quantity" of a "mustard gas precursor" that had been found. Many proscribed weapons and items had not been accounted for, but:

> "One must not jump to the conclusion that they exist. However that possibility is also not excluded. If they exist they must be presented for destruction. If they do not exist, credible evidence to that effect should be presented."

365. Referring to his warning on 27 January that Iraq should not brush aside questions on significant outstanding issues of substance, including on anthrax, the nerve agent VX and long range missiles, Dr Blix stated that the fact that Iraq had, in its declaration of 7 December 2002, "missed the opportunity to provide the fresh material and evidence needed to respond to the open questions" was "perhaps the most important problem we are facing". He added:

> "Although I can understand that it may not be easy for Iraq in all cases to provide the evidence needed, it is not the task of the inspectors to find it. Iraq itself must squarely tackle this task and avoid belittling the questions."

366. Some papers had been provided in Baghdad on 9 February. Dr Blix stated that "could be indicative of a more active attitude" but there were problems verifying the quantities of anthrax and two precursors for VX which Iraq had unilaterally destroyed: "Documentary evidence and testimony by staff who dealt with the items still appears to be needed." Iraq's initiative to identify 83 participants "in the unilateral destruction in the chemical field" appeared "useful and pertain[ed] to co-operation on substance". Dr Blix trusted that Iraq would put together a "similar list of names of persons who participated in the unilateral destruction of other proscribed items".

367. Dr Blix also welcomed the extension of the mandate of an Iraqi commission to look for any proscribed items and the appointment of a second commission to search for documents relevant to the elimination of proscribed items and programmes. But they would "evidently need to work fast and effectively to convince us, and the world, that it is a serious effort".

368. Experts had "concluded unanimously" that the two variants of the Al Samoud 2 missile declared by Iraq were capable of exceeding the range of 150km. Those, and any of the 380 SA-2 (Volga) engines which had been imported in contravention of resolution 687 (1991) and converted for use in the Al Samoud missile system, were proscribed. The casting chambers for missile motors were also proscribed. Clarifications were needed before decisions could be made on the capabilities of the Al Fatah missile and the al-Rafah engine test stand.

369. In response to urgings that Iraq should implement the requirement in resolution 687 to enact legislation implementing the UN prohibitions on WMD, Iraq had told UNMOVIC and the IAEA earlier that day that it had issued a Presidential Decree. The text was being studied.

370. Addressing the role of intelligence, Dr Blix stated that in the closed society of Iraq, and the history of inspections, "other sources of information, such as defectors and government intelligence agencies" were "required to aid the inspection process". International organisations then needed to analyse such information critically.

371. Dr Blix added that intelligence had been useful for UNMOVIC, and in one case had led to the discovery of documents relating to laser enrichment of uranium:

> "In other cases, intelligence has led to sites where no proscribed items were found. Even in such cases, however, inspection of these sites were useful in proving the absence of such items and in some cases the presence of other items – conventional munitions. It shows that conventional arms are being moved around the country and their presence is not necessarily related to weapons of mass destruction."

372. Referring to Secretary Powell's presentation on 5 February, and in particular the suggestion that "Iraq had prepared for inspections by cleaning up sites and removing evidence of proscribed weapons programmes", Dr Blix stated that he wanted to comment on "the trucks identified by analysts as being for chemical decontamination at a munitions depot". That depot was a declared site, and one that Iraq would have expected UNMOVIC to inspect. Dr Blix stated that: "We have noted that the two satellite images of the site were taken several weeks apart. The reported movement of munitions at the site could just as easily have been a routine activity as a movement of proscribed munitions in anticipation of imminent inspection." He added that: "Our reservation on this point does not detract from our appreciation of the briefing."

373. Concluding his report, Dr Blix commented that:

> "UNMOVIC is not infrequently asked how much more time it needs to complete its task in Iraq. The answer depends on which task one has in mind … the disarmament task – or the monitoring that no new proscribed activities occur …
>
> "… Regrettably the high degree of co-operation required of Iraq for disarmament through inspection was not forthcoming in 1991 …
> "If Iraq had provided the necessary co-operation in 1991, the phase of disarmament … could have been short and a decade of sanctions could have been avoided. Today, three months after the adoption of resolution 1441 (2002) the period of disarmament through inspection could still be short if 'immediate, active and unconditional cooperation' with UNMOVIC and the IAEA were to be forthcoming."

374. Sir Jeremy Greenstock commented that Dr Blix's presentation had been "more equivocal than 27 January, highlighting progress on process and other 'hopeful' signs (e.g. new documents, the Iraqi commissions and the Iraqi decree on WMD)".[102]

375. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that it paid to re-read Dr Blix's reports of 14 February:

> "It was clear that compliance was stepped up significantly as the prospect of military action became more real, but it was also clear that the problem was unlikely to be resolved unless those running Iraq had a genuine and not transitory change of heart …
> "They [UNMOVIC] were hopeful that Iraq could be disarmed; but the report still concluded compliance had yet to conform to the requirement of the UN resolution [1441] …"[103]

Dr ElBaradei's report, 14 February 2003

376. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had found no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or nuclear-related activities in Iraq, although a number of issues were still under investigation.

377. Dr ElBaradei reported that:

- The IAEA had conducted an additional 38 inspections at 19 locations since his report to the Council on 27 January.
- Iraq had continued to provide immediate access at all locations.
- The IAEA had continued to interview key personnel and had recently been able to conduct four interviews in private, although the interviewees had recorded their interviews. In the meeting in Baghdad, Iraq had "reconfirmed its commitment to encourage its citizens to accept interviews in private, both inside and outside of Iraq".
- Iraq had expanded the list of relevant personnel to more than 300 to include higher-level key scientists; IAEA continued to ask for information about personnel of lesser rank.
- The IAEA intended to increase the numbers of inspectors and support staff and to "expand and intensify the range of technical meetings and interviews".[104]

378. Iraq had provided documentation relating to the reported attempt to import uranium, the attempted procurement of aluminium tubes, the procurement of magnets and magnet production capability, and the use of HMX. The IAEA was pursuing the acquisition of uranium and examining issues in relation to aluminium tubes and magnets. On HMX, the IAEA might be unable to reach a final conclusion:

> "While we have no indication that this material was used for any application other than declared by Iraq, we have no technical method of verifying … the declared use …"

379. In relation to "documents found on 16 January in the private residence of an Iraqi scientist", the IAEA had "completed a more detailed review". The documents related "predominantly to lasers, including the use of laser technology to enrich uranium". "Nothing" in the documents altered "the conclusions previously drawn by the IAEA" about the extent of Iraq's laser enrichment programme.

380. Iraq had also provided documentation about questions and concerns which had remained since 1998 about weapons and centrifuge design, but the documents contained "no new information". Dr ElBaradei hoped that "the new Iraqi commissions … will be able to discover documents and other evidence that could assist in clarifying remaining questions and concerns".

381. Dr ElBaradei stated that the IAEA would continue to expand its capabilities to "strengthen and accelerate" its ability to investigate matters of concern, and to "reinstate and reinforce" its monitoring and verification system.

382. Dr ElBaradei had "reported on numerous occasions" that the IAEA had:

> "… by December 1998 … concluded that it had neutralised Iraq's past nuclear programme and that therefore no unresolved disarmament issues remained … Hence, our focus since the resumption of inspections … has been verifying whether Iraq revived its nuclear programme in the intervening years.
>
> "We have to date found no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or nuclear-related activities in Iraq. However … a number of issues are still under investigation … we intend to make full use of the authority granted to us … to build as much capacity into the inspection process as necessary.
>
> "In that context, I would underline the importance of information that States may be able to provide to help us in assessing the accuracy and completeness of information provided by Iraq."

383. Dr ElBaradei concluded that it was:

> "… possible with an intrusive verification system, to assess the presence or absence of a nuclear weapons programme … even without the full co-operation of the inspected State.
> "However, prompt, full and active co-operation by Iraq as required under resolution 1441 (2002) will speed up the process. More importantly, it will enable us to reach the high degree of assurance required by the Security Council in the case of Iraq in view of its past clandestine programmes of weapons of mass destruction and its past pattern of co-operation. It is my hope that the commitments made recently in Baghdad will continue to translate into concrete and sustained action."

Security Council discussions, 14 February 2003

384. In the discussion which followed the reports, significant differences between members of the Security Council remained.

385. Mr de Villepin stated that the inspectors should be given time to fulfil their mission and a further meeting to assess the situation should be held on 14 March.

386. France did not exclude a resort to force but it could be justified "only" if inspections failed. The Council would "have to take a decision" if the inspectors reported it was impossible to continue.

387. The reports from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei were followed by a discussion in the Security Council on 14 February.[105]

388. The points made by Mr de Villepin included:

- In adopting resolution 1441 the Council had collectively agreed two stages: "disarmament through inspections and, if this strategy should fail, consideration by the Security Council of all the options, including resorting to force". A second resolution could be justified "only" if inspections failed.
- France did not believe the option of inspections had "been exhausted", it could "provide an effective response to the imperative of disarming Iraq".
- The use of force would "have such heavy consequences for the people, the region and international stability that it should be envisaged only as a last resort".
- Inspections were producing results, although each member of the Council "would like more" and pressure on Baghdad should be maintained to achieve that.
- Real progress was being made. Aerial reconnaissance had been agreed. Iraq had allowed interviews without minders. Draft legislation barring activities linked to programmes for weapons of mass destruction was being adopted. Iraq was providing a list of experts who witnessed the programmes of destruction in 1991.
- France had set out proposals to enhance the efficiency of inspections and would be providing additional resources.
- War might seem to be the swiftest option in ensuring Iraqi compliance, but building peace would be long and difficult. No one could maintain that war would "lead to a safer, more just and more stable world"; war was "always the outcome of failure".

[105] UN Security Council, '4707th Meeting Friday 14 February 2003' (S/PV.4707).

- The inspectors should have "the time that is necessary for their mission to succeed". The Council should meet again at Ministerial level, on 14 March, to "assess the situation".
- The use of force was "not justified at this time" and "premature recourse to the military option would be fraught with risks". It would call the unity of the Council into question, and that would: "… remove its legitimacy and, in the long run, its effectiveness. Such intervention could have incalculable consequences for the stability of a scared and fragile region. It would compound the sense of injustice, would aggravate tensions and would risk paving the way for other conflicts."
- The priority was fighting terrorism. France had no intelligence of the links between Al Qaida and the Baghdad regime alleged by Secretary Powell on 5 February. Military action would exacerbate the divisions that nurtured terrorism.
- France did not exclude recourse to force if the inspectors reported that it was "impossible for inspections to continue". In that case, the "Council would have to take a decision, and its members would have to shoulder all of their responsibilities".

389. Sir Jeremy Greenstock commented that Mr de Villepin's "impassioned plea for continued inspections" had won "unprecedented applause from the gallery".[106]

390. Mrs Alvear called for the inspections process to be continued and enhanced.

391. Chile was dismayed by the divisions in the Council and called for a return to co-operation and unity to achieve Iraq's disarmament.

392. Mrs Alvear stated that indications of progress raised "some hopes for a decisive change of attitude" from Iraq towards the demands of the international community, but other attitudes revealed "an intention not to co-operate" and gave rise to "suspicions about the presence of weapons of mass destruction".[107] Iraq was not fully implementing the resolutions and pressure on Saddam Hussein's regime had to be maintained "relentlessly and without relaxation".

393. Chile believed that the "inspections process must be continued, strengthened and expanded to make it accurate, intrusive and capable of thwarting any effort at deception or evasion".

394. The Security Council had a "key role" and Chile had "noted with dismay over the past month a growing division within the Council". While that was "rooted in positions" that were "legitimately different", it had been "fuelled by a lack of willingness to listen and to propose". Chile wished to contribute to a "return to the path of debate and to a method of work that combines conviction with respect for the concerns of others, the capacity of persuasion with tolerance and, above all, patience". Unity of the Council was:

> "… the basis of any international action that seeks to be both legitimate and effective. Only a united Council could credibly adopt the appropriate decisions for achieving the objective of the disarmament of the Iraqi regime."

395. Chile wholeheartedly accepted Mr Annan's invitation, in a recent speech, "to take the necessary time to continue to seek the broadest possible consensus for achieving a comprehensive solution". That was the only way to exhaust all means to settle the conflict peacefully and reserve the use of force "until the moment when it becomes clear to all that peaceful means have failed".

396. China also called for the pursuit of a political settlement.

397. Mr Tang Jiaxuan, the Chinese Foreign Minister, urged Iraq to recognise the importance and urgency of inspections and to co-operate more pro-actively. China, "in agreement with the majority opinion among Council members", believed that the inspections process was working. The Council had to "step up its efforts". "Only by pursuing a political settlement" could the Council "live up to the trust and hope that the international community places in the Security Council".

398. Spain questioned Iraq's will to co-operate.

399. Ms Palacio pointed out that active, immediate and complete co-operation from Iraq was not yet forthcoming and all the areas of non-compliance and unresolved issues mentioned in Dr Blix's report of 27 January remained. Spain saw no need for more inspections or an increase in capability. Peace and security were "ensured through respect for and compliance with Security Council resolutions". If there was no change in the political will of Saddam Hussein to co-operate, the Council would be "obliged to assume its responsibilities in the interests of the peace and security of the world".

400. Mr Straw also questioned whether Iraq had decided to co-operate and stated that Iraq's material breaches still existed.

401. The authority of the United Nations and the responsibility of the Council for peace and security were at issue from Iraq's continued defiance.

402. The UN Charter required the diplomatic process to be backed by the credible threat of the use of force and its use if necessary.

403. Mr Straw thanked Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei for "their great efforts in the face of what I think is still very clear: Iraq's failure, fully and actively to comply with resolution 1441".[108]

---

[108] UN Security Council, '4707th Meeting Friday 14 February 2003' (S/PV.4707).

404. Mr Straw stated that the issue, which "could not be graver", was "about the authority of the United Nations and about the responsibility of the Security Council for international peace and security". All the members of the Council knew that Iraq had "had these weapons [of mass destruction and long-range missiles]"; Iraq had been "found guilty" in 1991. The issue was whether Iraq was "actively co-operating to get rid of them".

405. Mr Straw stated that Iraq had lied, had concealed weapons and played games. As Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had:

> "… spelled out in their report of 27 January, Iraq has failed to account for thousands of tons of chemical weapons and precursor chemicals, of shells and bombs for anthrax, for mustard gas, for VX nerve agent. They have failed to make a full and complete disclosure as required of them … They have failed to co-operate fully and actively on substance, as well as on process with the inspectors, and failed substantively to meet the obligations imposed on them."

406. Mr Straw added:

> "… nobody who has spoken so far … has suggested for a second that Iraq is fully and actively complying with the obligations that we imposed … So Iraq's material breaches … are still there."

407. Mr Straw posed a number of questions for the inspectors including:

- What were Iraq's motives for refurbishing prohibited equipment destroyed by UNSCOM?
- How many interviews had taken place, and how many could the inspectors be sure were not subject to Iraqi surveillance?
- Had the "outstanding material identified by UNSCOM" been "satisfactorily dealt with"?
- How many "open issues" in the nuclear dossier had the IAEA been able to close?

408. Mr Straw stated that he interpreted Dr Blix's report as meaning that "Iraq has yet to be forthcoming with … immediate, active and unconditional co-operation". Picking up a phrase from Dr Blix's report of 27 January, Mr Straw asked whether Dr Blix believed Iraq had "yet come to a genuine acceptance of the disarmament that has been demanded of it".

409. "Like every other member" of the Council, Mr Straw hoped and believed that a peaceful solution to the crisis might "still be possible". But that would require a "dramatic and immediate change by Saddam" which would be achieved only if the Council held its nerve.
